SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, February 19, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session to order and begin by making just one or two announcements, I would like to repeat the announcement that I made earlier this week about tomorrow's schedule, that because of the illness of Mr. Zimmerman, the President of Reader's Digest Association Canada Limited it will be necessary to postpone that hearing. We have not yet rescheduled the Reader's Digest hearing but of course they will be still appearing before the committee, but I am not able at this point to confirm the time. As you know, Mr. Goodis who was also to appear tomorrow appeared yesterday morning, so there are no sessions tomorrow.

For the balance of today, that is following the Time brief this morning, you should be reminded that at 2.30 p.m. we will receive a brief from Actualité and at four o'clock from Sept Jours, and tonight at eight o'clock a brief from Toronto Life. The meeting this evening at nine o'clock with Mr. Dalton Camp has been postponed until four o'clock on Wednesday, March 4.

May I also remind senators that the committee is meeting next Tuesday, February 24, at 10 o'clock.

This morning we are going to receive the submission from Time International Canada Limited. With me seated on my immediate right is Mr. Stephen S. LaRue, Vice President and Managing Director of Time (Canada). On my immediate left is Mr. John M. Scott, the Editor of Time (Canada), and sitting on Mr. Scott's left is Mr. Deane D. Raley, Jr., Printing and Planning Manager, Corporate Products, Time Incorporated.

Mr. Raley, Jr., is from Time Incorporated and our other two witnesses are from Time International Canada Limited.

Mr. LaRue, the brief that we requested in the guidelines was received in lots of time and has been circulated to the senators and presumably studied by them. We would now like to put about 15 minutes or so at your disposal to comment on the brief, to explain it, to review it, to expand upon it, to add to it or take away from it, or anything else you may wish to do. Following that the Senators would like to question you on the contents of your brief, on your oral comments or on other matters which may interest them. I am sure some of our questions will be directed at both Mr. Scott and Mr. Raley, and in turn if you wish to direct questions to them, by all means feel free to do so.

Welcome, we are delighted you are here, Mr. LaRue.

Mr. Stephen S. LaRue, Vice President and Managing Director, Time International Canada Limited: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Honourable Senators and ladies and gentlemen, my remarks at the opening will be brief. I simply want to say amongst other things that we frankly are surprised and naturally intrigued that during the committee's sessions this week which we have naturally attended, so much of the committee's time has been devoted to the questioning of witnesses from other publishing firms on the subject of Time (Canada). The central fact underlined, as well as now know, has been Time's editorial and business success in Canada.

We believe that Time has grown in Canada and occupies the position it does because Time has had for many years an essential fact about it. That is, a wide, loyal readership in this country. We believe that we serve that readership well. Any business success, any advertising success which we have attained has been the direct result of Time's dynamic relationship with its readers here. I find it an interesting coincidence that we have been scheduled to appear this morning on Senator Grattan O'Leary's birthday. It occurs to me that at another time he would have liked nothing better than to present on this memorable occasion our heads on a platter. However,

I am grateful to him that he hasn't so far, and I am also grateful to him because during his own very eloquent time here before the committee he pointed out what I consider again to be the essential factor in the success of any magazine, indeed probably any newspaper. That, of course, is reader acceptance.

Gentlemen, you have our brief and we think it speaks for itself. We tried to include information in the brief pertinent to our operations following the guideline questions which were received several months ago. There is one area, however, of information which I frankly consider myself, and I think John Scott would agree with me for himself, we are incompetent. That is the subject of where technology is leading the print media, where it is leading Time and where it is leading other magazines. For that reason, we have invited Deane Raley from Time Incorporated in New York City who, as the chairman has said, is Time Incorporated's Printing and Planning Manager, to sit with us today and entertain any questions that you may have about what the future may hold.

Senators, I suspect you have one or two additional questions to ask us and we will do our best to answer them in all candor.

Thank you very much.

The Chairman: Thank you very much Mr. LaRue. A special word of welcome to you Mr. Raley and it may well be that there will be questions directed to you. I would like to begin the questioning this morning, Mr. LaRue with Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. LaRue, Richard Pollak writing in Harper's some months ago—an article entitled "Time After Luce" which you have probably read concluded as follows:

"Marginal First-quarter losses, of course, do not necessarily portend bankruptcy."

He was, of course, referring to Time Incorporated.

"But they do tend to make half-billion dollar corporations edgy. And along with all the mundane, immediate problems, there is always McLuhan and his electric circuitry. Are print culture's hot linear days numbered? Will post-industrial post-Chicago man be post-literate as well? Already television has put its cool whammy on Life. Who'll be next? In another ten years (five years?) will anyone want to read the newsmagazines? Or any other kind of magazine? Or newspapers?"

Would you care to comment on that?

Mr. LaRue: Well, first of all on the first quarter figures of last year, which he referred to in the article, historically the first quarter of every year for any publication is the worst quarter of all. You have to pay your bills for the year and receipts for advertising and circulation revenues are low.

The second quarter is usually one of the two best quarters and the third quarter is low again because advertising falls off in the summer and the fourth quarter picks up again. You have to look at the whole picture.

Mr. Fortier: Well, looking at the whole year?

Mr. LaRue: The first quarter in 1970 will be down again probably for the corporation and we will know later today when the Board of Directors announces last year's complete financial figures and tables the financial information.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we will come back to that after.

Mr. LaRue: However, his gloomy observation that the future holds nothing but problems for us, and perhaps that Time's magazine group may be in trouble is very erroneous.

Mr. Fortier: I am sorry, what?

Mr. LaRue: Very erroneous. The impression one receives from that is erroneous. Life magazine is the biggest publishing enterprise that has ever been created and I can give you estimation—it may be slightly inaccurate, but not terribly inaccurate—that Life will generate some revenue—some $180 million in 1969. That is a long way from going broke.

Time magazine, the second largest of all magazines in advertising and circulation revenues, will be ahead of the year before.

Sports Illustrated is very healthy and so is Fortune.

Mr. Fortier: Are you saying that based on the whole year's figures, which will be announced as you say this afternoon, but based on the first three-quarters, let us say, there was a dip in earnings...

Mr. LaRue: The fourth quarter picked up. It is not going to be the greatest year that Time Incorporated has ever had in its magazine division, but it may be the third best.

Mr. Fortier: Well, the point I am trying to get at is that all was not as well as it could have been...

Mr. LaRue: Right.

Mr. Fortier: ...at head office with Time magazine in 1969. Would that be a fair statement?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: There have been better years?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, we have had a lot of problems that we have had to deal with. We had management changes which reflect the new vigour, I think, in assessing our whole operations at Time Incorporated.

Mr. Fortier: But profits are not what they have been?

Mr. LaRue: Profits have not been what they have been.

Mr. Fortier: Now, testifying before the O'Leary Commission back in 1961 Henry Luce had this to say about the profitability of magazines and I quote:

"The question of profit depends on management."

What is wrong with Time's management in New York?

The Chairman: Anything you say is privileged.

Mr. LaRue: In the last six months we have appointed a new president, three new executive vice presidents, five new publishers, one new editor and we will see about Canada's managing director after this session. There is a re-organization in the company, not because of the failures of the past, but I think because of the problems inherent in the opportunities we have in the future. The magazine field is changing at a rapid rate and magazines themselves are changing. We have heard all this week about the intangible aspect of publishing and editing magazines and Time itself is changing. If you are a reader of Time you will probably notice. We have new departments, new treatments of the cover, new language, and so on. There is a dynamic operation which is trying to take advantage of the contemporary scene as it has always in the past and it is one which is not unhealthy.

Mr. Fortier: These changes in management. How are they affecting your Canadian operations? It is quite clear, as you yourself said, editorially and businesswise Time in Canada has been a success.

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Circulation has grown since 1960 from 215,000 to 430,000 and your advertising has more than doubled. How has Time (Canada) managed to perform so well on paper where the rest of the magazine industry in Canada—again, it is a matter of record—has not been doing so well and indeed the magazine industry in the United States as you have just said has been going through some serious pains. Why this privileged position which you seem to enjoy here in Canada?

Mr. LaRue: I think it is the uniqueness of the magazine, but I don't think you can generalize about the magazine industry either here or in the United States. I think you have to talk about individual magazines which is one of the fine things I think you are doing in this committee. Talking to the individuals and having them discuss their problems and opportunities with you as individual editors and publishers.

Mr. Fortier: Speaking of your magazine?

Mr. LaRue: There are unique qualities necessary to each magazine to live. It doesn't live, if it isn't unique and if it can't deliver to its audience something that nobody else can—an extra dimension, if you will.

Mr. Fortier: You will agree with me that you have to look at the overall picture?

Mr. LaRue: Time's success over the years on a world-wide basis has been not unlike Time's success in Canada. The U.S. edition, for example, has doubled its advertising revenues and its circulation has almost doubled. The Time Atlantic edition has quadrupled its advertising revenue, the Time Pacific edition has trebled their advertising revenue, and even Time (Latin America) a market which everyone agrees is perhaps not the healthiest in the world—certainly one of the more mixed—has increased its advertising revenue by 75 per cent. Time (Canada), while it is a success in Canada, is part of an international network edition of Time.

Mr. Fortier: How much of Time's success in Canada is attributable to the fact that it belongs to this great big family?

Mr. LaRue: Oh, a great deal. Time's success anywhere, I think, is relative to what the editorial idea has been and continues to be.

Mr. Fortier: And given this editorial idea of the mother magazine and all the little offsprings, is it possible, Mr. LaRue, for a merely Canadian magazine to compete on even terms with yours in Canada?

Mr. LaRue: I think they are, yes.

Mr. Fortier: You think they are?

Mr. LaRue: Yes. I think we are seeing changes—you have heard from Maclean's, and Chatelaine which are healthy magazines and Saturday Night is struggling, but I think Saturday Night editorially, personally, is doing a much better job with Mr. Fulford. If you mean because of our great strength and the result of what Time is and as part of this Time world-wide magazine, we are enjoining the magazines here in Canada and are a destructive force, I would say no. I wouldn't be sitting here if that were true.

Mr. Fortier: Well...

The Chairman: May I just ask a supplementary question. Is it your contention then, Mr. LaRue, that the magazine industry in Canada, setting Time aside, is in a healthy condition?

Mr. LaRue: I think it is in a growth position which is somewhat less than other media.

The Chairman: Now, can I ask you this?

Mr. LaRue: I don't think it is unhealthy.

The Chairman: Would you agree with the contention put to us by a number of Canadian magazine publishers that the Canadian magazine publishing industry would disappear if the exemption which you presently enjoy were removed? Most of them have said that if the exemption that Time enjoys were removed, we would be out of business. Now, if the industry is healthy, can that be true?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I think as a major part of the industry, actually we generate advertising. Other magazines generate advertising too, that goes into the others and if you look at the back covers of Chatelaine, and Maclean's and Time this week you will see Rothman's cigarettes advertised. I think in combination we add strength to one another. Time, at this point the largest generator advertising revenue among the magazines in Canada, perhaps has somewhat of a downward affect, but Chatelaine is comparable...

The Chairman: Well, let me ask you the specific question. Could the Canadian magazine industry survive without the Canadian edition of Time?

Mr. LaRue: I think so.

The Chairman: You disagree then with the other publishers of Canadian magazines?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

The Chairman: Why do you think they feel the way they do? That is perhaps a difficult question and it may be an unfair question.

Mr. LaRue: Well, it is hard to answer for them but to assume that one magazine, even though it is sizable in the advertising revenue that it generates, is the whole ball of wax and that because of Time the others exist is something that I really...

The Chairman: Well, just so that we can get this point down, you are suggesting that if the exemption which Time presently enjoys, and I am sure we will be talking about, were removed, you don't think it would matter to the balance of the Canadian magazine industry?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I think it would be affected, yes.

The Chairman: But they wouldn't disappear?

Mr. LaRue: I don't think it would be a terminal situation.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: One aspect of this unfair competition argument is the cost to Time (Canada) of 85 or 90 per cent of the magazine's editorial content. You are competing here in Canada with magazines that pay 100 cents on the dollar for their editorial content. In the O'Leary Report in 1961, page 98, Commissioner Johnson had this to say:

"The publications of which Reader's Digest is the outstanding example also (like Time) have an editorial advantage over Canadian publications in that their extraordinarily expensive material is available to all subsidiary publications at a fraction of their original cost."

Earlier, at page 39, it had been said that an estimate is that Time of Canada pays to its parent company less than 2 per cent of the actual cost of the editorial material thus coming to it. Now, first of all, do you agree with that estimate—was that a valid estimate back in 1961?

Mr. LaRue: I think it is low.

Mr. Fortier: You think it is low?

Mr. LaRue: You are talking about the editorial fee which we pay to our parent?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. LaRue: This is a contract we had between Time Incorporated and Time Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, the whole category.

Mr. LaRue: This is a fee arrived at with national revenue which they consider to be fair and reasonable. The fee could be higher, I suppose, but that would be a net loss to Canada because the fee would go to our parent in the United States.

Mr. Fortier: Do you negotiate this fee?

Mr. LaRue: Yes. It has been agreed upon.

Mr. Fortier: On a year-to-year basis?

Mr. LaRue: It is accepted by National Revenue, yes. However, there is another element to it. The editorial cost of Time (Canada) is not entirely, by any means, the fee that we pay to our parent for the privilege to reproduce material which has been created in the U.S. The Canadian editorial staff, some 30 people—and what we have tried to explain here in the brief—is a substantial sum added to the fee, and the percentage which you were referring to is not too much out of line with what Time magazine produced editorially in magazines all around the world.

What we do here in Canada, and what we pay for here in Canada in producing the Canada section every week, is an essential part of our editorial cost picture. The fee, probably is an arbitrary fee, if you want to look at it that way. It is arrived at with the Canadian Government.

Mr. Fortier: You say arbitrary though it may be it is not unreal?

Mr. LaRue: It is not related to circulation.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it is not based on pro rata circulation.

Mr. LaRue: No. It doesn't slide up and down. It is a fixed fee.

Mr. Fortier: How much higher would that fee be if it was rated on a pro rata circulation basis?

Mr. LaRue: I couldn't tell you exactly.

Mr. Fortier: Percentagewise?

Mr. LaRue: It could be double.

Mr. Fortier: Isn't it tantamount to a form of dumping from the point of view of your competing with Canadian magazines here in Canada?

Mr. LaRue: Well, it depends on your definition of dumping.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am not using it in the legal definition, but I am thinking of just the every day connotation of that word.

Mr. LaRue: All right. The purpose of dumping—this is just one hump of the camel. What you pay for the importation of this material and what we are charged in the form of a fee by our parent—the rest of it is what do you do with the product after you bring it in at this cost? The purpose of dumping, as I understand it with international trade, is to undersell a foreign market on the part of the competitors a product produced in a home market. We do not undersell our competitors. Our advertising rates are at least comparable to other Canadian publications. The price we charge our subscribers is comparable to what it is in the United States and higher than most Canadian annual subscription rates. Our news stand rate is also at a level.

Mr. Fortier: I grant you these points and I am glad you made them, but surely you will have to agree that where—let us take Saturday Night is paying full value for its editorial content—100 cents on the dollar as I said earlier—and you are offering at the same price—and with advertising offered at the same rates—you are offering a product which editorially is obtained by the Canadian subsidiary at less than the realistic figure, you are not competing fairly with Saturday Night. It seems to me this is evident.

Mr. LaRue: Well, I don't think you can restrict it entirely to that. In my point of view I think you have to take into consideration the total editorial cost of Time (Canada).

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever considered paying full price for the editorial content? I realize this would mean a loss in tax revenues...

Mr. LaRue: Well, why renegotiate it? I don't see the benefit, the advantage competitionwise in Canada which you expressed or...

Mr. Fortier: Well, Mr. LaRue, you say why do it?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Tell me, was this made one of the conditions for the exemption seven years ago?

Mr. LaRue: Not that I know of. One of the conditions seven years ago?

Mr. Fortier: In other words it is saying "We will exempt you from section 12A of the Income Tax Act—you and Reader's Digest—but let's make sure you pay a reasonable amount in taxes."

Mr. LaRue: Well, the only thing I know of that was in that tax law was that we were printing and publishing here before April of 1965 and the law, I believe, was passed in late June.

Mr. Fortier: You didn't participate in those discussions, did you?

Mr. LaRue: No, I was not here then.

Mr. Fortier: The fee paid to head office has increased substantially on the other hand since 1962?

Mr. LaRue: It is tied to circulation.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon?

Mr. LaRue: It is tied to circulation.

Mr. Fortier: That's right. Do you know as compared with the fee paid by other subsidiaries of Time—excuse me, Time International—what percentage of the revenues at head office are represented by the fee which your Canadian company pays to New York?

Mr. LaRue: It would be similar.

Mr. Fortier: Sorry?

Mr. LaRue: It would be similar.

Mr. Fortier: It would.

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Again in 1960 Mr. Henry Luce appearing before the O'Leary Commission had this to say about Time. I would like for you to comment on this.

"There was some trouble here about Canadianism. I may be in some disagreement with my colleagues. You said, sir, you wanted to be very plain. I do not consider Time a Canadian magazine.

THE CHAIRMAN: You don't consider it a Canadian Magazine?

MR. LUCE: I don't consider it a Canadian magazine."

Would you comment on that, please?

Mr. LaRue: Well, it is an American magazine produced in the United States basically with added Canadian content here. We are in the Canadian business community, we are in the Canadian journalistic community, and that is my answer. Time of Canada is part of Time world-wide and it is a wholly owned subsidiary of an American company. The editorial direction which we have tried to explain here and which was discussed perhaps we could expand upon—the overall editorial direction of Time rests with Henry Grunwald who is the editor-in-chief of Time magazine, while the Canada section editorial responsibility falls to Mr. John Scott. Time is a world-wide news magazine, based in the United States with editions around the world and one very unique edition among them all here in Canada. They produce, generate, and create special editorial material for the country. Does that answer your question, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Not completely. I think I will ask the same question of Mr. Scott.

The Chairman: Well, would you like to say anything more? He says it doesn't answer it completely.

Mr. Fortier: No, I received the business answer and now I would like the editorial answer.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to ask a direct question and it is this. Do you think Time is a Canadian magazine?

Mr. LaRue: It is an American magazine.

Mr. John M. Scott, Editor, Time International of Canada Ltd.: Well, I am not about to disagree with that because Mr. LaRue has just said it, but it seems to me that it would be a shame for us to go off the track. I think this possibly comes up because Senator O'Leary who was posing the questions to Mr. Luce, which you have just read, did say here the other day—he used the phrase "Canadian magazine" to describe us. Historically this was interesting because that was a rather climatic moment of the O'Leary hearings. I don't think the comment of the other day changes matters. We are not a Canadian magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Scott, what do you try to do in the Canadian pages from week to week mainly?

Mr. Scott: Well, we attempted to describe the process in the brief...

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Scott: The animus is to report what we consider to be the facts, the significant events of the week considering that there is the responsibility to interpret parts of the developing scenes, regionally divided and to report each part to the other. If you want the mechanics of how we do it, I think that is in the brief.

Mr. Fortier: Yes it is and I am certainly not going to question you on the mechanics aspect. I am interested in hearing you, however, on the degree of responsibility which you have over editorial matters which is covered in paragraphs 76 and 77 of your brief. You say in paragraph 77:

"What is published in the pages of the Canada section is as the result of his leadership..."

That is your leadership.

"...of Time Canada's writers, researchers and correspondents. He"—John Scott—derives his authority from, and is responsible to, the managing editor of Time."

What is the extent of this dependence on the managing editor of Time who sits in New York?

Mr. Scott: Well, I think I had better talk about it if I may for a minute or two.

Mr. Fortier: Fine.

Mr. Scott: The managing editor is ultimately responsible for everything that appears in the magazine. He is the boss; this is his charge and his authority. I don't want to sound like an uppity Canadian but for practical purposes the final editing of the Canadian material is done in Montreal by me with my staff. Now, that is to say that we are responsible for the selection of stories, their tone, and for what they say. Now, we rely on the staff in New York for as much highly professional assistance as we feel we need, and we attempt to co-ordinate what appears in the Canadian section with the material that appears in the rest of the magazine. We draw on the services which are available to us such as the maps department. We do not have a cartographer, for example, in Montreal. The map of the Northwest Territories that is in the brief was done with a great deal of back and forth words between us. We draw, of course, from the library in New York City.

As part of this co-ordinating process as the editorial week develops, we send our stories when we have them ready to one of the assistant managing editors in New York, who reads through our material as he is also reading the stories which are being prepared by the Environment section or Behaviour section or Press section. Occasionally, we have a little bit of jiving to do and cross-references to put in. We might be discussing the DDT situation in Canada and the Science section may have a fairly elaborate description of the process which we would then not need to duplicate in the Canadian pages.

We also receive those stories, and this is all being done under the tent of the managing editor's authority. In the end the responsibilities for attempting to be sure that the Canadian material that appears in the U.S. edition in the general run of the magazine is sensitive to the Canadian context and that is part of our function in Montreal.

Of course, the real function is to produce the Canadian section. As I say, for practical purposes that is our function. Does that help?

Mr. Fortier: Yes it does. Has it ever happened that you have had some stories killed, as they say in the trade, by the managing editor? Stories suggested by the Canadian bureau?

Mr. Scott: Well, I can remember...

Mr. Fortier: Not bureau but company.

Mr. Scott: Well, I can remember one occasion when we attempted to explain some of the theories of Marshall McLuhan and I think the managing editor of Time is one of the few people in the world who possibly does track McLuhan very well. He didn't like it so he suggested that perhaps this wasn't as well done as it should be. Have there been any interferences with regards to policy?

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is what I am trying to get at.

Mr. Scott: Well, I cannot recall in the eight years any instances of that.

Mr. Fortier: Would you also say, as Maclean's magazine said in their brief yesterday, that you, in so far as the Canadian section is concerned, are for and about Canada?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Or for and about North America?

Mr. Scott: Well, in the Canadian section we are for and about Canada. Obviously we are discussing in many instances North American situations and Canadian problems in the North American context. The CRTC opposed regulations on Canadian content, for example. And almost every week we are doing things from the Canadian point of view.

Mr. Fortier: Maybe this question should be directed to Mr. LaRue. In exchange for this privilege which you now enjoy with Reader's Digest in Canada, have you ever considered it a responsibility of Time (Canada) to convince the mother house that the American edition of Time should explain to its readers in the United States what Canada is all about. Have you tried to balance the privilege which you enjoy here with a certain responsibility that Time (International) could conceivably have in the States to explain Canada to its readers?

Mr. LaRue: I would like to redirect that if I may Mr. Fortier, to Mr. Scott. I think that is really his province.

Mr. Scott: Well, I think there are quite a few things I could say about that but I don't want this to appear unsympathetic. In terms in which you suggest as a return favour for a position which we have in Canada, we should introduce some other element than standards of what is newsworthy in deciding what we should have in the rest of the magazine—I would have to reject that. I would say that the stories about Canada, that we carry in the United States edition in the general run of the magazine, must be judged on their intrinsic merit as stories. On the other hand, because we are here and because on a regular basis we have more correspondents in Canada than in any other country of the world outside of the United States, I think as a natural by-product of this, there are more suggestions and stories to the general run of the magazine which come from Canada and more of these stories, therefore, get into the magazine.

Mr. Fortier: As editor, you don't consider it one of your functions to try and get some more Canadian content into the U.S. edition?

Mr. Scott: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fortier: You do?

Mr. Scott: Sure.

Mr. Fortier: Is this concern of yours acknowledged in New York?

Mr. Scott: Well, I would have to say...

Mr. Fortier: As a valid one?

Mr. Scott: Oh, entirely. This is one clear aspect of the job. You must understand that our Montreal editorial operation stands in relation to New York in a slightly different way than do the news bureaux. The Montreal editorial operation is the only one of its kind in the world.

Mr. Fortier: Right.

Mr. Scott: The London bureau, the Paris bureau, and all of these bureaux are competing every week very vigorously for a space that is available in the magazine. Our Canadian correspondents—six of them are doing that at the same time and we sort of add an extra level of push just because they are doing it.

Mr. Fortier: It is because of the uniqueness of your position that I ask the question.

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: It would seem to me that it would be a natural for the U.S. edition to use material which doesn't emanate from a bureau but rather from a subsidiary which has at its disposal all of this very good staff which you refer to in your brief.

Mr. Scott: I think that process happens too.

The Chairman: Mr. LaRue, to move back to Mr. Fortier's question, you agree I am sure with the things that Mr. Scott has said but do you attempt in the same way to persuade Time Incorporated to carry more news of Canada?

Mr. LaRue: It really isn't my role but I am sympathetic, certainly, to my partner's view.

The Chairman: Why isn't it your role? You are the chief executive officer?

Mr. LaRue: As we tried to explain in the descriptions of the two jobs we have—we operate as partners and in charge of the full responsibility for the editorial stance in Canada and for the editorial operations and its people, is Mr. John Scott.

The Chairman: Yes, but I am talking about the editorial stance of Time throughout the world. That surely is of concern to you as chief executive officer here?

Mr. LaRue: It is.

The Chairman: Well, wouldn't you be interested in seeing more Canadian coverage in the other editions of Time?

Mr. LaRue: I do what I can in conversations with my colleagues in New York to encourage it just as John Scott does.

Mr. Scott: If I may say so in the first instance you were giving a formal answer that we do attempt to keep the functions separate, and I think this formality was on your mind. Perhaps it is easier for me to say it than for you, but I do know that at various times we have promoted this. We were all particularly interested in this and excited about this during the centennial year when we had all of this at our doorstep. I think you see a reflection of that in the part of the brief that is a reprint of the stories we had during that year and I can see that, in the sense in which the Senator was asking you about that, that you weren't playing a very effective role.

Mr. LaRue: Well, in my discussions with my colleagues at headquarters in New York or any place else in the world where I encountered them and they encountered me, I talked about Canada and the importance of Canada and what is exciting about it.

Mr. Fortier: Not just as a market but also as a country which should be explained to your other readers?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, the market, what it is, its effectiveness, its grasp with the readers here in Canada and everywhere else.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier made the point a moment ago that the Canadian edition of Time is the only one to carry extra editorial material. Why is that? Why don't other editions of Time carry extra editorial material?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I think at this point and over the last nine years Canada has been one of the largest countries in which we circulated outside of the United States and you had the ability economically and professionally to do it. Whether we could or should do it in other countries is another question.

The Chairman: Just to put this in perspective, what is the weekly circulation of Time in the United States?

Mr. LaRue: Four million three hundred thousand.

The Chairman: And the Canadian edition?

Mr. LaRue: Four hundred and sixty thousand.

The Chairman: And what is the third biggest edition?

Mr. LaRue: Well, Time (Atlantic) which of course covers many countries—I have the figures here.

The Chairman: Well, I think we would be interested.

Mr. LaRue: The Time (Atlantic) circulation is approximately 310,000.

The Chairman: And that is the third biggest?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, and that covers United Kingdom, Europe, Africa and the Middle East.

The Chairman: And it is an English language edition?

Mr. LaRue: Yes. It is the same everywhere in the world.

The Chairman: That 310,000 is certainly a bigger circulation than you used to have in Canada—have you ever considered adding extra editorial material?

Mr. LaRue: Not for the entire spectrum. You are covering how many different language areas?

The Chairman: Yes, but presumably the people who buy Time read English.

Mr. LaRue: Yes they do. It is a professional question which is difficult to answer because you are covering so many different areas in one very large part of the world. It is not as uniform, if you will, to report on and through the World section of Time, and through other sections of Time, we feel, at least at this point, that we are adequately covering news from that area. If you look at the World section, you will see that it is broken down by country.

The Chairman: So you believe without the Canadian section of Time and Time would not be covering adequately the rest of Canada?

Mr. LaRue: That's right, for Canadians.

The Chairman: But for the Atlantic region, the World section is adequate?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

The Chairman: Are there other advertisers who use the Atlantic issue and can you buy advertising in the Atlantic region?

Mr. LaRue: Oh yes.

The Chairman: Is that advertising regional advertising? In other words, are there United Kingdom advertisers?

Mr. LaRue: Yes. Advertising from within the area.

The Chairman: National advertisers?

Mr. LaRue: Yes. The highest percentage of national advertising comes from within the area.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, might I ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Smith.

Senator Smith: Going back to just a few minutes ago to this subject of Canadian content in Time and so on—why do you publish four pages of Canadian content?

Mr. LaRue: Why do we?

Senator Smith: Yes.

Mr. LaRue: We feel it is an important service to the readers in Canada. We feel it is important for them to receive news about Canada.

Senator Smith: You don't believe that that is an attempt to convince yourselves that this is not an American magazine but a Canadian magazine?

Mr. LaRue: No.

Senator Smith: Can the readers of Time in Canada look forward to the day when the coverage of the Canadian scene can be upped to eight pages to equal the coverage of the American scene? I just skimmed through the pages of this latest edition and I noticed that the Canadian content is four pages and the U.S. is eight.

Mr. LaRue: Well, I think we can look to further growth, expansion of the section. But, it has already happened—we run six pages in Time and are doing more and more in the way of special Canadian cover stories.

Senator Smith: Is there any reason why...

The Chairman: Excuse me, Senator, but before you go on I think perhaps we should—I know there are senators with questions and before you begin your line of questioning...

Senator Smith: Well, this isn't a line—it was just a supplementary question.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to get back to Mr. Fortier, but please carry on.

Senator Smith: If I may be excused to carry on just for a moment.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Smith: I would also like to refer to the Canadian content of the letters to the editor section. In this edition we have before us here there are 12 letters of American source and two of Canadian origin. Why don't we have more letters to the editor published in this particular edition of Time?

The Chairman: Mr. Scott, I think that one is for you.

Mr. Scott: I did think, Senator, that there were three, but I suppose that is beside the point.

Senator Smith: Well, I may have missed one.

Mr. Scott: We are glad to have them but I would have to say that the comment that comes in the Canadian mail is not overwhelming. There is, for reasons which I find difficult to pin down, not a letter to the editor tradition in this country generally. The Toronto Globe and Mail has an outstanding letters to the editor column, but I find, and I hope this is fair, that as I read the papers generally, there is not the kind of comment—perhaps some of the people who should be writing letters to the editor are not. I am thinking more in terms from the academic community, and so on.

We attempt in the letters column to have a reasonable balance of interesting comment on the Canadian stories and on Canadian points of view, and the subjects discussed throughout the magazine whether it is on environment stories, new books, Biafra, and so forth. Now, the Canadian letters go into competition with the letters we receive from elsewhere because we are interested in the letters section reflecting the opinion of our readers. Naturally one does tend to favour the substantial comment that is made. We do receive 65,000 letters a year overall, so that is quite a response in competition for, I think you said, 12 letters in this one issue. Our bias is in favour of getting more Canadian comment in the magazine.

One other problem which is a real one is that the letters should be topical and the mail being what it is arrives awfully late.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Senator Smith: Well, I would challenge that last part of your statement but I will accept all the rest. I receive good communications in the mail from Nova Scotia at any rate.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Scott, I don't want to belabour the point but I would like to come back to the unique position to which Time (Canada) has in the world-wide operation of all editions being the only one that carries extra editorial material. What I attempted to suggest to you and you answered it is that you should attempt to pressure—I use the word purposely—to pressure the U.S. into reporting more news about Canada. The U.S. edition of Time was studied during a period of three months when our researchers started their work. They had a look at the 13 issues in July, August and September, but in those 13 issues the U.S. edition was found to carry not one item of Canadian news; and I say to you should there not be some reciprocity—should you not insist as a matter of fact, that your role include not only to put together four, six, or eight pages in the Canadian edition, but also to put in the American edition some material about Canada on a regular basis?

Mr. Scott: Well, I agree with your general point. I agree that there is something wrong with the study but in fairness I should say that this question is not unexpected. It is very difficult in fact to go to what Senator O'Leary delightfully called "an entertainment in the late afternoon" and not be asked, so I did look through the issues of last year to refresh my memory and...

Mr. Fortier: Are you going to make me eat my words?

Mr. Scott: Well, I do have some here, but I must admit that July and August tend to be rather foul months.

Mr. Fortier: No fires!

Mr. Scott: No fires. I counted up 17 stories during that period.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I am sorry, but are you saying that during those three months that there were 17 stories?

Mr. Scott: Well, there were 17 items certainly of Canadian news and interest and out of that 10 rather substantial stories. We had during that period, of course, President Nixon coming to Canada along with Prime Minister Trudeau commemorating the tenth anniversary of the St. Lawrence Seaway and that was in the Nation section in the general run—not as an elaborate story...

Mr. Fortier: Not in news about Canada but in the U.S. domestic news section?

Mr. Scott: Yes, in the U.S. domestic news section.

Senator Prowse: Is that the one where President Nixon invited Prime Minister Trudeau's wife to come back with him?

Mr. Scott: Yes, that was the one but I think it was Mr. Rockefeller.

Senator Prowse: Yes, Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. Scott: That was during the period of the Manhattan's voyage and we had three rather substantial stories on that which we reported in the United States edition in the general run of the magazine and the Canadian parliamentary concern on the sovereignty and the concern for pollution potential, and so forth.

Mr. Fortier: As much as you would get in this week's, and I haven't read it yet, in the U.S. section news about, say, what Mr. Nixon or what Vice President Agnew may have said about Mexico as I read here. The point I am trying to make is that those stories that you are referring to, those comments in the American edition of Time magazine are not in a separate Canadian section.

Mr. Scott: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: They are not?

Mr. Scott: I think this is the point—that a great many of the Canadian stories that appear in the U.S. edition, in the general run of the magazine are missed by these people that I run into at cocktail parties because they do not have on them a large Canada label. They tend to appear in the appropriate section.

One other story that I recall in the period that you mentioned was in the then new Environment section. We had a long piece anointing five college professors as the new Jeremiahs and talked about these men and their ideas and about the troubles we were in and one of those was Professor Crawford, S. Holling at the University of British Columbia who was the head of interdepartmental studies of land and water use there. Now, this didn't have any big Canada label over it but it discussed his ideas from the west coast of Canada on what troubles we were in.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you have made the point and I grant you you made it very effectively.

The Chairman: May I just ask one question on this point. You refer in the brief to the Press section of Time saying that this was first attempts by a publication to do anything of that type. Can you recall the last time that the Press section of Time wrote about a Canadian publication?

Mr. Scott: Well, I can think of several stories but the last one would be—I am sorry, I can't offhand.

The Chairman: But surely it hasn't been recently?

Mr. Scott: It hasn't been recently or I would have remembered it.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: In putting together these stories do your American brethren call on Canadian staff—the stories that are published in the American edition?

Mr. Scott: Yes, they call upon our entire editorial apparatus, not only on correspondents but on researchers in Montreal. The traffic by telephone and our Telex links in our bureaus in Calgary, Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal with New York is constantly going back and forth with queries on stories as parts are developed.

Mr. LaRue: May I, Mr. Fortier, also say that the other magazines in Time Incorporated, Sports Illustrated and Fortune and Life call on our services from time to time, or the Canadian offices of the Time news services.

Mr. Fortier: That is part of the overhead which is borne by Time (Canada).

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Sports Illustrated, Life magazine and Fortune?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, and if they want to do a story on the Toronto Maple Leafs where are they going to get it?

The Chairman: Why would they want it?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, they are in last position.

Mr. LaRue: But this is a dialogue between the bureau in this regard and Fortune I thought did a magnificent two part piece on the Bronfman a few years ago. Life of course, in their Expo coverage sent a lot of staff members up here.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever considered having some of your Canadian editorial content written in the French language?

Mr. LaRue: We have tried that. We experimented with it in France—not here in Canada, but so far we have not found a means by which we could write in the second language without duplicating to a considerable degree the editorial staff we have writing in English. Time, the kind of magazine it is, ideomatically cannot be translated and be effective in the second language.

Mr. Scott: Well, I think it has to be really re-edited but we did run letters to the editor in French on one occasion.

Mr. Fortier: I missed that.

Mr. Scott: Well, I am afraid it was only once so you are quite entitled to have missed it.

Mr. Fortier: You have regional editions now in Canada—would you carry French advertising?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Well, as a matter of fact I recall the St. Jean Royal Military College was it not with a column in English and a column in French?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: But have you had requests in Montreal for advertising in French?

Mr. Scott: Very few.

Mr. Fortier: But you have had some?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And you have run a few?

Mr. Scott: Yes, but I can't remember the other ones.

Mr. Fortier: What percentage of your readers in the Province of Quebec are French? I ask the question because we have Actualité and Sept Jours this afternoon and I assume they will talk about Time magazine.

Mr. Scott: A subscribers' survey of two years ago—we asked this question and the question was asked "What is the first language spoken in your home" and the answer came back that I think 22 per cent of the readers of Time in Quebec considered French as their main language.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I believe we have that figure.

Mr. LaRue: Eighty thousand is our circulation and our readers would be more than that. We were asking the individual subscribers and so we have a fair proportion of our circulation in Quebec among people who are bilingual but who consider French their first language. Our circulation in Quebec is predominantly in Montreal, metropolitan Montreal and Quebec City.

Mr. Fortier: In putting together the Canadian pages, Mr. Scott, is your main goal to reflect the image of present-day Canada for your readers or to attempt to lead in a way public opinion?

Mr. Scott: Well, I think it flows from the character of the magazine that we do lead public opinion by writing of taste and contributing to, not only through information, but by other means, and I would have to say yes we do.

Mr. Fortier: Would you say that you are doing a certain job in trend-spotting?

Mr. Scott: Yes sir. I feel—and I suppose this sounds presumptuous and I don't mean it to be, but as an example I think that beginning with Prime Minister Pearson's speech in Quebec City that led to the setting up of the B and B Commission, and the Confederation for Tomorrow Conference in Toronto on which we did a cover, and the several reports of the B and B Commission leading up to the Official Languages Act, I think that all that we wrote during that time must have in a way helped to prepare a climate of opinion across the country that ultimately was not only accepted but welcomed.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. LaRue, you have lived in New York, in Japan and now in Toronto.

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What do you think of Toronto newspapers as compared with New York and Japanese ones?

Mr. LaRue: Well, the Japanese ones you can cross off right now because I can't read them. As you know the largest newspaper in the world is in Japan which is Asahi.

Mr. Fortier: Well, what do you think of the Toronto papers?

Mr. LaRue: First of all, I think Toronto is a unique city in North America as far as newspapers are concerned. You have three very healthy newspapers and three different newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: You don't even have that in New York?

Mr. LaRue: No longer, unfortunately.

Mr. Fortier: How is that possible in a city like Toronto?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I have wondered sometimes myself. I think the three newspapers are so very different in Toronto, in character, that they each have been able to over the years cut out of the population of Toronto their own group of readers. I find in reading all three papers that you get three fairly different points of view. With the Globe and Mail you get a world viewpoint—much of the New York Times attitude and much of the New York Times in it. The Telegram is very much locally oriented in its reporting and the Star I find to be very interesting and certainly very successful paper.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel any significant competition from the trend of newspapers towards reports in depth. In fact, I think last night Mr. Ken Lefollii said that newspapers are becoming more and more like magazines.

Mr. LaRue: Yes. Particularly in their Saturday editions.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. Do you feel that at Time?

Mr. LaRue: As far as advertising is concerned?

Mr. Fortier: As far as advertising is concerned and competition for readers—for the readers' time.

Mr. LaRue: Well, I think there is so much coming at us from so many directions these days that the greater in-depth reporting by newspapers and particularly, as you say the Toronto newspapers is a very good thing and is complementary, if you will, to what we do and what is done on television. We have to get away and sort out all of these things that we are hearing about from so many different places, I would say it is complementary to what we do. Time's circulation in Toronto, as a matter of fact, is the highest of any circulation we have in any city in Canada, and perhaps it is the best served by the daily press. I can only say from that that I assume we work pretty well together and that probably there is very little duplication in readership.

The Chairman: Well, it really isn't surprising is it that Time—given the fact that Time is an English language magazine and the population of Montreal is 80 per cent French there is no other city in Canada which is half the size of Toronto in terms of potential English readers?

Mr. LaRue: Well, that is true but we believe our circulation is strong in Toronto.

Mr. Fortier: Well, this change in newspaper journalism which has affected the magazine industry in North America, what has it done to Time magazine aside from many changes at head office? What has Time attempted to do to meet this change in newspaper journalism?

Mr. LaRue: I don't know if Time has acted directly to this change in newspaper journalism because I think this change has been coming on for many years. It is not just now in the last two or three years. The acceptance, for example, that we read about and hear about—the subjectivity of reporters as opposed to what we call objectivity has been coming on for a long, long time. I think rather that Time reacts to what it feels its population of readers needs and wants, and as Mr. Scott said earlier, we hope to lead in some way and anticipate the desires, within the context of what Time has, of those readers. I don't think we are reacting directly to what the newspapers are now doing, which perhaps they didn't do many years ago.

Mr. Fortier: Which is your main competitor in Canada? Which do you consider....

Mr. LaRue: For advertising dollars it would be television.

Mr. Fortier: For advertising dollars it would be television and for readers' time—small "t"?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: For readers' time which is your main competitor? The time of the readers?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I have never really thought of it.

Mr. Fortier: You haven't?

Mr. LaRue: That way, no.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. LaRue, you never considered that Time (Canada) had a competitor for readers time?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I think what really Time does is compete with all media in terms of fulfilling a need of an individual and I don't think it is frankly newspapers any more than it is television, or books, or radio. The Time reader tends to read more of everything. He reads more books than a non-magazine reader, if you will, perhaps a non-Time reader, if you will.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it sounds like a Playboy advertisement.

Mr. LaRue: Well, I am not trying to sound....

Mr. Fortier: You know, Playboy readers read Playboy because....

Mr. LaRue: The competition for time with a small "t" comes from all areas because of the proliferation in the media.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I know what you would do if you were in an airport and ready to board a plane and you had Time magazine on the newsstand and other magazines but what do you think the average Canadian would do—if there is such a thing—at Malton airport when he is going on a flight and there is Time magazine and newspapers and other Canadian magazines? Where is the competition?

Mr. LaRue: Well, of course, you are given a newspaper on the airplane so there is competition there, but how long does it take you to read a newspaper? Perhaps a half an hour. I would hope that on a Tuesday evening at Malton or Dorval he would pick up Time magazine to see what we have to say that week.

Mr. Fortier: Well, if he only has 50 cents to spend.

Mr. LaRue: If he only has 50 cents to spend?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, exactly, if he only has 50 cents to spend. Which magazine is he most likely to purchase?

Mr. Scott: Well, he will have a lot of trouble at the other end when he arrives!

Mr. LaRue: Well, what research we have in this area tells me that Time is the most popular magazine on newsstands in airports in North America.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I can see that you are right, that you haven't applied your mind to it as to whether you had any competitor in Canada...

Mr. LaRue: Any individual competitor you said and I think that looking at the broad spectrum and when you go into the airport and when you see a couple of hundred magazines you must choose and if you are there on Tuesday when Time comes out, Time's sales would be higher that day in comparison to others and perhaps on a Thursday or Friday.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you are very consistent, of course, which I certainly expect you to be, because in your brief you say there are no other news publications distributed nationally, with weekly frequency, reporting the significant events of the week within Canada. That is really your answer is it not?

Mr. LaRue: Yes sir.

Mr. Fortier: What about the Financial Post?

Mr. LaRue: Their circulation is a third of ours.

Mr. Fortier: Doesn't it report on the significant events of the week within Canada?

Mr. LaRue: Within the business area yes, but I look at the Financial Post more as a vertical publication and Time as a general publication. When we say in our brief that Time is unique in Canada in that it is the only general news publication weekly going across Canada and hopefully being seen at the same time in Vancouver as it is in St. John's...

The Chairman: Well, what about Newsweek?

Mr. LaRue: Newsweek's circulation in Canada is about...

The Chairman: However, does it not fill the requirements?

Mr. LaRue: It does not have the Canada section as we do.

The Chairman: Well, aside from the Canada section, it does.

Mr. LaRue: Well, its privilege is very similar.

The Chairman: Do you think it would be in the national Canadian interest to go to the Newsweek people and say "Look, why don't you add a Canadian section and give Time some competition?"

Mr. LaRue: I welcome the competition.

The Chairman: Well, would you like to see that happen?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I don't know how it could happen.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. LaRue: Well, let us face it...

Mr. Fortier: You don't think you have as much influence in Washington as Mr. Luce did?

Mr. LaRue: Mr. Luce has been said to have.

The Chairman: Well, we will talk about that later, but let me just put this question to you. I certainly do not think it is impossible to make changes in the legislation to allow Newsweek in to share the privilege that you have, so do you think that would be in the national interest?

Mr. LaRue: I think it would be in the Canadian national interest, to be very frank, if a Canadian publisher could create a Canadian news magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Is that possible?

Mr. LaRue: It would take a lot of money. It is possible.

Mr. Fortier: You think it is.

Mr. LaRue: Yes, I think it is possible.

The Chairman: Well, let us take Newsweek, for example. They do have the resources and they are there, they are publishing in the United States and they are competition for you in the United States and very tough competition which I am sure you will agree...

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

The Chairman: Wouldn't Canadians benefit if this tough competition was extended north of the border?

Mr. LaRue: If they had a Canadian section like Time I think they would.

The Chairman: Do you think that would be a good thing?

Mr. LaRue: I think the Canadians would benefit if there would be Canadian content in a weekly news magazine in Canada.

The Chairman: Well, let's take Newsweek, it is the only one that is there.

Mr. LaRue: I suppose they could do it. I think we have to look at the realism of publishing such a magazine in Canada and let's talk about that for a moment.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. LaRue: Newsweek would have to take a circulation which I believe is around 55,000 and build it into something over 200,000 I would imagine rather quickly in order to compete. This would take an enormous amount of money to do and we have been doing what we do for 27 years here and as a result built up our circulation.

The Chairman: Well, if I may ask a very hypothetical question and I realize it is hypothetical but if this happened, if Newsweek had this opportunity do you think that they would accept it notwithstanding the costs?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I imagine they thought about it a while ago.

The Chairman: I am sure they did.

Mr. LaRue: I would think that they would look at our position in Canada and wonder if they were permitted to publish here if they could attain a position here comparable to the one they have in the United States. Now, whether they would or not, I just don't know.

The Chairman: I am going to suggest, senators and gentlemen, that we give our reporter a five minute break. We will reconvene at 11.35 in five minutes.

—A short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call the session back to order.

Mr. LaRue, I wonder if I might ask you about paragraph 27 in your brief. It says:

"A restrictive U.S. copyright law prevents the printing of the U.S. edition of the magazine in Canada for distribution in the United States. If this restriction can be removed, we look forward to exploring the possibility of Vancouver production of the magazine for export to the U.S.'s Pacific Northwest."

What pressure has Time (Canada) though Time Incorporated brought to bear on the United States government to remove the restrictions?

Mr. LaRue: We have a lawyer working for us by the name of Gabriel Perle who has just been made head of the copyright section of the American Bar Association and he for the last ten years has been dealing with this and other questions with our government. He feels, and we feel, that this is an example, if you will, of economic imperialism and we don't like it. We are in touch with the United States government on this matter—we would like to see the manufacturing clause and the copyright law repealed so that Canadian printers could participate and compete in the American printing market. I am going to Washington, as a matter of fact, in two weeks and I hope to explore this myself.

The Chairman: Is this a matter you hope to raise?

Mr. LaRue: It is one of the reasons I am going there. There are a lot of technical problems that have to be worked out before we could print Time in our new printing location in Vancouver for the northwest portion of our circulation. Historically, the northwest of the United States has been a poor delivery pocket and Time and other magazines as well, have had a problem in getting their copies there as fast as they would like to. There are no printing facilities with the quality or size that we have in the east, and Time and even perhaps Sports Illustrated, speaking of our own company, if we were in the west, would of course speed up deliveries and cut costs.

We were talking earlier on Mr. Fortier's question on what do I do when I talk to people at Time Incorporated to encourage and convince them that we should do more about Canada, not only perhaps editorially but in a business sense, and this is one example of what I talk about when I do see my colleagues in the United States.

The Chairman: Well, I want to—oh, I am sorry you weren't finished.

Mr. LaRue: Well, I don't want to go on at length on this, but this is a very important point and one on which I feel very strongly, and I want to do more in Canada that makes good business sense, for ourselves as well as for the country which we have the privilege of publishing in.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you a few questions about the reputed power that Time has had with various United States governments. I am sure that you are familiar with an article that appeared in Harper's by Richard Pollak called "Time After Luce" and I believe Mr. Fortier was quoting the article earlier this morning. There are a couple of things I would like you to comment on. "Luce regarded a Time correspondent in the foreign country to which he was posted as the American second only to the U.S. Ambassador.

In return for this presumption, thousands of readers abroad accept the magazine as a quasi-official spokesman for the United States government, a polished, flawless window on America. Statesmen treat the magazine with such deference that Time Inc. can make the leaders of eight Asian nations jump simply for the amusement of its advertisers."

Now, without quoting him any further do you think that Time has this kind of leverage?

Mr. LaRue: I think that is grossly overstated. I think—well, living in Japan I didn't see too many people jump any time I walked in the door. We have established a certain degree of respect among our contacts in foreign countries both in the business side and on the editorial side. It is our job to know people in high places for sources but as far as Time being an arm of the U.S. State Department—and that has been stated many times, and I don't necessarily accept it as being true. I don't think it is.

The Chairman: Well, just let me read you another quote. This is a speech made by Mr. Walter Gordon in May of 1969 and if I may quote his speech he was referring to the ultimate legislation which came out of the O'Leary Report. He says, and I am quoting Mr. Gordon:

"The United States State Department went into action. Its representatives urged on behalf of the whole United States administration that nothing should be done which in any way would upset or annoy the late Mr. Henry Luce who was the proprietor of Time. It was submitted that Mr. Luce had great power in the United States through his magazines, Time, Life, and Fortune. That, if he were irritated, the results could be most damaging to both Canada and the United States administration."

Could you throw any light on that comment by Mr. Gordon who was our Minister of Finance at the time of the legislation?

Mr. LaRue: He said also in his book "A Choice for Canada" that had Time not been exempted from that legislation that it might affect the auto tax.

The Chairman: Right.

Mr. LaRue: This also intimates that Mr. Luce and Time had an unusual degree of influence with the United States government vis-à-vis Canada. I came to Canada in the summer of 1965. The legislation was passed and after the debate about it was completed, I could say that I thought the people in our company—I can say fairly positively that I know of no instance in which Mr. Luce made any representations to the President of the United States or the Secretary of State in this regard.

The Chairman: Well, did the State Department make representations on behalf of Time to the Government of Canada?

Mr. LaRue: I don't know for a fact that they did.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Gordon says they did?

Mr. LaRue: I know Mr. Gordon says they did.

The Chairman: He was the Minister of Finance at the time.

Mr. LaRue: I don't know for a fact that they did. I can understand perhaps that in their role in representing Americans abroad—in this case in Canada—they may have said to the Canadian government that they felt that if Time was to be expelled from Canada that this would be a discriminatory act and that they would be looked upon in disfavor.

The Chairman: I appreciate, Mr. LaRue, that you weren't here at the time but Mr. Scott you were. Would you care to comment on this?

Mr. Scott: Well, I don't really. Of course, I have read what Mr. Gordon has written, what Miss LaMarsh has written and what Peter Newman has written, and I have come across no information at the time or since, by independent sources which would tend to confirm their accounts which do leave in an uncertain state, in many cases, just what who said to whom and when. I would expect, really, to track down further information, that more of the participants at the time would have to be asked directly. It was not the kind of thing that at the time was widely discussed and reported in the newspapers or chattered about in the press gallery, so far as I am aware. It is the kind of thing that does surface later when one does get to the memoir stage or writing recent history. So I am afraid I cannot be helpful on it.

The Chairman: Have you or the Time staff attempted to ascertain whether or not this is a valid contention? Would this not be a valid news story? It certainly received extensive news coverage in the newspapers at the time when Mr. Gordon made the speech.

Mr. Scott: Yes, it did.

The Chairman: Did you not attempt to pursue the thing?

Mr. Scott: No, I didn't because it seemed to me that it would involve a massive amount of time and effort on the part of the correspondents who were already very busy and with what guarantee of success, I don't know. I think it was up to the participants at the time, and not particularly a story I should do.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Gordon was one of the participants at the time and you say he is not very specific, I think he is very specific. He said:

"Its representatives urged on behalf of the whole United States administration that nothing should be done which in any way would upset or annoy the late Mr. Henry Luce.. "

I think that is very specific.

Mr. Scott: I agree that that is specific, senator, but the other accounts when one matches them with this leads me to think...

The Chairman: Well, you made the point quite properly that this is referred to in Mr. Newman's book, Mr. Gordon's book and Miss LaMarsh's book—I don't recall it there but I am sure it was. But surely this quote coming as recently as last May several years after the books were written, with the exception of Miss LaMarsh's book, does shed some interesting and new light.

Mr. Scott: Yes.

The Chairman: I don't want, Mr. LaRue, to spin the thing out endlessly, but then to your knowledge the liaison between Time Incorporated and the State Department is not sufficiently close that this kind of leverage could have been brought to bear?

Mr. LaRue: I don't know that it was.

The Chairman: Could you imagine it happening?

Mr. LaRue: I can imagine that we would say to government officials that we felt that we were being treated unfairly and that it was their role to help us present our case, but whether Mr. Luce himself brought pressure to bear, I would doubt. I don't think he did. I don't know, he is no longer with us. Mr. Edward Baker who was then the managing director of Time-Life International is no longer with us, so I can't ask him, and these were two key executives with Time Incorporated who worked and lived through this period. I just don't know.

The Chairman: Well, before I leave this article by Mr. Pollak in Harper's on Time which I found to be a very amusing and perhaps biased, I don't know, but there is one other interesting point. He does a take-off on a Time section on Behaviour and this is where he talks about the—if I may just quote part of it.

"On February 21, 1969, a Pan American Boeing 707 chartered by Time Inc. and comfortably configured for sixty-two first-class seats and a bedroom compartment took off from San Francisco carrying—along with it Scotch, bourbon, gin, vodka, beer, wine, champagne, Cointreau, Drambuie, Benedictine, crème de menthe, cognac, and the company doctor—twenty-five U.S. businessmen. Their abiding interest in foreign affairs had won invitations to join Time's fourth News Tour since 1963, this one a sixteen-day sprint through eight Asian nations during which it had been arranged by the Time-Life News Service that the leaders of all eight would appear on cue to answer questions. Most of the Time Inc. hierarchy went along for the ride including Hedley Donovan, Andrew Heiskell, and James A.

Linen, the corporation's governing group; Henry Grunwald, the new managing editor of Time; and James R. Shepley, the magazine's publisher and official tour host, who explained in a press release that the two dozen guests were traveling at their own expense (everything, that is, but the plane fare) "as responsible, concerned American citizens rather than as representatives of their business enterprises," and John A. Meyers, Time's advertising sales director, who apparently had not gotten around to reading the release and he observed, with a grin that almost all the guests were Time advertisers with annual budgets in the magazine ranging from $200,000 to $2 million."

And then it goes on to describe where these people went, the nations they visited and how they met the leaders of these various nations, and then it concludes by saying:

"From Tokyo, the now exhausted travelers flew back to San Francisco, and then on the New York. After two days of recuperation, they reassembled in the Cabinet room of The White House with President Nixon for an hour-long session of show-and-tell."

I am not making any comments on this, but do you do anything comparable for leaders of the Canadian business industry?

Mr. LaRue: We have thought of it. It is possible that we will in the future. These tours, I believe there have been four of them now—two to Asia, one to Russia and the satellite countries, and another one to the common market countries. I would like to see us do something here together with the Canadian business community. I would like to see it but at the appropriate time. It is possible to bring U.S. businessmen to Canada, but it would take a lot of time and effort and staff to do it.

The Chairman: But you have considered this in Canada and have decided that it might be possible in the future?

Mr. LaRue: We have no news tours planned at this time of any kind. That Asian news tour was the last one.

The Chairman: Is the author being cynical when he relates one's ability to be selected for this tour with the amount of advertising he places in Time?

Mr. LaRue: The largest corporations in the United States advertise in Time from time to time. So, there is every reason to think that the President of General Motors and the President of Allied Chemicals, and the top executives of the major American corporations would be invited and they would also be advertisers. We don't lose sight of the fact, of course, that they are important businessmen.

The Chairman: Of course, I quite understand that. That tour ended with a reception at the White House, so do you suppose that Prime Minister Trudeau would give a reception at the end of a Canadian tour?

Mr. LaRue: I would hope so. That would be an essential part of the tour. This of course could happen if we were to do it, but I really don't know.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Your corporate setup in Canada is a Canadian corporation which is a wholly owned subsidiary?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Have you given any thought to making shares of that corporation available to the general public in Canada?

Mr. LaRue: Yes sir, we have. We have decided at this point not to do it for several reasons.

Senator Prowse: Would you elaborate on them?

Mr. LaRue: Certainly, sir. First of all the parent corporation is a public corporation and the shares of stock are on sale on the New York Stock Exchange every day and are freely traded in North America and everywhere else in the world. They are on the New York list and in all major Canadian newspapers. To sell a relatively small part of a public corporation in a market synonymous with the headquarters of that operation creates some pricing difficulties. How do you value what Time International of Canada is in relationship to its parent or how would you construct the value and thus the price here in Canada as it relates to the U.S. corporation? If we were to sell shares in Time International of Canada Limited at the offering exclusively to Canadians we would somehow have to relate the value of one part of Time Incorporated to the whole. Other questions come up. What would happen if once the original offering was made and three, four, five, ten thousand Canadians invested in Time Canada—with further trading by that group, or do you go along the same way. There is nothing for example to prevent the movement of stock ownership by an individual in Chicago who may own Time Incorporated stock to Time Canada stock if he thinks he is going to receive a more favourable return. We are not quite as free as an independent company and in the interest of Canada and good citizenship, and having Canadians participate in whatever benefits there are to the growth of our business, if we were to sell stock where would the money go? You would have a drain, to a small extent, but nevertheless a drain, on the foreign exchange in Canada because the parent company would develop so capital would move out of Canada to the United States.

From a purely business standpoint—if you look at it from a purely business standpoint, what is the purpose of a public offering? It is to create capital by a company in order to expand. The question I can't answer at this point, or haven't been able to since I have been here, is what do I do with that money? If we keep it here in Canada where does it go? Not another magazine, not a radio or television station, or not a newspaper. What do I do with it? Where is the productivity here in the long term as a result of selling shares?

Senator Prowse: Well, what is the advantage then of having a separate corporation here at all?

Mr. LaRue: Well, technically, I guess there really isn't. There is no tax advantage for example.

Senator Prowse: So your bookkeeping is really artificially designed to satisfy a bookkeeper somewhere, that is all isn't it?

Mr. LaRue: Well, with the corporation here, Time International of Canada Limited—all the moneys that flow into Time Canada from wherever in the world, the advertising that is sold outside of Canada, for example, and the money that flows in here, we pay taxes on it. The technical advantage is limited as far as I can see and legal counsel could probably give you a much more detailed answer to that, Senator, than I could.

Senator Prowse: The thing I had in mind is that I believe that the Reader's Digest have about 30 per cent of their stock outstanding and Imperial Oil have about 30 per cent of their stock. You d'on't have any physical assets in Canada at all do you?

Mr. LaRue: We have some. In other words, we don't own printing machines or anything like that.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you could move pretty quickly if you had to?

Mr. LaRue: Is there a supplementary on that?

The Chairman: Well, the answer to that is probably yes.

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Now, we will change the subject a little bit here. Your penetration of the Canadian market and your circulation in Canada you said was 450,000 roughly?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, 460,000.

Senator Prowse: And your American circulation is 4,300,000?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Senator Prowse: So on a per capita basis you are doing better in Canada than you are in the United States?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Senator Prowse: And yet all we get is four lousy pages. Don't you think we are really entitled to something better than that for something that produces or has an acceptance in Canada greater than your parent magazine has in the United States and is a better money maker on a related basis than your parent magazine in the United States. Yet all we receive is four pages in the magazine. Surely there are more important things that happen in Canada than that? We get practically nothing in your magazine unless it happens to be tied in with a high public figure in the American edition. I don't think we are receiving value for what we give you.

The Chairman: May I just for the record, senator—I think the word you used was "lousy" and I think when you see that in print—were you speaking of quantity or quality?

Senator Prowse: I will make that clear, I am sorry.

The Chairman: Well, just for the record I think you should.

Senator Prowse: What I wanted to say is four tiny little pages—let us put it that way.

The Chairman: Now, I think the Senator, Mr. LaRue, was talking about quantity rather than quality.

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

The Chairman: So I thought I should just make that clear in his interest.

Mr. LaRue: What you are saying, sir, is that you don't feel that the return on what we generate here is great enough as far as what we produce each week in the magazine for the Canadian reader?

Senator Prowse: I think you take far too much out for what you put in. This I know is a matter of opinion but I think you could be doing more for your magazine, you could be doing more for Canada and doing more for Canadian and American relations because you have a special opportunity there. Do you honestly feel yourself that you are doing an adequate job in view of what you get from here...

Mr. LaRue: I agree with you Senator. I agree that we could do more and should do more and will do more. I agree also that we are not doing as good a job as we should. We must be very self-critical, particularly here but also as an attitude in Time to make a better product next week—as it is with any publication.

I can only turn over to our editor as I think I should, the central part of your question as to whether we are indeed producing important editorial material each week in four pages, or six, or 17 which we ran in one edition. It was the longest single story ever produced in Time in its history on Canada. That is a matter of editorial judgment and argument, and we want to do more but it is the journalist's decision as to how, when, where and what we should do in this respect. There is nothing holy about four pages, or six...

The Chairman: How about 12?

Mr. LaRue: Or 12—The standards we set for ourselves—and we are the only ones that can establish them. Mr. Scott, would you care to answer?

The Chairman: Yes indeed Mr. Scott can answer but I would just like to ask a question which follows on with what Senator Prowse was saying. Who, in fact, makes the decision on the number of pages to be used? Is that you Mr. Scott? You or Mr. LaRue?

Mr. Scott: Well, the number of pages in any given week is me. The superstructure of the house is, I think...

Mr. LaRue: There is a budgetary consideration in the publishing of course.

The Chairman: Well, to follow Senator Prowse's suggestion, if you were to say to Mr. Scott "From now on we are going to run 20 pages"...

Mr. LaRue: I would faint. Moving along and growing in Canada, as we look back, is part of our progress. Maybe senator, and certainly in your view it hasn't been fast enough. I appreciate your comment and it seems to me that we do aspire to do more and there are some examples of our doing more over the eight years particularly since we have had our indigenous editorial staff here in Canada.

Again, I would like to go back to Mr. Scott because it has an editorial assessment to it.

Senator Prowse: I would like to hear what he has to say because I think we have been a pretty good host and I don't think you have been a good guest in explaining this.

Mr. Scott: Well, I take it this is now directed to me.

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Scott: Well, I think it would be important to remember that we are what we are. Maybe in Canadian fashion I will arrive at that by saying what we are not, first of all. We are not a full Canadian news magazine. We are not the magazine that has been talked about here and the question has come up in the last few days—should there be a Canadian news magazine. We are not that magazine. We are a weekly news magazine whose basic function is to report what is going on in the world, in the United States and what is going on of significance in the arts and sciences, and so on, throughout what we call the back of the book.

Now, in doing this we attempt to apply the same standards of newsworthiness, the same critical standards that form the rest of the magazine so that we keep in mind a certain coherence to the whole. As we have expanded from the basic four pages to a more frequent five and six, and as we have developed the Canadian cover, we have been striving to achieve a fair balance in the context and coherence of the whole magazine.

We feel we can't be too far wrong in this—and I certainly don't want this to sound too self-satisfying—that we can't be grossly wrong with it because the readers have responded. Now, we are—the managing editor of Time, Mr. Grunwald has said, and I think he makes this clear in his contribution to our brief, that we are subject to change and probably much more quickly in these days as all institutions are. We certainly are hospitable to new ideas and I don't want to overdo it but I would like to say on the record that I think we have been responsive to change and I for one am quite interested in what your concept of a better Time would be. It is something that I have discussed with colleagues in the past and as I say we do have a fairly strong reader response now. I am certainly open to and would like to hear any ideas on how we could improve the Canadian edition of Time.

Mr. Fortier: A supplementary?

The Chairman: Well, before your supplementary, I don't think you have quite answered Senator Prowse's question. His suggestion is more coverage. What about that?

Senator Prowse: How many bureaux men do you have? How many bureaux do you have across Canada?

Mr. Scott: We have four bureaux and one staff correspondent in Calgary, two correspondents in Toronto, one with a specialty in business and economics reporting, two in Ottawa and one staff correspondent in Montreal.

Senator Prowse: How many advertising salesmen do you have?

Mr. Scott: Nine.

Mr. LaRue: Yes, nine.

Senator Prowse: Where are they placed?

Mr. LaRue: Toronto and Montreal.

Senator Prowse: They operate from there?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Senator Prowse: What percentage of advertising placed in the Canadian edition comes from American advertising agencies and what percentage comes from Canadian advertising agencies?

Mr. LaRue: I can't give you the exact percentage but I would be glad to give you that information following this presentation. The predominance of our advertising comes from Canadian advertising agencies.

The Chairman: There is an increasing trend, Mr. LaRue, to more and more involvement in Canadian advertising by American agencies. Does this trend concern you?

Mr. LaRue: Not necessarily, no. I think the emergence we have seen here—the major one and most recent one would be McKim, Benton and Bowles. I think the two enrich each other and we have seen this trend developing over the last 15 years around the world and I am delighted to see someone like George Sinclair taking the Canadian expertise to England and Ireland, and Italy, and I think joint ventures in the advertising business are something that is certainly with us, and is very productive.

Senator Prowse: I want to move to another area—this isn't a supplementary question.

The Chairman: Well, you had a supplementary, didn't you, Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Yes I did Mr. Chairman, and now I have two.

You carry in the magazine and indeed you have it reproduced in the brief in boxed type—"Editorial content identical to U.S. editions except for added Canadian material, and for occasional contractions because of space limitations or duplications." Now, that is a pretty far ranging statement if you wish it to become so.

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Well, what I would like to know—first of all how is this being applied in fact, who does this editing? When I pick up a copy of Time magazine do I get the U.S. edition with four more pages or six more pages, or do I get my four or six Canadian pages with a contracted version of the American edition?

Mr. Scott: No, you don't get a contracted version of the American edition and this is a very important element in our definition of what we are. It is rather interesting that one of the impacts on us of our invitation to appear before this committee was that for the first time in a long time we looked at that little box and we felt that the wording we had in it then was not precisely correct and so we have attempted to make it precisely correct, and perhaps with the seconds here talking about the occasional contractions and duplications—that probably does leave a slight mystery remaining.

You are quite correct that we add to the magazine—we don't subtract. You, when you buy it at Malton or Dorval, are getting the same Time material that you would get if you bought it at any other airport in the world with the addition of the Canadian pages. What occasional contractions means is that in the make-up of the magazine, and very occasionally simply because of the way the ads and the pictures fall, occasionally a one story section will have to go. This is a pretty much towards the end-of-the-week operation, so we have that statement in to cover that. Duplication—what we mean by that is that on the story of the Montreal riots, the cover story we did on that and which we have in our brief, we had a long story in the world section about the Montreal riots but it was a duplication of the material in the Canadian pages, so we made up a new world section in that edition. That issue, the Canadian readers got one more world story than appeared in any other edition of time anywhere else in the world.

Mr. Fortier: Who picked it?

Mr. Scott: The world editor.

Mr. Fortier: Well, what did we learn that no one else in the world read about?

Mr. Scott: You have me, I just can't remember.

Mr. Fortier: Do you remember, Mr. LaRue?

Mr. LaRue: No.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it couldn't have been a world-shattering story?

Mr. LaRue: Well, it was a minor thing. I don't take Time (U.S.) and Time (Canada) every week and lay them side by side in order to compare the two.

Mr. Fortier: I can understand, Mr. Scott, your explanation about the duplication because it is fairly obvious, but it is the contractions that worry me more than the duplication. I think I could live with duplications, but if I feel that because of space limitations my version of Time is a contracted version of the American one I would like to know who decides on the contractions. That is my question to you now.

Mr. Scott: Well, as I said in the beginning...

Mr. Fortier: Is it you?

Mr. Scott: No, it is not me at this stage. At that stage of the week I worry about another aspect of deadline problems and to tell you the truth I am not precisely sure. It would be one of the assistant managing editors who is presented with the make-up of what we call there the export edition. I mean, we are dealing here now only with the Canada edition which has this little box and talks about the occasional contractions.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Scott: This problem comes up in laying out the whole range of the international editions.

Mr. Fortier: That is done in New York?

Mr. Scott: Yes, that is done in New York.

Mr. Fortier: Unknown to you, in fact?

Mr. Scott: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Not by a Canadian?

Mr. Scott: Well, I guess not. I guess it wouldn't be done by a Canadian as far as I know.

Mr. Fortier: And then the export edition, so to speak, is shipped to Montreal?

Mr. LaRue: The film.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, the film, and then at that particular time it is completely stripped of advertising?

Mr. LaRue: The editorial content is stripped.

Mr. Fortier: And then you have ten regional editions in Canada?

Mr. LaRue: Twelve.

Mr. Fortier: Twelve now?

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: What you are doing at that point is you are presenting the stripped export editorial version of Time...

Mr. LaRue: The make-up of Time (U.S.) essentially.

Mr. Fortier: And you are presenting it in 12 different regions from an advertisers' point of view?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, it is an advertising regional, not an editorial.

Mr. Fortier: So you are then competing for the advertisers' dollar with newspapers and magazines in 12 different Canadian regions?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, in a sense.

Mr. Fortier: You are obviously not competing for readers' time in those 12 regions because it is the same content but you can have any given week 12 editions of Time which will carry 12 different sets of advertising. Is that correct?

Mr. LaRue: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: This puts you in direct competition not only with magazines but with newspapers?

Mr. LaRue: Well, Mr. Fortier, we compete with all media nationally as well as locally. We have always competed for the advertisers' dollar with the newspapers, for example, and with television. When an advertiser at the beginning of his planning in the fall or summer for the following year, he establishing an advertising budget at the beginning and then more than likely he will carve it up at the beginning into various media areas. For example, what are we going to do on television, et cetera?

Mr. Fortier: Who decides to carve up another region? Do you do that?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, we decide here. That is a business decision here.

Mr. Fortier: And when did you go from 10 to 12?

Mr. LaRue: Two years ago.

Mr. Fortier: In answer to...

Mr. LaRue: Well, some very small—for example, an advertiser will say "Can I have all of Canada except the Maritimes or the Atlantic Provinces" and physically if we can do it—well, we do have but one advertiser who does it...

Senator McElman: Who would ever say that?

Mr. LaRue: Well, someone who does not do business in the Atlantic Provinces.

Mr. Fortier: What percentage of your advertising finds its way into the 12 regional editions?

Mr. LaRue: Twenty per cent.

Mr. Fortier: Twenty per cent only?

Mr. LaRue: Mostly national advertisers who have something specific to say in a given market. By that I mean, well, you can take Seagram's for example who might only sell or stick to a brand in Ontario.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I was thinking of liquor.

Mr. LaRue: Or travel advertisements. Eastern Airlines, for example, is not interested in the west. They don't go to the west. They are interested in Toronto, and other cities in the east.

Mr. Fortier: Department stores would—the T. Eaton Co. Ltd., for example, give you advertising...

Mr. LaRue: We have had advertising from the men's department of one of the major stores. This is purely local advertising. We have found that it does not come to Time easily. Mostly the national advertiser who has something else to say or a product among his line of products which is marketed in a specific area.

Mr. Fortier: Is this the Toronto regional edition that you distributed this morning?

Mr. LaRue: Well, I don't know which regional edition it is quite frankly. Sometimes it is hard to tell. Please, please, don't ask me how you do that.

Mr. Fortier: Well, then I am tempted to ask you?

Mr. LaRue: You see you can see a code on them, usually TM-1 or TM-2. This one here could well be the Quebec edition or the Ontario edition. I don't know which one they sent us from the printing plant.

Mr. Fortier: How many regional editions do you have in the States? I have seen the figures but I just can't recall.

Mr. LaRue: Adding them up very quickly, I would say 25.

Mr. Fortier: Well, following on Senator Prowse's earlier questions you have a heck of a lot more regional editions in proportion in Canada than you do in the United States.

Mr. LaRue: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And all this in competition with daily Canadian newspapers, weekly Canadian magazines, monthly Canadian magazines which don't have the resources that you have. Are you playing fair with your competitors?

Mr. LaRue: Am I playing fair without competitors?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. LaRue: I am competing with my competitors. What is unfair about that? It is a free competitive society.

Mr. Fortier: It seems to me that you are dealing from a position of real strength.

Mr. LaRue: Well, of course we are. We have a magazine in demand here in Canada and as I said, Mr. Fortier, in my opening remarks it all begins with the reader acceptance of the publication whatever it is and Time has a certain reader acceptance of its own here in Canada.

Mr. Fortier: But aren't you behaving in such a way that it is becoming increasingly difficult—in fact, history has proved it—for any valid competitor to come up and say "O.K., we will challenge you now, Time magazine". You are protected by legislation in so far as Newsweek and other American magazines are concerned and as far as Canadian magazines are concerned they just cannot stand up to your resources. Now, they are faced with 12 regional editions.

Mr. LaRue: They themselves have more regional editions than we have.

Mr. Fortier: Well, they are just trying to keep up with big brother.

Mr. LaRue: They lead big brother.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it seems to me that if in the United States you have only 25 regional editions with four million odd readers and you have 12 in Canada with some 400,000 readers, you know, there is a sense of disproportion here.

Mr. LaRue: Well, I think it has something to do with the difference in the markets.

Mr. Fortier: Could it also have something to do with the difference in the competition?

Mr. LaRue: I would think that greater competition in the United States, you know, would bring us to answer more people competitively, more entities competitively. I don't know whether there is a relationship that you can establish in America between the number or regional editions we have in Canada and the number of regional editions we have in the United States with the circulation comparison, and with the population structure.

Mr. Fortier: I think your competitors for advertising dollars would have a ready-made answer for that.

Mr. LaRue: We are being unfair by answering the needs of the advertising marketplace?

Mr. Fortier: No, I don't really mean that.

Mr. LaRue: We don't create regional editions and then go out and look for advertisers. We have to sense some sort of need for it and when I said we have a Canadian edition ex the Atlantic Provinces, we had I think it was a trucking or moving firm in Winnipeg which said "We would like to buy Time (Canada) but we are not willing to pay what would be waste unless we can have the market we need", and we said physically, now we can handle it and so we received a contract. I suspect that is how most changes take place in regionalizing magazines or newspapers.

I see Mr. Mannion in the room—supplements I believe on occasion regionalize, and I suspect it is because, like in any other business situation, there is a certain demand for it. That demand is being met and provided through service emitted by the medium for the advertiser. I do not know how to compete other than to compete, and I think it is a healthy thing and I think it generates business in the magazine industry, to have a healthy competitive situation. I think we heard Mr. Nobleman say something like that as well and Mr. Brander would agree also, I believe.

Mr. Fortier: Healthy?

Mr. LaRue: Healthy, yes, and progressive.

Mr. Fortier: Who is healthy?

Mr. LaRue: Healthy?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, who is healthy in the Canadian magazine industry—Time and Reader's Digest?

Mr. LaRue: Certainly.

Mr. Fortier: Are the others healthy?

Mr. LaRue: You will have to ask them.

The Chairman: Well, I think we are back to where we were earlier this morning.

Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: The success of Time in Canada is obvious evidence that there is a need for Time in Canada or for a news magazine?

Mr. LaRue: Yes, sir.

Senator Prowse: With the penetration you have and the strength you have behind you at the present time, would you think there would be any hope at all of a Canadian news magazine being launched successfully?

Mr. LaRue: Well, as I said earlier it is a very risky business and there is no way to tell for certain that this could be done. It is possible though that it could be done as Canada grows, as the population grows, and as the community with the people interested in this sort of journalism grows. The financial resources in my judgment would have to be great.

Senator Prowse: Now, suppose you weren't here any more then on the basis that news-week is. In other words you didn't have this special legislation—don't you think then that the very vacuum might persuade somebody now in the publishing business—one of the big dailies in Toronto perhaps, or a couple of them to get together and to then produce a Canadian news magazine?

Mr. LaRue: Well, that is a toughie.

Senator Prowse: Well, the question is how much do we pay for what we get?

Mr. LaRue: I don't think there is room for just one—I think there is room for another one provided someone is willing to take the risk and die. I will be quite frank and say that one of the reasons that Time does what it does is that in providing the service to the reader on a worldwide basis under 24 or 25 subject headings every week requires, demands 35 bureaus around the world and how this could be duplicated these days is a matter for very deep thought, and I just don't know. Time started in 1923 rewriting the New York Times and over the years as it became more popular and evidently needed it grew and was able to afford one, two, three, four, five different bureau and the war created different needs, and it goes on and on, so there is an evolutionary process which has now taken some 47 years.

Newsweek started in 1934, I believe, and they have followed that same pattern. There is syndication, for example, in this field whereby a publication with worldwide circulation and resources will sell what it has in the magazine week-to-week to what they consider foreign country local magazines trying to do a similar job. They are selling those resources which the buyer doesn't have to pay for, or invest in, or capitalize in, and so the economics of this, sir, are great. Once you have created it and built it it becomes a thriving business.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse, do you have many more questions?

Senator Prowse: Well, Mr. Raley has been here and since we are talking about change I was just wondering if he would have something to tell us.

The Chairman: Yes, I thought we might turn to Mr. Raley for a discussion for a few minutes, but we will do that in a moment or two.

Mr. Raley, I apologize to you at once that we have not called on you as we have been so interested in our other witnesses that we just haven't turned our attention to you. We are interested and you are welcome. Perhaps if there are other questions for Mr. Scott or Mr. LaRue we can deal with those very quickly and then turn to Mr. Raley.

Mr. Scott, I would just like to ask you one line of questioning. It says in section 106 of your brief—this is a quote from Mr. Grunwald, the managing editor, and he says the following:

"Of course, I have to admit, and even claim, that TIME is biased. It is impossible to make judgments without some set of preconceived ideas or prejudices."

Of course, I agree with him and I will ask you, Mr. Scott, what are Time's corporate biases on prejudices?

Mr. Scott: Well, this verges into the area of philosophy. Corporate biases and prejudices—I suspect there is a bias in favour of success, a bias that corporately we think in terms of success being valuable. I am not conscious of a construct corporate bias, but there may be a subconscious one come to me.

The Chairman: Well, what I really mean is—

Mr. Scott: It is difficult to grapple with.

The Chairman: Well, that is fine. Let me ask you another one which may assist you. Peter Gzowski when he was here—you know him I am sure—said that Maclean's is a special interest magazine and its special interest is Canada. Would one of your prejudices be in favour of Canada?

Mr. Scott: Unmistakably yes.

The Chairman: Well, then I put a third question to you. Doesn't an American magazine have a special responsibility when it attempts to lead as you have said Canadian public opinion and how do you meet that special responsibility? In other words what is different at Time in this area than at Maclean's or Saturday Night because you are, after all, an American magazine and have these prejudices—success being one—I am not suggesting that you are not a good Canadian, I know you are, but surely there is a special responsibility in this field?

Mr. Scott: Yes, I think there is a special responsibility.

The Chairman: Well, what is it and how do you meet it?

Mr. Scott: Well, I think it evolves from our identity, who we are, and it evolves from the fact that we are the only magazine that is dealing in news with the frequency and distribution that we do. Maclean's is not doing that nor is Saturday Night. How do we meet it—well, I attempt to meet it by simply doing the best job I can. Now, that isn't a very helpful answer but there are not conditions on me, I don't think, that make it difficult to feel that the point of view that is implicit in the Canadian pages is a helpful comment in Canada. I think it supports what Mr. Fortier rather solicitously said yesterday was the Canadian notion. I think the notion exists as well as the nation and we are seized with this.

Senator, does that answer your question or do you wish to draw me out some more?

The Chairman: Well, we would like to hear from Mr. Raley and that perhaps I feel I don't have the time to draw you out some more but if I might quote Mr. Pollak's article again, and these are his own words—Time is "the weekly house organ of the American's Dream." Are you the weekly house organ of a Canadian notion?

Mr. Scott: Well, I guess we are getting into a hybrid form here, but I would say that we address ourselves to the Canadian notion and sympathetically as a group of Canadian writers and researchers and myself in Montreal who are intensely involved in the life of the country, and several of our correspondents have written books out of their experiences and added to the Canadian dimension—Martin Sullivan's book, for example. I think we are involved as people and sure, we express the Canadian notion.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, you had a supplementary question?

Senator McElman: Mr. Scott, there has been a great deal of editorial writing lately in Canada with reference to what has been termed as the rising tide of Canadian nationalism. There has also been a good deal of reference to anti-Americanism which is in the lesser sense of nationalism. In this context I have heard a good bit of comment with respect to Time which could perhaps be shaken down in this fashion. Isn't it darned convenient that the Canadian nation only makes enough news a week for four pages of Time?

Now, I understand completely that there are four, five or six pages and seven on occasion, but we are dealing with the reactions of people and I suggest that if you ask 40 people today how much of Canadian content there was in Time, the answer would be four pages.

With this background do you not feel that there is rather a burning challenge—I know you talked about this earlier—to develop a greater coverage of Canadian news. Do you not think that this feeling which I suggest is there and growing indicates to you that some form of competition must emanate from us. I don't know what the form would be and that you must early on impress upon your principals at head office that something must be done about this.

Mr. Scott: Well, I think that that is an eloquent statement, senator, and I am glad to have heard it. I do feel—as you said I have discussed this before in terms of Time being what it is—that in attempting to apply the same standards of judgment of newsworthiness that we have been able to do a fair job. Now, this may indeed be no longer sufficient or at least our rate of response may be insufficient but I think it is something we have to be vitally concerned with. I don't have in my own mind a full blown notion of how, applying the standards that we do, we could spring immediately into a new format or a new approach in the Canadian section. I think we do think seriously about the point of view that you expressed and I think we will have to do some more, and will.

Senator McElman: Let us say that there is something of a burning issue that affects both the United States and Canada. Could you conceive of a story—a treatment in the World section of the magazine which gave the U.S. national viewpoint and in the Canadian section on the same matter an entirely different viewpoint?

Mr. Scott: No, I don't conceive of it happening, Senator, simply because it hasn't happened. It hasn't happened in the course of the last eight years where we have had such an issue. Now, in the course of that time we have discussed issues of sensitivity on both sides, but I am not so sure I could say national politics took it on both sides. For example, the recognition of China, trading, the Canadian wheat trading with China, Arctic sovereignty and the auto pact perhaps is another example. In all of these instances we have been able to report what we felt we should report without any strain between the Montreal and the New York editorial offices, without anybody ever having to compromise a point of view or the fact that it hasn't happened does make it difficult for me to conceive of a precise issue in which this might occur.

Senator McElman: In matters such as oil carriers in the Arctic, the continental fresh water usage supply—let us say—could you conceive of a burning editorial from the U.S. national viewpoint in the U.S. edition and the opposite burning editorial in the Canadian edition?

Mr. Scott: No, I don't think so. I think the coherence and the consistency in the magazine that I spoke about before—I think we would be inclined to resolve that situation. I don't think we would have a situation for sections of the magazine—one against the other. A lot of things change so quickly these days, I don't really know.

Senator McElman: Well, it is quite hypothetical I am sure but in such an instance which viewpoint would predominate?

Mr. Scott: In the end, senator, the magazine is an American magazine which we have discussed—it is owned in the United States and I just can't possibly imagine that happening. It is really hypothetical and unreal to me.

The Chairman: May I then perhaps conclude the session—I know there are other senators who have questions, but I am going to make this suggestion. I am more than aware of the fact that we haven't heard from Mr. Raley, but I have just spoken to Mr. LaRue and suggested that some of us, including myself, if Mr. Raley would be available, we would proceed to have lunch with him and I know he has some opinions which we would be interested in and I know I have questions that I would like to ask him which would certainly go on for another hour and I don't think that would be fair to the witnesses, to the press, or to the other Senators. I don't know, Mr. Raley, whether you want to say anything for the record or not...

Mr. Deane D. Raley, Jr., Printing and Planning, Corporate Products, Time Incorporated: No, I have nothing that I really want to say.

The Chairman: Well, that being the case and if you are available for lunch...

Senator Prowse: Is there any chance for Mr. Raley coming back this afternoon after lunch?

The Chairman: Well, I don't think there is, senator. We have two briefs this afternoon, Actualité and Sept Jours, and I really think it will be a full afternoon.

Senator Prowse: Well, you can tell me about your discussions later.

The Chairman: I think that perhaps I should conclude this session by saying, Mr. LaRue, I think it is apparent, and was apparent by the speech I made in the Senate proposing the committee that some of us share Senator O'Leary's concern about the future of the Canadian publications and I suppose like Senator O'Leary was and probably still is, and as far as many of us are concerned, we find ourselves rather ambivalent when it comes to Time. I think, as was apparent from the questioning, we are concerned about its Canadian citizenship and at the same time we understand, and I think we appreciate, the magazine's enormous success.

All in all this has been a very useful discussion and if at times we seemed aggressive we apologize, and I am sure there are other questions we haven't asked and would still like to do we may not call you again publicly but may want to see you privately. I am particularly mindful of the fact that both you and Mr. Scott have been very helpful to us since the inception of the committee and most helpful today, we are most grateful.

Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned at 1:00 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, may I call the session to order.

I have two announcements which I will make. One is that I inadvertently this morning said that we had postponed the Dalton Camp presentation until the fourth of April at four o'clock. For the record that should be the fourth of March rather than the fourth of April, I am sorry.

Also we have received a telegram which I will read into the record. The telegram is signed by Phil Sykes and Douglas Marshall and I quote:

"Newspaper reports of hearings of your Committee are leaving impressions grossly unfair to Charles Templeton. Committee's questioning apparently overlooked fact Templeton publically supported by creative staff of Magazine which knew of harrassment he received from corporation executive."

"Templeton neither saint nor genius but his resignation genuinely sacrificial act in interest of Magazine's integrity and independance from corporate harrassment, stop. Release to press was made only after president of corporation refused discuss matter with Templeton. He acted to protect editorial freedom and to protest corporation's manoeuvres to emasculate Le Magazine Maclean, Staff declared it would work at magazine only if corporation undertook respect office of editor." "Corporation did this after two meetings with staff representatives including ourselves. Several weeks later at the time Gzowski appointed editor. Corporation interference in editorial operation ceased from day of Templeton resignation so apparently he achieved larger objective. Committee's questioning to date has produced massive rationalization but no straight recapitulation of facts. Having lived through these events we feel it important that record should be set straight.

Phil Sykes and Douglas Marshall, Maclean Magazine."

Senator Smith: Signed by whom, Mister Chairman?

The Chairman: This is signed by Mr. Phil Sykes and Mr. Douglas Marshall, Maclean's Magazine.

The first brief we are going to receive this afternoon, honourable senators, is that of Actualité. The representatives of the magazine are sitting with me at the front. On my immediate left Mr. Bédard, on my right Mr. Ewing, Mr. André Bellerose, on my extreme right and on my extreme left Mr. Jean-Louis Brouillé.

It is my understanding, Mr. Bédard you are the Director General but that the opening statement will be made by Mr. Brouillé.

The Senators have not had an opportunity to read your brief as it was not received as requested three weeks in advance. It is not in a complaining sense that I point out that most of us are seeing this brief for the first time so you will undoubtedly take that into account in your approach this afternoon.

We usually allow fifteen minutes to amplify, expand or explain your brief. You may do so now.

Mr. Jean-Louis Brouillé, Editor-in-Chief, Magazine Actualité Inc.: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, please. Before commencing, would you mind repeating... Mr. Chairman spoke so quickly. Would each of you please identify himself again and indicate his position?

Mr. Jean-Louis Brouillé, Editor-in-Chief of the Magazine, "Actualité": Jean-Louis Brouillé, Editor-In-Chief of the magazine "Actualité".

Mr. Grégoire Ewing, Public Relations Manager of "Actualité": Grégoire Ewing Manager, Public Relations.

Mr. André Bellerose, Assistant General Manager of "Actualité": André Bellerose, Assistant General Manager.

Mr. Brouillé: Members of the Senate Committee, for reasons which would be inopportune to recall at this time, the magazine, "Actualité" a monthly French-language periodical, did not deem it proper—and I refer here to some remarks made by Senator Davey at the beginning—to present an elaborate brief to you regarding the various problems connected with the mass media and which your committee would have to study in order to derive valid policies for the future.

I shall not read you the complete text. I simply want to give you the highlights of the brief we are presenting this afternoon. I must point out to you, all the same, that we would like to thank you for your insistence that we come before you to submit these brief statements, if only to make you more aware of a situation which we consider to be of considerable importance, both to the future of French-speaking Quebec and, consequently, to the future of Canada as a whole. I would draw your attention immediately to—and would ask that you take careful note of—the fact that we consider the position of the magazine Actualité in the magazine world to be not only special, but unique.

In this introductory section, we are reviewing the importance of the media, and of the magazine as such. We must point out that, with the onset of the '70s, now that the impact of the electronic media has been felt—and I would say accepted by the public, it has undoubtedly brought about an evaluation of society as a whole—the world community—and not only Canadian society. It would appear that the magazine medium is to be called upon to play a specific role in the coming decades which will bring us up to the year 2000.

The statement I have just made is not unfounded; it is supported by the evidence of specialists and experts who have devoted many years of their lives to the magazine world. Furthermore, you have heard one of them, I believe, Mr. Nobleman. I will spare you the entire quotation but you will find at the bottom of page 3 of the brief presented by Saturday Night, that Mr. Nobleman states: "Magazines will do this in relatively narrow but extremely pertinent terms. And since pertinent is what magazines will be, they will be the pertinent medium of the Fulfilment Society." In other words, magazines will contribute to this fulfilment of society.

Thus, the positions we take are based on these powers. Furthermore, the role of the magazine in modern society—I would say, not so much the role, as the individuality of the magazine—is based on these functions because of all mass media, the magazine is perhaps the one which enjoys the best perspective for analysing situations. Along with daily newspapers, it devotes time and space to reviewing this mass of information which pours in daily from the usual media, electronic among others. The magazine is the only media capable of creating a kind of digestive synthesis from this mass of news, presenting commentaries which call for more research, and providing more objective and valid viewpoints.

If we can accept this as the basic criteria of the "magazine medium", we will be able to grasp its contribution to all aspects of social life, especially the economical and cultural ones—in short, to all aspects of society. We will be better able to understand the role which a magazine like "Actualité" is called upon to play, since it is the one and only truly French-Canadian magazine. This means that it is the property of French-Canadians, written by French-Canadians for French-Canadians, and conceived, both to satisfy a recognized need and from a knowledge of the social climate.

However, our magazines have had difficulties in the past due to the presence of the other media. I am referring now to the magazine in general, which has difficulties which are of a special nature. The O'Leary Commission called attention at that time, in its report published in 1961, to the problems facing magazines. The problems were of a special nature for all Canadian magazines, and the invasion of the Canadian market by American magazines was deplored. The significant presence of two magazines in particular, Time and Reader's Digest including the French version, Sélection were singled out. Yet this problem, deplored by the English-Canadian magazine still exists today. For us, a French-Canadian magazine, the problem is even more complicated, because besides having the same difficulties as the English-Canadian magazine (for the simple reason that, fortunately or unfortunately, a good proportion of French-Canadians are bilingual) our readers also read the American magazines. Moreover, English-Canadian editors have for the past 7 or 8 years maintained a policy of publishing French-language editions in the French-Canadian setting of Quebec. These are, for the most part, translated articles which, in our opinion, do not present an accurate picture of the social climate. Just as the Canadian Government declared in the O'Leary Commission, that it is impossible for Canadians to expect to achieve an individual culture when they only read the American magazine (which approaches our problems with an American interpretation), I believe, is it impossible for English-Canadian writers to really grasp the French-Canadian mentality, living outside of Quebec as they do.

In spite of all these difficulties, one thing is certain. "Actualité" was mentioned in the O'Leary Report almost 10 years ago. It was mentioned in the chapter on small reviews when the Report suggested that the government lend some support to them since collectively they do make a certain cultural contribution. Well, that small review "Actualité" to which they referred 10 years ago, has become, in spite of the difficulties I have indicated, a large magazine, printing some 125,000 copies and reaching the four corners of the province—in all approximately 400,000 readers. It is a monthly magazine, publishing a minimum of 64 pages a month, with the largest editions reaching a volume of 120 pages. It is also a magazine which takes the time each month to publish a supplement on subjects of particular interest, to our own industry, i.e., pulp and paper; or social and global pre-occupations, i.e., we are publishing a supplement on marriage and the automobile industry, etc. We have an editorial content which is of general interest and which relates to the editorial content of all the big magazines.

"Actualité" has made such strides that we have been accepted by MAB, and our name now appears alongside such magazines as Time, Readers Digest, Maclean's and Chate-laine.

The world of advertising has, and is continuing to show itself now to be more and more interested in the magazine "Actualité". Our advertising returns have felt the effect—and for which we are pleased since, like any other magazine, we cannot perform miracles and depend on advertising to meet most of our production costs.

However, our voice is muted to some extent. The magazine is written in the French language, and unfortunately, there are still far too many advertising agencies who, not knowing French, are forced to rely on a few isolated statistics, instead of finding out for themselves the value of the editorial content of our magazine.

In conclusion, I would like to say that if Canada is to be bicultural, if both cultures are to have a part to play, and if we believe that one culture must use tools to carry out its role, then it is essential that we make every effort in the future to insure that "Actualité" not only continue to exist, but that it be called upon to play an even larger role.

We say this, even though there exists in Quebec one government-supported radio and television station in the French language, as well as private French language radio and television stations, and even though Quebec has some very well-written daily newspapers. We even say this while taking into consideration the new dimensions indicated for the magazine in the coming decades. This leads me to add, gentlemen of the Senate, that if "Actualité" were not in existence, you would have had to find the ways and means of bringing it into being. Thank you.

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Mr. Bédard, is there any other statement or do you wish to say anything else? Do you wish to add anything?

Mr. Simon Bédard, Director General: No, I think that is enough.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think we will perhaps turn to the questioning period. Mr. Fortier has the first question.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Brouillé, given the fact that the magazine "Actualité" does exist, to use your own statement, it is therefore not a question of this; the problem does not lie in the creation of the magazine, but in its continued existence. Are you specifically asking the present government, be it provincial or federal, for assistance of a more concrete nature so that the magazine may carry on?

Mr. Brouillé: I believe this question was raised in previous investigations of this kind. I do not think that any press organization would want to receive assistance either in the form of grants, or in the form of privileges, because the press, to be able to continue playing the role it has to play, i.e. assuring the right of the people to be informed, must have as much freedom as possible. What we are asking the government—unfortunately, I skipped a few things in order to get through as quickly as possible as I was anxious to hear your questions—is this: if the government is being honest with itself in claiming that Canada has an identity of its own and that they (the government) must work harder towards building it up, then the government should take steps—not in granting privileges and exercising a kind of paternalism over the Canadian press—but towards subjecting the foreign press to certain entry requirements so that the Canadian press is permitted to develop on its own.

Mr. Fortier: The Canadian press, in other words, and you are including here, both the English—and the French-Canadian press...

Mr. Brouillé: Certainly.

Mr. Fortier: . . . are in need of protection in order to survive; is this not so?

Mr. Brouillé: I don't like the word "protection"!

Mr. Fortier: . . . are in need—you spoke of grants and then discarded the possibility of government subsidies—and rightly so in my opinion. Do you mean to say that this protection is necessary for the control of . . . ?

Mr. Brouillé: I'll give you a concrete example—that of the postal rates. Do you think that the postal rates imposed on Canadian periodicals by the Postmaster General, Mr. Kierans, tend to favour the expansion and advancement of information media in Canada? We are not seeking protection or privilege. We simply do not want stupid policies created. It is as straight-forward as that.

Mr. Fortier: According to Mr. Kierans and his way of thinking, postal rates do constitute a form of subsidy, since, as he says, magazines, and for that matter, all second-class mail, are not paying the full amount it costs to transport, say for instance, "Actualité" from the printer to the reader.

Senator Beaubien: Has the increase had a great effect on you?

Mr. Brouillé: I will ask Mr. Bédard to answer that.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Kierans' postal increases?

Mr. Bédard: Let us say that it could represent an increase of 75 per cent in our annual administrative costs. There again, may I point out, "Actualité" is not an isolated case. By way of reference to the problem the postal increase has managed to create in French-speaking Quebec, it was said at one time that we must have the communication media, that we must develop through communication with the 20th century. Yet, when we see all the organizations which have had to abandon their review or their bulletin due to this increase in postal rates...

Senator Beaubien: Were there many?

Mr. Bédard: In the province of Quebec, in the Quebec market, an estimated 30 or 40 small reviews have disappeared to date. In fact, they were often representative products of all the organizations. Then, as a result of the increase in postal rates, you have certain reviews among others experiencing a 100, 1500, and even 2000 per cent decrease in circulation.

Mr. Brouillé: To return to Mr. Fortier's question, I took the trouble before coming here to the Committee, of phoning the United States to find out what the postal conditions are for American magazines which distribute to Canada. In the States you have a population of about 200 million; in Canada, we have 20 million. Our Postmaster General should handle and direct here all American publications entering the country, and we, in turn, should send them our modest contribution.

At the time of the O'Leary Report in 1961, the Post Office Department was busy patting itself on the back over the fact that they were due to absorb an additional $900,000 in income through an agreement, or by virtue of international agreements on postal rates...

Senator Beaubien: In Canada?

Mr. Brouillé: In Canada, yes. I wonder if a large part of the deficit Mr. Kierans is trying to cancel out, isn't due to the large administrative. . .

Mr. Fortier: He recognizes this.

Mr. Brouillé: He recognizes this. But, what is he doing to alleviate the situation...

Mr. Fortier: He says that right now in the Post Office Department, second-class mail expenditures comprise a $7 million item which may be attributed to what is referred to in English as an "overflow circulation".

Mr. Brouillé: Yes.

[English]

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Excuse me please, I think three million is straight overflow. Another three million to special reader mail, that is mail on this side of the border.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Certain American magazines, that is correct. Some American magazines are printed in the States and then mailed to Canada, are they not?

Mr. Brouillé: "Newsweek" for example, is shipped by train to Toronto and then mailed from there.

Mr. Fortier: The total is $7 million in all. He recognizes this and say that even if he took that $7 million and applied it somewhere else, the Post Office Department would still be absorbing a substantial deficit.

Mr. Brouillé: In connection with the question you were asking a few minutes ago, as to whether we wanted protection or grants, I have this to say: should the Canadian Government not be studying this problem as was stated in our brief. It is not a question here of introducing an embargo into a system of free exchange, in any case, not a general embargo. But could there not be policies be introduced which would foster progress and prosperity both in the English-Canadian and in the French-Canadian world, in the medium which we consider indispensable?

Mr. Fortier: Imposing tariffs, you mean?

Mr. Brouillé: So that it is more expensive to distribute American magazines here.

Mr. Fortier: In other words, customs duties! As Senator O'Leary recommended.

Mr. Bédard: Nevertheless, the fact remains: just as the postal service of a country belongs to the public so too does a communication medium such as a magazine. No one could never be said to be the owner of a magazine. It belongs to the thousands of people who subscribe to it. Certainly, looking at it from the business or administrative point of view, service charges are accepted as a standard occurrence. However, from the point of view of education and development, particularly at the present time in the case of French-speaking Quebec, we should—we must always bear in mind that whenever "Maclean's or "Reader's Digest" prints 2 million or 350,000 copies of a magazine, it costs them less per 1000 copies than it does us, despite the fact that we are often limited to 100, 130 or 150,000 copies. The maximum circulation a magazine such as "Actualité" could achieve, would probably be around 175,000 copies.

Mr. Fortier: 175,000 according to your calculations?

Mr. Bédard: Yes, about 175,000 copies. It would be something of a miracle for us to reach 200,000 copies.

Mr. Fortier: I think that running to 125,000 copies these days, is already half a miracle in itself.

Mr. Bédard: Due to the fact that we have to pay for colour separations, writing and editing...

Mr. Brouillé: Research.

Mr. Bédard: Yes, research, services and all the services involved in the production of a magazine—for example, the art department, which is a very costly item in itself. We have to print something that is acceptable, because the circumstances demand it. But, while we are printing, let's say, at a cost of approximately $100 per 1,000 copies, or thereabouts, Maclean-Hunter or Reader's Digest is printing at a cost of $70, $76 or $50 per 1,000 copies. Moreover, with the size of circulation they have, they can always get along, for instance, in the purchase of paper, or, for that matter, anything connected with production. Whereas, we are always limited.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Bédard: Just thinking of the case of the postal increases (which, in my opinion, were a restriction) makes me a little uneasy about the possibility of Mr. Kierans becoming Minister of Communications...

Mr. Fortier: He already is.

Mr. Brouillé: It was announced over the radio; I only found out myself this morning.

Mr. Bédard: He is or he is going to be, since, in fact, he has not yet fully taken up his duties. If he is right now Minister of Communications, and if he still remains unaware of the problems he has managed to create by increasing the postal rates, then I wonder just how much he is going to be able to serve the Canadian people in the field of communications.

Mr. Fortier: He firmly denies being unaware of these problems. Only last week, when he appeared before us, he told us that he was well aware of the problems, but that he was equally aware that there was a substantial deficit to make up and in order to do it he was trying to make the newspapers and magazines pay a more realistic amount, or, if you like, share of what it costs the Post Office Department to precess them.

Mr. Bédard: Mr. Fortier, if he had decided upon his course of action after making a careful study of the situation, perhaps he would have come to a different conclusion—that all soliciting by mail (commercial mail) and certain types of letters, reporting "X" or 100 per cent profit, (since the public is burdened with such an amount of advertising for suitcases and so forth)—should be charged 20 cents apiece... But, there again it is the people who need cultural development who suffer.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, he could have divided...

Mr. Bédard: And we in the French market are particularly affected because we do not have the human potential to enable us to expand.

Mr. Fortier: The majority of your competitors—earlier you mentioned Maclean-Hunter, Reader's Digest and Time magazine—the majority of these enterprises are diversified. Have you already studied the possibility of a diversification in the case of the magazine, with communications?

Mr. Bédard: We are compelled by circumstance to diversify. We are compelled to study the possibilities of expansion. We are forced to find ways of collecting indirect revenue for the organization to make it profitable. However, one fact remains. Publishing a magazine is not a philanthropic gesture, there is the question of profits...

Mr. Fortier: It is legitimate.

Mr. Bédard: At this point, we are forced by circumstance to find other ways of drawing profits.

Mr. Fortier: Have you found other ways, or are you still at the stage of...

Mr. Bédard: At present, we are still in the study stage.

Mr. Fortier: Yes?

Mr. Bédard: We are conducting studies in co-operation with Les Éditions de l'Homme into the sale of books. Next month we shall consider a collection of books on the history of French Canada. But here again, before we can make profits, there is a considerable investment to be made; if we purchase a collection such as the history of French Canada in seven volumes, let us say, the purchase price for us may be between $30 and $38 per collection. We can probably sell it at $68 or $69, but here again, we must purchase a minimum quantity of "x" collections.

Mr. Brouillé: Let us say that when one has reached a certain maturity, there are many proposals open. We are now in the process of studying all these proposals. There are several which we feel are excellent, profitable and in harmony with our ideas on information and the dissemination of culture. But there is the investment aspect of which Mr. Bédard spoke and which presents a stumbling block, forcing us to proceed somewhat cautiously for the moment in this respect.

Mr. Bédard: On this point, one thing has to be admitted: some 14 months, 16 months, in fact 15 months ago, Actualité was doomed to disappear. It was finished. It was not because of poor administration, but lack of capital; we were going through a critical period. The group which I represent purchased the magazine Actualité.

Mr. Fortier: Can you name them for the record?

Mr. Bédard: They were Mr. Gérard Veilleux of Drummondville, Mr. Clermont Veilleux and myself. Nevertheless it required considerable investment on our part to give the magazine Actualité a new face. We were forced to make personnel changes; we brought in young people for the magazine, our average age is now 27 or 28.

Mr. Ewing: 28 years of age.

Mr. Fortier: You have experience Mr. Brouillé!

Mr. Bédard: For Mr. Brouillé, the important thing is that he is young at heart.

[English]

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier, if I may, Senator Everett has some questions.

Senator Everett: Are you finished on that line?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: I believe that he had not finished his answer.

Mr. Bédard: Therefore, owing to this investment and to a team which in fact worked 18 to 19 hours per day—and I am not lying to you when I say this—we have so far been able, I feel, to boost our image in French-speaking Quebec. I feel that at present in Quebec, people are beginning to take pride in the presence of the magazine Actualité. But here again, the task is not over. If we wish to play our true and official role as a magazine, we must ensure that our magazine is a means of rapid information for both men and women. There is at present an investigation being conducted in the United States the conclusions of which indicate that if magazines are to survive, they must specialize. In the O'Leary Commission in 1961, I believe that there were several references to this.

Today, Actualité is specializing in a somewhat unique way for the simple reason that we do not have the population to support specialized magazines in every field. In the case of a magazine on interior decorating, it would be impossible to publish one just for the Province of Quebec. Therefore, we at Actualité have decided to include interior decoration in our magazine. The same holds true for the automobile. Accordingly, you see today a range of 17 or 18 monthly reports in Actualité. We have decided to publish a monthly supplement on industry, fashion or what have you, quite simply to offer a form of specialization and thus to attract readers. Our readers are now fully aware that in June we shall publish a supplement for Canadian businessmen similar to the supplement we published in November on skiing and snowmobiling. We are thus assuming a form of specialization through varied monthly supplements.

Mr. Fortier: And it is in this way that you meet the problem of increased specialization within the magazine industry?

Mr. Bédard: That is correct. Kindly note that we did not come to weep on anyone's shoulder, we did not come to ask for help. You will see that we are fairly plump, still smiling and that we nevertheless manage to eat. However, one fact remains. When you have—as happened recently—the arrival of a French magazine called L'Actualité Hebdomadaire which, at a given moment, decides to undertake distribution in the Province of Quebec, in a French market, my first reaction was to tell the distributing company that I refused distribution of the publication, that I would take legal means to force them to withdraw from the market. Here again, after consulting legal advisors, after doing a bit of research, I was told: "Mr. Bédard, if you can reach a friendly agreement with the organization, fine, you can withdraw the magazine; if not, it might take perhaps one, two years, and even then you may never manage to get it off the market."

At the same time, the same publishing company profited from our advertising campaigns on television and radio. Actually it deceived the public who, seeing the word "Actualité" on a newsstand, thought it was our magazine.

Senator Beaubien: Where was the magazine printed?

Mr. Bédard: In France. It is a magazine which belongs to the French government in liaison with certain French unions. It is a group of French corporations.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel that the French magazine would attempt to do the same thing which the American magazine has succeeded in doing for some years now in Canada?

Mr. Brouillé: We have noticed just the same that any French magazine such as Paris Match, Jours de France, Marie-Claire in the Province of Quebec...

Mr. Fortier: Express?

Mr. Brouillé: Express. Those who will later appear before you may tell you that they are experiencing more difficulties than we are. They are weekly magazines, whereas we are a monthly. This type of magazine, the French magazine in general does not...

Mr. Bédard: In principle, it is not a question of direct competition. It is more a question of what attracts the eye. When you approach a newsstand, you see an array of magazines: you have Express, you have English, French and American magazines. People looking for a French magazine will purchase Express because they think it comes from the Province of Quebec. This is still detrimental to a magazine such as Actualité. This would be your role—in my opinion, I feel that this is the reason for the creation of the Committee—to suggest that the government establish regulations and controls and that, before permitting a publication to enter Canada, the government should undertake a study to determine whether or not the publication would be in direct competition with the magazine Actualité or Reader's Digest. Such a publication could endanger the survival of a French or English magazine. Accordingly, it should be determined whether or not the magazine should be allowed to enter. It is perhaps—and I see that you are reacting—but nevertheless...

Mr. Fortier: Because this is somewhat contrary to what Mr. Brouillé stated earlier.

Mr. Bédard: No. When you have French-language magazine, Actualité, and when suddenly L'Actualité Hebdomadaire arrives in Canada unbeknown to Actualité...

Mr. Brouillé: There is a confusion of names.

Mr. Bédard: It comes immediately into direct competition. There is no reason for this to happen.

Mr. Fortier: But there are legal resources, obviously, which...

Mr. Bédard: Nevertheless, we have to pay. We do not have the means, in a magazine, to pay for a three-year trial.

Mr. Fortier: Why not?

Senator Beaubien: All lawyers are in favour of this.

Mr. Bédard: In addition to this, in the Province of Quebec, there are some 200 or 300 American and English magazines on the newsstands. Even though there are some English-language magazines in the Quebec newsstands, at least they are Canadian. But when one is flooded by American magazines, when one is deluged by sensational magazines, detective, sex magazines and so forth, when we watch our children go up to a newsstand to purchase Playboy and similar magazines,—when we attempt to offer them educational magazines (magazines which will make them respectable citizens)—What do we get? We get rubbish.

A magazine is published in Quebec called Vie et Carrière. It is a magazine aimed at young people, a magazine of general interest. It is a magazine which has been in existence for five years and which was founded 10 years ago. Yet it has never succeeded in making ends meet although it has tried everything. Everything has been attempted both with regard to presentation and content. Why has it failed? Because we do not have the means of reaching young people, because young people are inundated with junk.

Mr. Fortier: With regard to the control you suggest, if I understand correctly, you make no distinction between the magazine originating from the United States and the magazine from France. You state that there should be uniform restrictions?

Mr. Bédard: I feel that with regard to the importation of magazines, there should be some form of control.

Mr. Fortier: It should be uniform?

Mr. Bédard: Yes. Whether French, English, Spanish or Greek. We should have some control. After all, we in Canada are not children. We are able to write, we are even capable of presenting agreeable products.

Mr. Brouillé: Does this...

Mr. Bureau: It is quite normal that such magazines should be found just about everywhere, in hotel newsstands, and so forth; a certain quantity should be allowed to enter for the benefit of American tourists. However, to allow them to take over the Quebec market, the Canadian market, I feel, is quite abnormal.

Mr. Brouillé: For my part, I would say that we must not deprive ourselves of something which can enrich, something which comes from outside; after all, there are countries greater than ours which have something beneficial to contribute. We must enrich ourselves with the finest which the human mind can produce but we must not allow ourselves to be destroyed or swamped with just anything. When we reach this point, everything good we have is in danger of disappearing, of being buried. I feel that...

Mr. Bureau: Here again, Mr. Fortier, I am going to give you an example. The other day you had Saturday Night, a well presented magazine. You have Maclean's which is a fine English-language magazine. When the New York advertising agencies purchase advertising space in Life, let us say, they will be reaching some 150,000 persons—I do not have the exact figures—in English-speaking Canada. For General Motors, Chrysler, for large international companies, what sort of market can Saturday Night represent? When they purchase a page of advertising in Life magazine, they know that they are reaching 350,000 to 400,000 readers including persons in both English and French Canada. This sort of thing is harmful to our colleague, Saturday Night magazine.

Mr. Fortier: What worries me a little is the control you suggest over the free flow of information on the pretext that a given magazine is not as good as yours. This is more or less what you are saying although I do admit that your magazine is excellent.

Mr. Bédard: Mr. Fortier, it is impossible for us to inundate our American friends; however, you will agree that they can destroy us. Given this fact, we can be realistic enough to say that we want to be friends, that we are desirous of free exchange. However, when it is a question of culture, of the education of our population however, we wish to retain a certain control; we are not Americans, we are Canadians.

Mr. Fortier: For my part, I claim that you exercise just such control in publishing a magazine such as Actualité, a well presented magazine which is read by 110,000, 125,000, 150,000 subscribers.

Mr. Bédard: Mr. Fortier, if we did not have men whom I would term stupid among other things, such as Mr. Kierans, we could often directly compete with such a situation. But today we are no longer capable owing to the existence of this whole plan.

[English]

The Chairman: Well, I think, gentlemen, for some time now Senator Everett has had a supplementary question. Perhaps he has a series of supplementary questions.

Senator Everett: No. What do magazines in Canada lose by virtue of the import or overflow of American magazines, excluding Time and Reader's Digest?

Mr. Bédard: I do not understand your question.

Senator Everett: What do they lose in revenues by virtue of the import of overflow American magazines?

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: Might I ask you why you say with the exception of Time and Reader's Digest?

[English]

Senator Beaubien: Why would you exclude Time and Reader's Digest?

Senator Everett: Because for the purposes of argument they are Canadian magazines.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: The government has already recognized that these were Canadian magazines.

Mr. Bédard: As far as I am concerned, I have always considered Actualité, Time and Reader's Digest as Canadian magazines. We in Quebec are even proud that Time magazine and Reader's Digest are printed in the City of Montreal. However, with foreign magazines invading our newsstands—and newsstands are a good way of marketing a French Canadian magazine—we stand to lose a certain amount of revenue. We are in favour of supporting Canadian English-language magazines which have a right to survive. Many are suffering direct losses as a result of competition from American magazines. With regard to the extent of such losses, I should like Mr. Crosbie of the Magazine Advertising Bureau to give us a few figures which might assist you further.

Mr. Fortier: We were given them yesterday.

Mr. Bédard: According to Mr. Fortier, these figures were given to you yesterday.

[English]

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: I would like to have them again.

The Chairman: Do you have them again, Mr. Crosbie?

Mr. John Crosbie, Magazine Advertising Bureau: Unfortunately, I do not have them in my possession at this time, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Do you want them this afternoon because they are in my office.

Senator Everett: I just wondered what the figures indicate.

The Chairman: Can you summarize them, Mr. Crosbie? I am sure you can.

Mr. Crosbie: Insofar as advertising income is concerned—if I understand the Senator's question to be: How much do we lose by people using American-based magazines to reach the Canadian public—this is an area in which there is no good factual answer that may be supplied because one has to go into the area of conjecture as to whether or not an advertised based in the United States would or would not have used the Canadian media had he not chosen for his own purposes within his own market to use an American magazine which happens to come into Canada.

For that reason we cannot answer the question I think you are asking.

Senator Everett: It cannot be answered.

Mr. Crosbie: Not in that context.

The Chairman: Was that the basic question you were asking.

Senator Everett: Yes. That was the basic question I was asking. Since that cannot be answered I wonder how germane this is to the problem that Mr. Bédard raises. Mr. Bédard then talks about the fact it is based on the newsstand, the area from which they distribute the bulk of their magazines.

How are the postal rates applicable, if that is the case.

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: It is essential that we understand each other. I stated that newsstands are one of the best means of marketing, of soliciting readers, of making friends. However, with our magazine, 95 percent of our circulation is by mail.

Senator Beaubien: How much?

Mr. Bédard: 95 percent. We operate on a subscription basis but, nevertheless, the newsstand is important for us in gaining greater recognition. It is not enough to advertise over television and radio. If a product is advertised but cannot be found, it is like looking for a needle in a haystack.

Senator Beaubien: I understand.

Mr. Bédard: The matter becomes hopeless and from this arise all the problems related to the marketing of a magazine, our magazine, a magazine such as Actualité or a Canadian magazine. Does this answer your question, Sir?

[English]

Senator Everett: What is the circulation of Life in your circulation area?

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: Life magazine must draw...

[English]

Senator Everett: Well now, there were figures given at that presentation yesterday. I do not know if Mr. Crosbie has them.

The Chairman: Have you got the Life figure with you?

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, I happen to have that figure with me. In the Province of Quebec, the circulation of Life is 35,827 issued circulation.

Senator Everett: What about Look?

Mr. Crosbie: Look is 26,639.

Senator Everett: Just one more; Time—have you got Time?

Mr. Crosbie: The Canadian edition—have I got that?

The Chairman: It was four hundred and fifty thousand, was it not?

Senator Everett: That circulation is not in contention with your circulation? We are talking about newsstand space.

It would seem that Actualité would get greater space as far as the newsstand operators are concerned? Did you say your circulation was one hundred thousand odd?

Mr. Bédard: It is not based on this idea.

Senator Beaubien: One is a weekly and the other is a monthly.

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: It is not based on this idea. It is somewhat the same as selling catsup in a supermarket. If you are powerful enough to have six feet of shelf space in a supermarket to sell catsup, and if someone else has only one foot to sell catsup then...

You will sell much more catsup with six feet of shelf space than with one foot. It is somewhat the same thing for a magazine. Let us say that there are between 250 and 300 magazines in a newsstand. Perhaps seven or eight spaces will be left for the French-language magazines, and perhaps 25 or 30 for the Canadian English-language magazines. The American and European magazines take up the balance. The advantage of space becomes obvious. The space reserved for American magazines in our newsstands invariably harms Canadian publications which are not as numerous. And if you can prove to me that there are a series of Canadian consumer magazines which cover all topics on which the public may require information, then I shall withdraw my statements in this regard. I feel that these are conspicuous by their absence.

[English]

Senator Everett: It just seems to me that in the Quebec market you have, vis-à-vis, the imported magazines, a fairly dominant position.

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: We certainly have a dominant position. However, when a person approaches a newsstand to purchase a magazine such as Actualité and then sees a picture of Mrs. Kennedy and Mr. Onassis on an American magazine such as Motion Picture, picks it up and buys it, then a Canadian magazine suffers; an American magazine has just been sold.

Just how much this benefits the Canadian people remains to be seen. It is the whole range of magazines which works against us.

You have Toronto Life who, I believe, are going to present their brief to you this evening. Toronto Life is a terrific magazine. You have Toronto Life, you have a host of Canadian magazines which deserve double their circulation but which cannot attain it quite simply because of the presence among us of people like this. I am not against the presence of foreign magazines, but at least let us have a limited quantity of them. Magazines such as Life and Look organize door-to-door sales campaigns and attempt to find French Canadians in the Province of Quebec, let us say, who will sign a three-year contract valued at $80 whereby they will receive a French magazine and seven American publications—this is almost a case of entry by force. They show colour photographs to the housewife. Often there are women who purchase such magazines without being able to read a word of English or who, even if they do read English, simply look at the pictures.

[English]

Senator Everett: But the statistics do not bear you out though. The largest circulation magazine, according to these figures, in Quebec is Playboy at 89,764. You do not pretend to be competitive. You are saying, Mr. Bédard, that a person who buys an American magazine does not buy a Canadian magazine. I doubt if there is a Canadian magazine that in any way vaguely competes with Playboy.

Mr. Bédard: Senator...

Senator Everett: Just to make a point. The next one is fifty thousand, National Geographic—again a special interest magazine. You do not compete with that.

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: I shall answer your question on this point. Do not think that the press which prints the magazine Actualité would refuse to print the breasts of a beautiful woman. Nevertheless, we must retain a certain standard and self-respect. If our neighbours wish to produce this sort of magazine, let them go ahead. However, to allow our young people to become immersed in this, to pay $1 for a few pictures—which are very lovely, I admit, I often enjoy them—but there are limits. If you take a magazine such as Vie et Carrière which is devoted to young people, you have difficulty in extracting 35 cents from them. Then when they turn around and pay $3 for a magazine showing naked women, well, you begin to ask yourself questions. A people's desire for sensation is easy to exploit.

Tomorrow morning, if I decided to print a magazine with naked women, whether it be Playboy or any other, I am convinced that I would sell at least 200,000 copies in the Province of Quebec. But where is Canadian culture, biculture, French culture in all this? With regard to inflation, if we could avoid foolish expenditures of this kind, we could control it too.

[English]

Senator Everett: Are you saying the people of Quebec should not have the pleasure of looking at the center spread of Playboy? Is that bad for them?

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: No. It is not a question of whether that might be bad for them. I do not know whether you have already noticed French-Canadian women, but I think they are considered as beautiful women, aren't they?

Senator Quart: As a mother and a grandmother, I congratulate you, and not because I am against you but because I am for you. So I find that, especially for young people, it is a great, great danger.

Mr. Bédard: Perhaps you are going to find—I don't know—perhaps you think I lack resolve.

Senator Quart: No.

Mr. Bédard: At my age, perhaps I am right in being irresolute. At 27, a person can't do everything. It isn't a matter of those magazines being found in the bookstores, but in their being found in places of specialization. In those instances, I have nothing against them—but when they are found laying around everywhere, then I wonder.

How is it that a newspaper like Midnight will sell 600,000 copies in English and 150,000 in French to sell a pack of lies? And all that is yet another practice of American origin that has befallen us Canadians.

[English]

The Chairman: Senator Everett, is that all?

Senator Everett: I just wanted to make one point. I am sorry, I do not know what Midnight is.

The Chairman: You do not know what Midnight is? We will get you a copy and you will see. You can imagine.

Senator Prowse: The opposite to the Noon.

The Chairman: Senator Quart.

Senator Quart: Practically speaking, Mr. Chairman, there is a limit to where decency begins and ends. I am far from being scrupulous but at the same time I think some of these magazines now (especially all those ones that play up the new morality and sex)—you would think they just discovered it.

Mr. Fortier: You have discovered it many years ago.

Senator Quart: That is right. It is old hat for me.

Senator Everett: I am not interested in that type of magazine. It just worries me when somebody comes and says you ought to put an embargo on the importation of information from the rest of the world.

I suggest to you that in the figures that we have looked at in the last little while, there is no real indication that you are being hurt that badly by them.

Maybe we can look at it if you are being hurt extremely seriously but I honestly do not feel from the figures that we have just discussed that you are being hurt that badly. There may be other things by which you are being hurt. There may be other things we ought to look at but I do not see where you are being hurt by any importation.

I think we ought to be very careful before we start restricting the inflow of information.

The Chairman: Mr. Crosbie?

Mr. Crosbie: I would not want to leave with the Senators the impression—from what I said in response to a direct question about loss of income caused by the use of American magazines in Canada,—that this is not a sizeable concern.

As I said yesterday, when I had the pleasure of appearing before you, that this is the most prevalent topic that comes up in dealing with American advertising agencies based in the States and conversing with my office.

I am convinced from the numerous examples which I prefer not to identify here, as to the names of the American or major international advertisers who are using, to my knowledge, American magazines to reach Canada, that whatever the figure is, it is indeed a sizeable figure and a very real problem to local Canadian magazines.

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: In answer to the Senator's question... It isn't a question... I am not thinking of cutting off communications. When I say to set up...

Senator Quart: Again we see the advantage of being bilingual.

Mr. Bédard: I am not asking for communications, especially at the level of political and cultural news from our American or our European friends, to be cut off. But I do not see what a magazine like Motion Picture or Police and their like can honestly accomplish in Quebec culture to help us build a strong and united Canada. Often, it is said that all kinds of gadgets are found in the hands of the young people. These same gadgets have been found in the American magazines, or things like that. No, I am not saying that about a magazine such as Business Week, one that I appreciate and like to receive. Actually, intellectual magazines, or those of general interest for people from a news standpoint are nonetheless necessary. Between that and allowing oneself to be inundated by magazines which have no reason for being here in Canada, in our country...

[English]

Mr. Brouillé: What Mr. Bédard relies on is this: It is because of the variety of these magazines on the newsstands. Many people could make a comparison in the presentation and when the presentation acts as a stimulant, a special stimulant of something like that—you know, the human being is like this. He will prefer something that looks more luxurious than something else and it is not to the benefit of the Canadian publication.

That is the point which Mr. Bédard wants to emphasize.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Although I have no wish to shift the emphasis of the problem, I feel obliged to ask the following question: To what extent is a magazine such as yours required to reflect contemporary society? To what extent is it required to satisfy the needs or the taste of the readers or to respond to the problem issues of the day?

Mr. Brouillé: I think it necessary to consider the needs, for as long as the needs require it and appear valid to us, we have to reflect all these needs that are being expressed. In other words, we must reflect the various trends of opinion—for instance, a certain development which has not yet stood the test of time, but which seems to have some value. We must assert ourselves. But I think that, in any case, the popular magazine should not, nor can it other than with great difficulty, but what we call an "avant-garde"—magazine. It must be very flexible, it must be "avant-garde" in outlook, contain "avante-garde" material and not be systematically "avant-garde" if it is a popular magazine.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent has the magazine Actualité attempted to meet these requirements?

Mr. Brouillé: Let us say that with the means at our disposal, we have tried—being a monthly publication with an abundance of views, news, judgments and comments—to single out common denominators that will enable us to put them in their proper perspective.

Mr. Fortier: Am I right in inferring that the common denominators are the specialties Mr. Bédard was speaking about a little while ago? The vertical rather than the horizontal specialties?

Mr. Brouillé: That is to say, the magazine contains certain varied but regular articles consistent with the general interest and which provides practical and necessary information on given subjects which come up regularly. Even so, it is necessary to give the magazine a certain pattern and, furthermore, we have a "feature" article directly associated with current political, social, economic, artistic and religious issues, etc.

Mr. Fortier: That is something akin to the presentation of Time Magazine, is it not, Mr. Brouillé?

Mr. Brouillé: Let us say, material-wise, we have the same general interests and the same facts. So, the same elements are found as in Time Magazine, except that we do not yet have a representative in Vietnam or Korea...

Mr. Bédard: You're not going to have any.

Mr. Brouillé: We will not have any because that is not our purpose.

Mr. Fortier: I think that to have a circulation of 125,000 today is a success. I believe you were saying a short time ago that you were aiming for a circulation of about 175,000?

Mr. Bédard: How many people are there in the province of Québec?

Mr. Fortier: Five million French-Canadians.

Mr. Bédard: Don't you think that when one has a circulation of 200,000 it could then be called a success?

Mr. Fortier: Evidently, in your case, it would be a great success just the same.

Mr. Bédard: 125,000 is a normal figure.

Mr. Fortier: How did you attain that level?

Mr. Bédard: By door to door sales, by promotion and by television. It takes work, continual work.

Mr. Brouillé: Do not forget that Mr. Bédard, if he were to think of it now would impress upon us that 14 months ago when the new owners acquired Actualité, the subscribers of Actualité—I would say, almost 75 to 80 per cent were one year customers. Now, over the past 14 months, 60 per cent of the customers have been holding subscriptions for one year, two years or longer and there is even quite a high percentage of 3-year subscribers. These figures show that the public responds to, is aware of and cares about the improvements that have been made to the product.

Mr. Fortier: And the companies that publish it too?

Mr. Brouillé: In their case, if we wanted a reaction to the improved product, it would come from the advertising agencies, because we don't work miracles. Like the other magazines, we rely on the advertising agencies to ascertain whether a medium is valid and whether it will reach a steadily growing public. We are being presented with an increasingly stronger patronage. All these factors constitute sound reasons for making Actualité a worthwhile advertising medium.

Mr. Bédard: Nonetheless, Mr. Brouillé does not mean that publicity and the advertising agencies do not understand us.

Mr. Brouillé: No, besides, we say as much in the brief.

Mr. Bédard: At the present time, we feel that the advertising agencies really want to start the ball rolling.

Mr. Fortier: Actually, this 125,000 circulation is something like the riddle of the chicken and the egg. Am I right in saying that when you acquired this 125,000 circulation, you did it without the publicity you have today?

Mr. Bédard: Officially, yes.

Mr. Fortier: I think it is well-known fact. Advertising comes once you have become established on the market, does it not?

Mr. Brouillé: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: Did you meet that problem?

Mr. Bédard: Circulation is a very important point, let us say, with regard to the advertising agency. It represents from 50 to 70 per cent of the decision. There is also the matter of presentation and editing. Some agencies now run offices in Montreal and have some French persons on their staff who voice their opinions on, let us say for instance, the magazine content. Actualité then takes a stand and asserts itself. There is a struggle on the editorial level—a struggle a magazine has to fight—that is to say, the struggle to cast the seed in the people to fight the squalor that surrounds us.. the filth we find almost everywhere.

Mr. Fortier: Did Mr. Brouillé say earlier that the world of advertising is showing itself to be more and more congenial?

Mr. Brouillé: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Was it due to the presentation of your product that this increased congeniality was shown?

Mr. Brouillé: Let us say that there has been some progress. Actualité celebrates its 10th anniversary this year. So this progress has been long coming. It took 6 or 7 years for Actualité to be considered seriously in the advertising agencies, but this recognition now exists, confirming what Mr. Bédard was saying a little earlier on—that currently we have no cause to complain of the reception given the magazine Actualité in the advertising world.

Mr. Fortier: Did that help you join the M.A.B.?

Mr. Bédard: The Magazine Advertising Bureau? I think that in the field of information, it is a step forward. Amongst other things, I congratulate Mr. Crosbie for the work he has accomplished within the organization, because the magazine, with respect to its revenue, frequently did not have the means to pay for all the research and through the association, it can now be afforded. From the marketing aspect, it is sensational all that the Magazine Advertising Bureau is able to do for us at the present time, and, in my opinion, that should not go unnoticed. The presence of the Magazine Advertising Bureau is a great stride forward.

[English]

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett has a supplementary question on this.

Senator Everett: In your oral statement you said that you were having difficulty. The advertising agencies were not informed on Actualité due perhaps to the language difference.

Mr. Brouillé: Yes.

Senator Everett: I wanted to know what you had done to overcome that. Is the Magazine Advertising Bureau the only method that you have used to overcome that?

Mr. Brouillé: No. I would not say that. We have our agency the Paul L'Anglais Inc. Agency with offices in Toronto, where we keep some people there as representatives and they can give information concerning the contents and validity of Actualité among the agencies posted in Toronto.

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: Even so, I believe it is nine months since we became members of the Magazine Advertising Bureau and that, let's say, was the starting point. I think we shall derive a great deal from that in the future. Today, nevertheless, all it has given us is something along the lines of recognition, among the leading Canadian magazines because, we have to admit, the Magazine Advertising Bureau is composed of leading Canadian magazines. So when a magazine joins the Magazine Advertising Bureau, it has obtained the satisfaction of being an important French-Canadian magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Was it hard for you to gain admission to this Bureau? Was your circulation checked by ABC?

Mr. Bédard: At the outset, I believed it would be hard, but I was surprised. We received a warm welcome, and people quickly informed us about everything that could happen within the organization, and they even tried to give us certain suggestions so that our magazine could already be presented on a par with the other magazines. No animosity was felt on the part of the people from Maclean-Hunter, Reader's Digest and Time magazine towards the magazine

Actualité with regard to its application to join the organization.

Mr. Fortier: We have been told here that if Senator O'Leary's recommendations had been accepted by the Canadian Government nine years ago, and if Time and Reader's Digest had been barred from the Canadian market as Canadian entities, the magazine industry would have disappeared. Can you make any comment on this? Does this remark hold true in the case of the French-Canadian magazine?

Mr. Bédard: That is after all a rather strong statement.

Mr. Fortier: I think you can see why. The argument was that they had such a large share of the piece of cake that if they were to disappear, would not a part of the advertising they were receiving be necessarily directed towards Maclean's or Chatelaine?

Mr. Bédard: No, the magazine is a tool—a most important news medium. In future, the magazine is going to replace many of the daily newspapers, and even if Reader's Digest or Time Magazine had gone out of print, that would not have changed anything. It would have increased the revenue of organizations such as Maclean-Hunter or all those groups. I do not believe it would have affected the magazines to the point of saying that the magazines might have disappeared.

Mr. Brouillé: The presence of Time, Reader's Digest and Sélection did not prevent La Revue Populaire, Le Samedi and La Revue Moderne from disappearing in Quebec.

Mr. Bédard: Actually one often has heard talk of a special status for Quebec. Where magazines are concerned, we are somewhat in that position. It always comes back to the cost of production in relation to the market, and if a person could say he has a chance of selling to a population of 17,000,000, it would greatly change the look of things. Unfortunately, a person is going to sell English magazines to French-Canadians more easily than he will sell French magazines to the English. Do you understand?

Mr. Fortier: Do you make sales outside Quebec—in New Brunswick, for example, or in Manitoba?

Mr. Bédard: Let's say that we have a few subscribers in those provinces. Actualité itself is in the process of being completely restructured. First and foremost, the success of a magazine or publication depends on the administration, and it takes a very strict administration under a maximum of control.

[English]

The Chairman: I think Senator Everett has a supplementary.

Senator Everett: No, it's not a supplementary.

The Chairman: It is another question altogether. Fine.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: You produce a magazine, do you not, that could be read by French-Canadians in New Brunswick or by French-Canadians in Montreal?

Mr. Bédard: Officially, yes. But, the means of reaching the French-Canadian in New Brunswick—you know the situation with regard to Evangéline—is so costly for us. I am not referring to mail consignments—whereas formerly 2½ cents was the price mentioned, today it is 6 cents. If you dispatch 100,000 envelopes, you are talking of several thousands of dollars, whereas formerly a person could, in spite of everything, keep himself going by a profitable rate on the return mail. It should not be believed that when you send out 1,000 envelopes, you receive 100 subscriptions, because in mailing it is quite difficult to obtain a balance which permits us to survive.

Mr. Fortier: Is there any room in Quebec for another genuinely French-Canadian monthly magazine?

Mr. Bédard: Hardly. There would be some difficulties, all the same, because Maclean's is there, after all. First, the authorities have decided to make a French version of Maclean's in which a large part of the translation and some articles will be of Quebec origin. But, you come across an odd English part translated. And in that case too, with the prolific supply of magazines and weekly and daily newspapers, it would be quite difficult to make a place for oneself in the sun. That is what we might call a problem in the life of the magazine Sept Jours. In order for a magazine like Sept Jours to be able to make its own way and establish a patronage, which could make it viable, it would take another $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 in investments. When you ask a businessman to invest $2,000,000 to $3,000,000 in a magazine, you can be sure he is looking at the Stock Exchange and industrial listings. He takes a look at the industry and then frequently, his decision changes.

Mr. Fortier: Is Actualité a magazine which is economically viable today?

Mr. Bédard: Actualité is viable, and it is going to become more so because, definitely, a series of magazines is going to be developed which will enable us to have "proof administration" and which will permit us to really survive and hang on. I am not telling you that we will make millions with the magazine, but we will survive.

Mr. Fortier: Are you not afraid of the technology of the future?

Mr. Bédard: No, because the magazine will complement television and radio. It should never be forgotten, publicity-wise, that you can always advertise a car on television, or you can always advertise Air Canada on television, with a fine colour commercial. But you will never be able to put on television the coupon you see here at the foot of the Air Canada advertisement, just as on television you will never be able to give the technical specifications required to advertise a vehicle. With television, you cannot turn your screen back five minutes to see through the Chrysler commercial again to find out what they said. But in a magazine you can always move around from page to page.

Mr. Fortier: If we are to believe the word of some erudite persons, we will perhaps be able to do that with our TV sets within the next 10 years.

Mr. Bédard: Perhaps.

Mr. Brouillé: That is to say, if they provide the time for using them at the same time.

[English]

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Bédard, the reference to Sept Jours reminds me we do have another witness this afternoon. I am afraid we must terminate this session.

After I turn to Senator Everett who has, I know, a question, then I am afraid we must perhaps move on unless anyone has another final question.

Senator Everett: You stated Mr. Bédard, that in your judgement the magazine will replace the newspaper. Would you care to discuss that further?

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: Today, you have to work. I mean, the individual who really wants to work, has to work between 12 and 14 or 16 hours a day. In the evening, when he gets home, he often does not have the time to open a daily paper to see 123 or 126 pages and glance through them. It is true also of the businessman who is inclined towards more specialized reading—and, more particularly, the one who wants to keep up with the provincial news but is not interested in crime, theft, and all the licentiousness that one can have in life today. He will know very well that he can find in the magazines all the information necessary to satisfy his soul, all presented in a condensed, digested form and pleasantly presented, that is to say, without dirtying his hands. When you pick up a newspaper you have to pass between the sensational news items on the front page and proceed to the obituaries on the back page by way of the advertisements and "specials" that offer one cent less on a can of tomato juice, ect. The magazine is really going to become man's medium for obtaining news rapidly and simply. Moreover, that is what makes Time Magazine such a success. You shouldn't imagine that the person who reads Time Magazine from the international standpoint is going to be fully informed, and the same applies to Newsweek too. Often, in Time Magazine, you will see a news item that ran 400 lines and three columns when published in a daily newspaper condensed to 15 lines. The news item was embellished for you in the newspaper; in the magazine you were given the general idea of the news item, containing either the outcome or the actual consequence of the news, and that is all. When you come across certain articles, let's say, which may interest the hunter, golfer, skier, prospective bride and so on, in a newspaper, you do not have the facility for presenting them so appealingly with coloured photographs etc. That is where the specialized magazines and other magazines are going to gain ground with the people by their presentation, due to their colours and their condensed editing, as well as all the possible and impossible new articles.

In the evening, in the case of a daily paper, if you have sold 74 pages of advertisements and publish them on a 50/50 basis, you have 74 pages of copy to put in your daily newspaper. I do not need to tell you that you do not have the material for producing 74 pages of copy every day. You are compelled to use the blocking technique and in doing so you are obliged to arrange the pages in a way that is pleasing to everyone, and in such a way that people will read from page to page. That is why, in a given situation, you put back the end of the article, started on page 1, to page 32, and at other times, from page 1 to page 32 and on to page 54, and vice versa.

Now, the magazine is the simple medium due to its format, its condensed editing and its contents.

[English]

Senator Everett: Do you think then that the newspaper will disappear entirely?

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: I say that there will come a certain time when you will see large daily papers go out of circulation, just as you will see other weekly newspapers gain ground because, today, we live by the clock. Previously, on the contrary, we lived by our needs. If our needs were X, we lived with X; today, we live with time. When you have spent a day at work and you take an hour in the car to get home, and when you have a television programme on Channel 2 like "Format 60" which is a spoken magazine and gives you the facts, who is going to make you read a daily newspaper? Then, you know that all the reading left for you in the daily paper is often in the sports pages and the obituaries.

[English]

Senator Everett: We are told that part of the interest that a reader has in a newspaper is not only the editorial material but some of the advertising material. We are told that large numbers of people buy newspapers for the classified advertisements and also for the department store advertisements.

What would happen to that segment of the reading public.

[Translation]

Mr. Bédard: I can tell you that if all the buyers of advertisements were really what are called—well, it's an English expression "marketing men"—you can be sure that daily newspapers would often be hard put to sell advertisements. When you have an advertisement that takes up two 100-line columns in a newspaper like La Presse, and when you take 100 persons and ask them if they have seen such an advertisement when browsing through the pages of La Presse you are going to get some surprises. Perhaps, out of 100 persons, you are going to have one or two who have seen the advertisement, and then again perhaps 100 persons will tell you: "I haven't seen the advertisement." You are submerged in a sea, in fact, of copy and advertisements. When you take companies such as Steinberg's and Eaton's and the like, who give you three, four, five or six pages, it can be extremely profitable for them because they fill up a complete section of the newspaper for you. You are more or less forced to look at those advertisements.

One thing needs to be considered. You often see advertisers in magazines, such as the automobile companies those companies advertise in the magazine quite simply because they can really illustrate the qualities of their products with the true colours and simple specifications, all on a single page without being inundated on all sides by other advertisers attracting attention in a variety of ways. From the publicity standpoint, I think that the advertising technique in Canada is quite well developed. I think more men capable of managing advertising budgets are being trained. If you think back 10 years, one didn't see so many "marketing" courses and courses in planning advertising budgets and so on. Today, you see them advertised more or less everywhere. When someone becomes really aware of the importance of advertising, on the return for dollars invested, you can rest assured that these investments are subject to much more control, and the magazine allows you some degree of control. There is still one thing. When you take a third of a column in a magazine, you can be sure you will not have three kinds of columns of advertisement one beside the other. You will have one third of a column. On another page, you will not have a page of advertising, but a page of copy. As for me, I know very well that often I don't have the time to read the daily paper. When I leave the office, I go for supper, meet a couple of friends and arrive home towards 11.00 or 11.30 p.m.—I must, after all spend a few minutes with my wife—and then I go to bed. The next day, when I arrive at the office, and if I happen to pick up a magazine—Business Week, Actualité, Saturday Night or any of those magazines, I will take the time to leaf through them while making a telephone call. I will flip through the pages while speaking, and I will look at the headlines and so on. It is simple and easy to do, whereas in the case of the daily paper, you have to make movements. There is a host of drawbacks to the daily newspaper. And, please note, I am now trying to sell you my product.

But, perhaps one day you will be buying advertising in the magazines.

[English]

Senator Everett: Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Bédard, I am sorry. You said a few minutes ago that time is of the essence. I am afraid that is very much the case with the Committee. We must move on to our next witness.

I am perhaps one of those Canadians who is more familiar with English language magazines and indeed even with the American overflow magazines than I am with yours although I do see it from time to time.

I have been impressed with the presentation just as every time I go through the magazine—I do not mean simply this afternoon but also other times I have done so, I am always impressed with its appearance.

One of the witnesses last night, Mr. Lefolli made a reference to the feeling one has when he looks at a publication. I think what he was able to articulate—and which I cannot—is the kind of feeling one has when he looks at your magazine.

You said in your initial opening statement that you were delighted that we insisted you come before us. Having listened to the presentation, we are delighted that we insisted and by thanking you, I hope you will express our appreciation and that of the entire committee to your colleagues as well.

Thank you for being here.

May I say to the Senators, we will break now for five minutes and at 4.20 literally, we will begin the brief from Sept-Jours.

The Chairman: Honorable Senators, if we can begin, please. This afternoon we are receiving a brief from Sept-Jours. Sitting on my right is the president, Mr. Robert Allard.

Mr. Allard, I believe that you are going to make an oral statement now. Following your oral statement the Senators would like to question you on what you say now and perhaps on some things you do not say now. So why do you not just proceed.

Mr. Robert Allard (Président, Sept-Jours): Thank you very much.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, Senators and members of the Committee, I wish to offer my apologies for not having prepared a brief for the Committee.

My association with Sept-Jours goes back to March 1, 1969. At that time I thought of it as a long-term investment. I became General Manager of the magazine Jan. 7, 1970 when the former General Manager, Jean-Marc Provost left. I could not neglect my activities in other more profitable ventures in order to devote all my time to Sept-Jours. Due to the emergency of the situation and the motivation to meet an interesting challenge, I am now Editor and General Manager of Sept-Jours. I shall remain there for as long as is necessary to insure the survival of a magazine which I believe provides an essential news service to French Canada.

Because of the many positions I hold, I did not have time to prepare a brief. However, I did not want to refuse the honour of appearing before you and presenting some thoughts to you concerning publishing and journalism in French Canada. I would also like to convince you of the need for a weekly news review in French Canada and encourage you to work toward something of this nature in English Canada.

Sept-Jours exists because, with situations changing from day, the public gets its news in bits and pieces from radio, television and newspapers. It follows that the Canadian citizen has to form his own impression of the news (with the help of his memory which is often faulty) which leaves him with a very inaccurate impression. Hence the need for magazines that provide a summing up of weekly news. Countries like the United States, France, England, Germany, Italy and others have recognized the need for such a service and have established weekly news magazines.

The Canadian reader if he wishes to obtain a synthesis of international news he has to rely on foreign magazines. Time is the only English language publication which devotes four pages to Canada. Obviously, a four page summary of Canadian news is grossly insufficient and does not constitute a valuable source of information for Canadians. The establishment of a publication in Canada similar to "Time" should be encouraged.

The only Canadian-owned weekly news magazine is Sept-Jours. After three years of continuous publication the circulation of our magazine is just over 11,000 copies per week. This may seem small to the average observer but we are aware of the difficulty involved in changing the reading habits of a public that has not yet become accustomed to reading a summary of the news.

Up to now only French Canadians with a level of education above Grade II have felt the need to read a summary of the news. Being bilingual they have satisfied this need by reading Time, Express or some other foreign magazine. The majority of readers do not yet feel the need of a summary of Canadian news; we will have to be patient. The slow penetration of Sept-Jours may be attributed to an awkward formula, or perhaps the lack of a cohesive editorial team, or the search for a workable formula. But there is no doubt that the circulation of Sept-Jours will increase steadily. The new management has already begun to hire new staff and persuade the team to work more in the direction of a synthesis of the news. We believe that this policy will increase circulation more rapidly.

The frantic race to increase circulation by all sorts of artificial methods is responsible for the malaise experienced by publications of this kind in the United States, Europe as well as in Canada.

At the present time the only real source of profit for magazines is the sale of advertising which offsets losses sustained by the circulation department. This is an anomaly and Sept-Jours is trying to avoid this trap by collecting from its readers an annual subscription charge of $10.00. This covers circulation costs and helps to pay publishing costs. This subscription policy assures us, in the language of the trade, of a better profile of our readers since it is obvious that anyone who pays $10.00 for a subscription to a review is going to read it. All other magazines have come down to the point of paying the reader, in one way or another, to subscribe to their publications. The owners of these magazines (in Canada as well as in the United States) try to and succeed in defeating the purpose of the Audit Bureau of Circulation which is the vouch for the reader appeal of a magazine. We believe the advertiser is hurt by this: this is the reason that—in the long or short run—with radio and television on the basis of profit-earning capacity.

Concerning the criteria of excellence, it is obvious that any Canadian publication must be equal in calibre to publications from other countries. However the problem is by no means insignificant. The main problem that faces all French language magazines in Canada is that its reading public is necessarily limited. Yet the reader who is used to reading large American publications will judge our magazine according to the same standards of excellence of the magazines he has been reading. It is important that a magazine like ours, having the same quality of our presentation, colours, layout and editorials match the quality they are used to finding in Time, Newsweek or other publications of this kind. The criteria of excellence is based not only on the readers but on the advertisers as well. This makes the handling of copy and editorial news difficult. We are judged on standards of excellence which are difficult for small establishments to maintain. Taking all these factors into consideration Sept-Jours is a very good magazine. We are convinced that the weekly news magazine will survive and will be read more and more as time passes by the Canadian reader.

The Chairman: Thank you so much.

I think that perhaps the questioning will begin with Mr. Fortier.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: I believe you were present a little while ago when Mr. Bédard told us that it would take two or three million dollars to make Sept-Jours a viable undertaking. Would you care to comment on this?

Mr. Allard: To date the total losses of Sept-Jours have been considerable, somewhere in the neighbourhood of $450,000. These are losses that were sustained before I went to Sept-Jours a year ago. Last year the magazine's total losses were $47,000. With a two to three million dollar loss before my arrival at Sept-Jours and only $47,000 since I took over, I'll be there for another sixty years.

Mr. Fortier: Sixty years. How do you propose to deal with the problems that are assailing you from all sides? How do you propose to increase circulation on the one hand and not prostitute your product on the other?

Mr. Allard: I don't think that I will be in too much of a hurry to increase circulation. I am a believer in circulation and I believe that in my time I have had enough experience to be able to increase the circulation of publications. I believe in circulation if the readers do not suffer and if we don't have to give something away to get them to buy our magazine. I believe that this is a mistake that many magazines are making in America today.

Mr. Fortier: They attach too much importance to circulation as you said a while ago?

Mr. Allard: You can try anything, even twisting a man's arm to make him buy a magazine. There are all sorts of ways to entice him to buy seven magazines for the price...

Mr. Fortier: Is this done?

Mr. Allard: This is done. You can also give the reader three books of Shakespeare if he buys a $2.00 subscription. There are all kinds of gimmicks. Magazines as a whole use gimmicks. But no one has yet taken the reader by the scruff of the neck and forced him to stick his nose in a magazine. How can you be sure that advertising gets results? As for myself I don't know what to think about this. At the present time I think that magazines are afraid of losing their advertising to radio and television. I think that this is because they are not sure of their readers.

Mr. Fortier: How are you going to get your readers?

Mr. Allard: I think it's a question of penetration, of the quality of the product. It's up to us to provide the quality that people want.

Mr. Fortier: You think that this will bring in advertising as well?

Mr. Allard: I think that advertising will increase with the demand for the magazine, of course it will.

Mr. Fortier: What is...

Mr. Allard: It's a question of results too, for when they say that advertising agencies have no way of knowing the effectiveness of an ad, they are wrong. They have excellent ways of measuring the effectiveness of an advertisement. If you take an ad like the one that appears at the back of the magazine, you have criteria on which to base its effectiveness. If the ad in our paper (with a circulation of 11,000) is just as effective as an ad in another magazine with a circulation of 20,000, I would go and see the advertiser because I would be assured of an interested reader instead of a reader who had been forced to buy my magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Have you an order of priority at Sept-Jours at the present time?

Mr. Allard: I expect that priority will be given to applying the formula that we have printed here, in French. I would like to outline the aims of Sept-Jours, state its policy and the objective of that policy: to provide the people of Canada with a summary of the important news of the week, avoiding news items in order to concentrate on the essential Canadian and international news; to be a conscientious objective digest of the news—the witness but not the judge of events; to have faith in Canadian unity while allowing for the diversity of opinions, the political out-looks and the aspirations of its ethnic groups; to join in the search for a Canadian identity (conscious and proud of but not tied to its French and English ancestry) through its editorial pages; to offer constructive criticism aimed at solving current problems. In short this is the written formula, but I don't think it has really been applied to the magazine yet. It is up to us to see that the editorial team abides by this policy.

[English]

The Chairman: I wanted to ask you a question about the document you were reading from.

Mr. Allard: Yes.

The Chairman: Presumably this is an English translation.

Mr. Allard: Yes, it is.

The Chairman: I apologize to the Senators. I asked Mr. Allard if there were additional copies and there are not but I would like the Senators to see it.

I would like to ask a couple of questions arising out of what you have said. You said Sept-Jours is the only weekly Canadian magazine. It serves Canada as Time serves United States. Does Time not provide a service for Canadians?

Mr. Allard: If English speaking Canadians are satisfied with four pages of Canadian news—not Canadian news, but the Canadian synthesis of the news of the week—if you are satisfied with that I would say that Time is a Canadian magazine.

But you will have to be satisfied with four pages and giving them forty pages of advertising every week also.

The Chairman: Well, as a Canadian who is bilingual and who I am sure reads English infinitely more effectively than I read French, you do not think Time does a job for your purposes?

Mr. Allard: I do not think it does. Four pages of some news, of the Canadian news. If that is all that Canada has to say, well, I mean, that is very little.

The Chairman: Well, I think the most obvious question, without declaring myself on the question I have asked—and this is a question which was discussed at great lengths this morning when the Time Magazine people were before the Committee...

Have you ever considered an English edition of Sept-Jours for English Canada?

Mr. Allard: Yes, but that would be another $3,000,000. I only have $3,000,000.

The Chairman: Would you agree that there is a potential market there for someone?

Mr. Allard: There is.

The Chairman: To do exactly what you have done in Quebec?

Mr. Allard: I think there is. It would have been easier.

The Chairman: In English Canada?

Mr. Allard: It would have been easier to put out an English language magazine, yes.

The Chairman: Do you think that?

Mr. Allard: My only trouble is that I am French.

The Chairman: Mr. Allard, I apologize for asking you this question. It may not be fair to you but do you think that an English version of Sept-Jours published in Montreal or in Toronto could compete effectively with the Canadian edition of Time.

Mr. Allard: Very easily.

The Chairman: Would you care to explain how you think that would be possible?

Mr. Allard: Well, if you ask Canadians to talk about their own country, I think they can do it better than the Americans can do it. There should be in English Canada some very good journalists. I know an lot of them because I read English newspapers. I think you can do it.

The only thing is you need someone who will decide to do it.

The Chairman: Why do you not decide to do it?

Mr. Allard: I would be ready to do it. The only thing is let me go over the first three million and then I will go over the second three million.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: As for circulation, what figure would you be satisfied with? You might very well answer that you will never be satisfied. But what is the figure?

Mr. Allard: Twenty thousand.

Mr. Fortier: Only twenty thousand?

Mr. Allard: That's all I need.

Mr. Fortier: You think that if you had twenty thousand readers you would have a financially viable magazine?

Mr. Allard: Twenty thousand readers who I had not forced to buy the magazine.

Mr. Fortier: If you had your twenty thousand readers would you think about publishing an English edition thereby doing the reverse of what Maclean's Magazine did?

Mr. Allard: I've thought about that, but I'd like to clear the first hurdle before I start worrying about the second.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Allard, how come we haven't yet had a weekly news review in Canada that managed to survive.

Mr. Allard: Why hasn't there been a weekly magazine that was able to survive?

Mr. Fortier: A general interest magazine like Time or Sept-Jours?

Mr. Allard: Sept-Jours is still alive!

Mr. Fortier: I'm sorry. How come there hasn't been an English magazine that was able to survive?

Mr. Allard: I think you'll have to ask English speaking people that question.

Mr. Fortier: I agree, but with your experience in the publishing business I'm sure that you have an opinion.

Mr. Allard: At the present time let us say that first class administrators must have a certain amount of publishing experience as well as administrative know-how. I think perhaps the English speaking types are making a good living in other economic fields. As for me, with Sept-Jours showing an annual deficit of around $50,000, I can't afford to devote all my time to it. I have to make money somewhere else in order to keep Sept-Jours going, in the hope that at a given time I will get back what I will have put into it. I believe we have excellent English speaking editors and publishers in Canada but, for the most part, they are in the newspaper field. None of them wants to get into the magazine field. I don't know why.

Mr. Fortier: You say that you don't know why?

Mr. Allard: I don't know the exact reason.

Mr. Fortier: We are curious, because, just this morning, Time Magazine implied to us that that would please them.

Mr. Allard: They would hope...

Mr. Fortier: They would like to have a competitor?

Mr. Allard: I am prepared to do it, give me the means.

Mr. Fortier: Nevertheless it is extraordinary, as you say, that there were no English-Canadian publishers who had decided to leave the daily and went on to the weekly?

Mr. Allard: I think that that is a mistake. It would be absolutely necessary to come to a synthesis of information somewhere. It would be necessary and essential.

Mr. Fortier: Therefore, let us talk, Mr. Allard...

Mr. Allard: I can give you an example, when I speak of synthesis, for example. Something happens—let us say a postal strike, and we get bits and pieces all day or all week, or for two weeks. We get the information in bits and pieces—The trucks have been turned upside down; posters have been raised; negotiations have taken place. No one knows exactly what has happened, how that sort of thing started. What events led up to the strike and what happened since the strike? The same thing is true for the consequences that should be drawn from it. I am not saying that that is actually being done, I am saying that they are trying to do it. I think that eventually they will do better.

Mr. Fortier: Here, when you say, "I think that they will do better", why hasn't it been done better to date? What is the cause of it? Is it the newspaperman's incompetence, or is it the editors of the magazine until now, or what?

Mr. Allard: Let us say that, until now, there has been a problem among newspapermen. The newspaperman is used to (when we talk about the newspaperman on a daily) getting his news from a considerable number of sources. They have to choose from what arrives on their desk during the day, and they choose. There is too much news, too much information in one day to publish it all in a daily paper. Therefore, a selection has to be made. From that moment on, you have, I would say, the most important information, or the information most likely to interest the reader. The newspaperman has not developed in the magazine information field since that has never existed in Canada. This feeling of synthesis, which is necessary to make this information magazine into the suitable type has not been developed. New training must be taken, an analytical spirit must be developed; he must start his letters over again and say: well, let's make a synoptic table, and from there, a synthesis can be made. Usually, the newspaperman does a great deal of memory work. I reproach them very greatly for that. Correspondents are asked, for example, to write in a magazine, and then when the article has been read, we realize that the man, at the last minute, says: Ah, I forgot my article for Sept-Jours. Then he does a mental exercise which lasts nearly three quarters of an hour, and he sends us his article, and his $40 bill. This is a minor memory exercise, but I want to change that. I am saying that the newspaperman who writes in Sept-Jours in the future will have to come into the editing room and live in the editing room. If he wants $40, I shall say to him: how much do you want an hour, and you will come and do it in my room. That is how it is going to be done.

Mr. Fortier: Until now, it has not been done like that?

Mr. Allard: I have been at Sept-Jours since January 7 and I began to have my typesetters come in because it is not possible to have a team of permanent newspapermen in all fields and have as large a list of contributing editors as we have. Here, we have some forty names on it. It is not possible to have 40 permanent editors.

Mr. Fortier: When this list obviously mentions assistants, these people are not full-time?

Mr. Allard: No.

Mr. Fortier: The correspondents are not full-time?

Mr. Allard: Not any more. They are not even regulars, in the sense that we receive an article from them every week. The way we go about it—if you are interested in finding out—is that we have correspondents in Canada. For example, you have some here, in Quebec, Winnipeg, Trois-Rivières, in the Maritimes and you also have some abroad. The agreement we have with those people is that if the news that reaches Quebec (when it is sufficiently important, at the national level) it generally comes to Quebec one way or another in daily papers, on radio, on television. We say to ourselves there is something to look for in that area and we telephone a correspondent and ask him for a story. We write to him, we ask him for a story at that time because of the event that has taken place where he is. Thus, correspondents generally have one or two stories a month. That is how we go about it with foreign correspondents.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent do you edit or rewrite correspondents' stories?

Mr. Allard: At present, there is no rewrite done but we are planning to do so. However, we have to ask the correspondents for permission. At first they were not asked. When they are asked (and there will be those who will refuse) we will have to find a correspondent who will agree to the rewrite.

Mr. Fortier: That is obviously what Time Magazine does?

Mr. Allard: A certain unity is needed, a synthesis is needed.

Mr. Fortier: That is one of the reasons why you spoke a moment ago about assistants who are going to work with you full-time?

Mr. Allard: Yes. One cannot get enthusiastic, one cannot have a fervor for living, one cannot earnestly have written a synthesis in Sept-Jours if one does not see Sept-Jours.

Mr. Fortier: Are you in the process of building up that team?

Mr. Allard: Yes, we have started. First of all, in order to assure stability, I went out and looked for a rewrite secretary.

Mr. Fortier: Can I ask you the following question: is it easy to find newspapermen in French Canada who are prepared to do that synthesis work?

Mr. Allard: We would have to grab all the newspapermen in French Canada. But I would say, I do not blame the newspapermen, but I think that there is a lack of training and that not many courses in journalism are being taken. I will give you a rather astonishing example, in my opinion. One day, I asked the publisher of the largest newspaper in French Canada, I asked him how it was that there were not more journalists going to school. It seems to me that journalists should have to go through editing schools. He said: Journalism is not learned in a classroom. I said to him that I find that that is rather a narrow outlook, just as backward as farmers 60 years ago.

When farmers were asked, 60 years ago why they did not go to agricultural school or why they did not consult an agronomist, they answered: "Do you think carrots grow in a classroom floor?" I am saying that journalism in general is not learned at school. Journalists say that it is learned in an editing room. But I am also convinced that it is not learned in an editing room, it is learned in the street. Journalism takes place where the event occurs.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have some experience with our journalism schools, for example Laval University and Carleton?

Mr. Allard: Let's say that I am not the best informed man. I am more a publisher than an editor in chief and I have no pretensions at the journalistic level. Let's say that as a publisher, I was Executive Vice-president of a company which, had four newspapers, including one daily, four radio stations and a TV station. I had an opportunity to see a lot of people at work. I think, from the information I have, that Laval would be reasonably good, Sherbrooke also, and that Montreal is weak.

Mr. Fortier: The journalists whom you have known in the written press, dailies, weeklies, etc., do you believe that those people would be able to adapt to the magazine format?

Mr. Allard: Journalists are not imbeciles. Actually they are very intelligent people. They can adapt to that just as to anything else. For example, I wrote down a few notes here. What we should demand, at the outset, from journalists, I think even before the job, in a publication, we should demand knowledge of the language.

At present, in editing rooms, and I add that I have gone on to Le Petit Journal—there were four copy editors for journalists to find out whether their copy was written in proper French. We had four copy editors, and I find this an anomaly. The journalist today says: "I do not have time to revise my copy." I think that at the outset, we should demand, before the man is hired by a publication, we should demand knowledge of the language. I think that we should demand a B.A. or its equivalent to ensure that the candidate has an all-round general knowledge. We should also demand an interest in a specific area of information. At that time, I think that we would have candidates at the outset. But that would be only the start.

Once the journalist is on duty, we should at the least demand regular courses, and when necessary provide for, salary adjustments according to the diplomas he holds. Secondly, train journalists to develop a spirit of synthesis. Thirdly, encourage journalists to take courses on the changes taking place in his profession in order to qualify himself for higher positions. Fourthly, we should establish regular communications between heads of editing sections in the form of weekly meetings in order to have a work team. Fifthly, regular meetings should be set up between the heads of the various sections of the newspaper, advertising, editing, checking, circulation, etc. Thus, the key editorial men also know the problems which arise elsewhere. I have often had the experience of hearing journalists say: if we didn't have advertising, we could write.

If journalists could therefore understand that the advertiser also has needs. If we had an advertisement, let's say, for a fashion magazine, or a fashion shop, in the newspaper, it was a sure thing that there was a journalist who would have written an article on another fashion magazine which had never advertised with us. There was no liaison between the various sections. The sections are almost sealed off from one another in newspapers, in editorial rooms and in dailies. I think that regular meetings between the various section heads would be essential. Then, I think that specialists should be trained and put at the service of newspapers just as agronomists are at the farmers' service. I do not think that this is necessarily the function of the federal Government but I think that the federal Government could act as promoter in this field, foster such activities. Thus, in the field of agriculture, agronomists have been trained and sent almost everywhere to tell farmers: there are other ways of planting your carrots. Why could there not be specialists who would go into editorial rooms, at the administrative level, at the journalistic level, who would give advice. I have other suggestions here that I could....

Mr. Fortier: Give us.. ?

Mr. Allard: Perhaps yes, I do not know. How to attain professional quality in information. The field of education belongs to the provinces, the federal Government must be content with acting as promoter through the creation of one or more agencies charged with the establishment of the general outlines of a program of action which would include: the main structures the establishment of administrative structures for newspapers. The government would not have to intervene but would prepare certain documents to be put at the disposal of publications which would set up administrative structures for newspapers. They would include: management, controls, advertising, editing circulation and publication.

Secondly, draw up organization charts or suggest organization charts for establishing vertical communications. Establish descriptions of duties of all positions of command at all levels, in order to establish horizontal communications. There would also be secondary structures, training programs for the members of each department of the firm: (a) courses to be taken; (b) personnel training; (c) working conditions; (d) personnel up-grading or retraining programs; (e) pension system brought in gradually.

At present, there is a major problem with regard to retirement. For example, we tell our journalist at 65, you are going to retire. The man thinks about it for 4 or 5 years, he is upset, he wonders what will happen to him afterwards. If newspapers had a system of gradual working towards retirement. For example, if we told a journalist: you are 61 and at 61 you work 4 days a week. On the fifth day, you are paid a proportion of your pension. At 62, he would work 3 days a week and two days would be a proportion of his pension, and so on. Then, when he reaches 65, he would already be used to having three days off, if we count Saturday and Sunday. Three days off, and four days off, five days off, six days off, depending on his age. At 65, the man has already learned to organize either his leisure time or a new career.

Mr. Fortier: That is quite an interesting suggestion.

[English]

Senator McElman: Mr. Allard, the last witness suggested that there could possibly be some means of restricting, not the entry of magazines from outside countries, but their numbers. How would you feel about that?

Mr. Allard: I do not know. I do not like restrictions. I have no opinion. I am not qualified to answer this question.

Senator McElman: You would not support such a thing?

Mr. Allard: I do not know. I would have to study the matter much further than I ever did, to give an opinion on this. I would say that I do not like restrictions.

Senator McElman: I am told that you savor some assistance or aid in distributing magazines to Canadians abroad. Have you any thoughts on this?

Mr. Allard: Yes. I think that if Canada sends Canadians abroad... the Federal Government or the Provincial Government... if they send Canadians abroad we have to keep them informed. If we have to keep them informed it can be done through many ways. I think the most economical way would be to give them a magazine in which they would have a synthesis... I think the word is right, is it?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Allard: If every Canadian abroad could follow what is going on in Canada, in their own country (because Canada happens to be my country and the country of those that Canada sends abroad) I think that these people would be informed of what is going on in Canada, I mean as far as the most important news going on in Canada are concerned.

When the people are coming back to Canada you would not need to adopt them back to the Canadian life because they would be informed of what is going on and I say that if there was any English...

The Chairman: Counterpart?

Mr. Allard: .. parallel to Sept-Jours which would produce a synthesis of the news of the week, I think it could be sent out to every one of them. I think Sept-Jours should be sent to Canadians abroad.

Senator McElman: Through a government agency, the Armed Forces and so on?

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Senator McElman: You cover news from coast to coast, I take it.

Mr. Allard: We try to.

Senator McElman: Do you give particular emphasis to news from the French-speaking populations, let us say, of the Winnipeg area or New Brunswick?

Mr. Allard: We have a correspondent in Winnipeg. We are trying to. Of course, the readers in Quebec are mostly interested in the news going on in Quebec more than that of New Brunswick or other provinces.

We have information coming from the rest of French Canada and we intend to keep on adding more as long as we are progressing with the magazine, yes.

Senator McElman: As a New Brunswicker, could I ask, what are your sources in the Province of New Brunswick?

Mr. Allard: We only have one correspondent there, Alexandre Boudriau and we have a correspondent from there and every time we see in the daily press something appearing which is pertinent to the Maritimes and we think it should be covered, we phone him and we ask him to send us a paper on the synthesis of what has happened.

Senator McElman: My estimation of your publication goes up very rapidly when you say Alexandre is your correspondent. I know him very well.

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Senator McElman: Do you have much circulation in New Brunswick?

Mr. Allard: Very little. We only have eleven thousand altogether. We cannot have too much in New Brunswick. I would say maybe—as only a very rough guess—maybe one hundred copies. That would be about all.

Senator McElman: There are about two hundred and forty thousand French-speaking.

Mr. Allard: We'll get to them some day.

Senator McElman: Primarily again, I would think there is rather a thirst for a publication such as yours.

Mr. Allard: Yes, but as Mr. Bédard and Mr. Brouillé have mentioned before it costs an awful lot of money to reach them and to sell them the magazine—to tell them that the magazine exists to start with and then to sell them the magazine and after that to send them the magazine (because at six cents a copy it is quite a lot of money plus the cost of the magazine itself).

Senator McElman: I am sure a person with your ingenuity could find one equal ingenuity in New Brunswick.

Mr. Allard: We will, but I only started on the seventh of January. Give me a couple of months yet.

The Chairman: This is a very dangerous question I am going to ask you. Does not anything ever happen in Toronto? I notice you have no correspondent in Toronto.

Mr. Allard: Let us say I show my slip.

The Chairman: No, but I am surprised that the biggest English-speaking city in the country has no correspondent.

Mr. Allard: As I told you before, I invested in Sept-Jours in March of 1969. To me it was a gesture to start with, with the expectation that some day Sept-Jours could become a valuable magazine for French Canada. I was not satisfied with the way it was run last year. I took over on the seventh of January. I should have thought of Toronto the first day I came in.

The Chairman: How would you cover it then?

Mr. Fortier: Touché!

Mr. Allard: We will have one next week.

The Chairman: Mr. Allard, I think Senator Quart has a question and Senator Everett has a question. I am not sure if Senator McElman was through.

Senator Quart: Yes, I have a question to ask.

The Chairman: Are you through Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Yes.

The Chairman: May I go to Senator Quart first?

Senator Everett: Please.

Senator Quart: This meeting typifies something which I found in here.

May I say you speak such very good English. I think it would be better if I spoke in English because I get all mixed up with my masculines and feminines.

Mr. Allard: My masculine shows too.

Senator Quart: That is a normal thing, is it not? I notice in looking through your magazine and I must say I agree with many of your articles I have been reading.

Mr. Allard: If you will tell me more about your ideas, I will put more in.

Senator Quart: Will you? This may be something. You mentioned sending your magazine outside of Canada.

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Senator Quart: But did you ever think of sending complimentary copies to the Embassies?

Mr. Allard: All the Embassies are on our list.

Senator Quart: Do you send them copies?

Mr. Allard: Free of charge.

Senator Quart: They appreciate the "free of charge", I am sure and in the information offices, I am thinking of New York for several reasons.

Mr. Allard: It costs us $25, a year, I think. I am not sure yet.

Senator Quart: Why would you not have some of the Senators frank it?

You have no woman's page, I notice.

Mr. Allard: No. We intend to have one starting very shortly. What I wanted to do is something the other magazines are not doing and that is to have what the women are doing and not what the women are wearing. That is what I want to have for the magazine.

Senator Quart: Or not wearing.

Mr. Allard: That could be a good idea. We had only recently a special issue on this.

Senator Quart: Well, I have just received this.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: "Sexual Freedom in 1969".

Senator Quart: I am against the word "freedom" for all women...

Mr. Allard: I am not against the word "freedom", I am against the word "sexual".

[English]

Senator Quart: I notice there is no cooking page in this. Don't you think les Québécoises would be interested in it?

Mr. Allard: Well, I do not think cooking fits into the synthesis of the news of the week.

Senator Quart: You would be surprised.

No, but on the other hand so little publicity is given to French-Canadian cooking.

Mr. Allard: I mean Actualité is doing such a fine job on this that we do not need to.

Senator Quart: You might explain to your readers (but it would be the English-speaking readers I think) what caribou is. We had a very nice reception and they served caribou. One of our Senators—he is not here now—was eating cretons with fresh bread and saying “isn’t this caribou wonderful”. I came in very flippantly and said—“this is not caribou”. Caribou is what you are drinking”. He said: “What is it made of?” I said: “Whiskey blanc and caribou blood”.

Mr. Allard: Caribou blood?

Senator Quart: Caribou blood—and the poor man nearly died. Then I said “no, port wine”. I think there are so many things that we have, you know, in Quebec, that could be publicized.

I notice your page for humour—I like a good laugh, there is nothing like it and I think this is good...

[Translation]

Senator Quart: The Omnibus Bill passed first reading by the House of Commons to legalize homosexuality.

[English]

Senator Quart: It would take a whole page to explain that to me.

Mr. Allard: That is what I call “synthesis”.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: That is a tough act to follow. I notice, sir, that in your list on your masthead you list the correspondents in New York, Washington, Geneva, Brussels, London, Paris and Rome.

How do you afford that with a circulation of eleven thousand?

Mr. Allard: It is very easy. It doesn’t cost that much.

Senator Everett: Are they stringers?

Mr. Allard: No. Whenever there is news that could interest the Canadian market—I mean our market—we call or send them a telegram that we want an article on such a subject. I mean they do not send us copies every week. They are only paid for the copy we request.

Senator Everett: What you would call stringers then?

Mr. Allard: I don’t know what a stringer is.

Senator Everett: This probably has been asked and if it has not, it is worthwhile asking: Why are you not a member of the MAB.

Mr. Allard: Well, we will have to start with being a member of the ABC.

Senator Everett: You are not a member of the ABC?

Mr. Allard: We are now. We will have a report next month, yes.

Senator Everett: You will?

Mr. Allard: Yes. I was not in charge of this newspaper before but by selling advertising, I must admit that they have increased circulation twofold by saying to the other guy: they have that kind of circulation. When I bought the newspaper I said I do not want to sell advertising under false pretenses so I lost all my salesmen. Also a bit of advertising.

Now we are trying to build up from an ABC Report.

Senator Everett: What would your ABC circulation be?

Mr. Allard: Eleven thousand.

Senator Everett: What percentage of that is paid, do you know?

Mr. Allard: All is paid. Before you came in I said that our subscription rate is $10. and we would only have three campaigns during the year where we will have a special $7.95 but nothing else.

[Translation]

I have a theory, on the sale of magazines in general that I defended a while ago. Perhaps I could repeat it, if you think that that is necessary. I think that, at present,...

[English]

I think that actually all the magazines are offering all kinds of gimmicks to recruit readers—offering seven magazines for the price of one or ‘we will send you the whole literature of Shakespeare if you send us $2.’

I mean, you cannot force a reader to read your magazine and so we are trying to sell the magazine on the value of the magazine and at the price it is worth.

Senator Everett: Would it be your intention to join MAB?

Mr. Allard: Yes, very shortly, yes.

Senator Everett: Is MAB the best vehicle for getting advertiser acceptance, in your judgment?

Mr. Allard: I would not know because I am not a magazine man. I only started on the seventh of January in the magazine business. I was in the newspaper business. I don't know this business too well so I cannot answer your question.

Senator Everett: I would presume, from looking at the issue I have here, that you are having a little trouble getting advertiser acceptance at this point.

Mr. Allard: Yes, because when you tell advertisers for two and a half years that you have a circulation of twenty, twenty two, twenty three or twenty five thousand copies they accept, and if you sign a sworn statement to it all the better. But when I came along I said I refused to sign a sworn statement because that is not honest. So naturally the advertisers were very puzzled.

They asked us what was the circulation so I sent them all a copy and told them at the time we had eight thousand, four hundred copies—so we lost all the advertisers—not all of them: We lost fifty percent of them. Now we are trying to build up with the circulation we have. We are trying to sell what we have, not what we do not have.

Senator Everett: Did you have to reduce your rates?

Mr. Allard: Yes, by about twenty five percent and we have done it mostly on the colour.

Senator Everett: The reduction of rate was in the colour rate?

Mr. Allard: Mostly and the repetition of the ads. We gave them larger discounts for repeats.

Senator Everett: I know your experience in this particular situation has been short, but do you know if there is any problem in getting representation on the newsstand?

Mr. Allard: Yes. It is very hard to get recognition on the newsstand—it is practically impossible for a new publication. They wait until people demand it. If people forces the newsstand to take a copy, they would take it.

For instance, there are ten thousand newsstands in the Province of Quebec. To cover these ten thousand newsstands you would have to send at least two copies per newsstand—that would be the minimum. So that is twenty thousand you would have to print and you would not even know which one has the magazine in advance.

So what would happen—this fellow would say “what is this? I don't know this”. They would put it behind the counter. They would leave it there until the distributor came to pick up the rest of the copies. He has other magazines to distribute so, I mean, you have to fight very hard to get recognition and its costs money too.

Senator Everett: In the Province of Quebec how many distributors are there? Or let me phrase the question this way: Are there a large number of distributors?

Mr. Allard: Are you talking about distributing organizations or firms, or are you talking about individuals?

Senator Everett: Not the individual stands—the actual firms that you would deal with for distribution purposes.

Mr. Allard: I would say starting with Montreal there would be four of them that I know of. But they do not all distribute magazines. They are not specialists in magazines. Most of them are specialists in newspapers. It is quite a different thing.

Senator Everett: Who is the magazine distributor?

Mr. Allard: I would say Benjamin Montreal News.

Senator Everett: Do they dominate the market in Montreal?

Mr. Allard: Yes, they do and something that I can mention to you is that when you deal with Benjamin Montreal News (which is approximately the only one who knows something about magazines), you have also Eclair, which is not doing a bad job either—Eclair is doing quite a good job but Benjamin Montreal News specializes in magazines.

Now, a fellow is not necessarily interested in your magazine. He is interested in getting as many magazines as he can because if he can get sixty magazines out of sixty magazines and if he sells two copies of each, he sells one hundred and twenty magazines to each and every newsstand. So whether he sells yours or not, does not matter to him. It is whatever he sells—so he will do nothing to help you with your magazine. You have to fight your battles—so that may be one of the answers. To your previous question which I did not want to answer at that point because I was not well informed about it.

Senator Everett: I assume you have to take full returns on those magazines.

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Senator Everett: If you deliver twenty thousand to Benjamin Montreal News.

Mr. Allard: If they sell one thousand copies. You have to eat the nineteen thousand.

Senator Everett: If you are prepared to do that, will they give you a display.

Mr. Allard: No. They will even refuse to accept it. We have to accept one fact. If you are a news dealer or a newsstand dealer you want to have in there magazines or newspapers that sell fast, that will not take space in the stand for too long.

For instance, you have a copy of La Presse. You know you can sell four hundred and fifty copies very fast.

Well, your magazine, when it comes in there will be thrown anywhere. And if you give them fifty copies they will say: "I don't want it" because they have to count the returns and they have to account for each and every copy. They will say: "I do not want Sept-Jours". So the fellow says. "Give me a chance—I mean, I am forced to distribute it". So the fellow says: "Okay, I will take one or two copies", and he will put them behind the counter or put them anywhere around the place because they are not in demand.

Then we have to establish our own demand. That is the fight that we have to do. Instead of having two hundred and fifty magazines in Canada, if we had only forty to compete against, we would have a better chance to be recognized on these stands.

Senator Everett: If you were on the stand...

[Translation]

(Mr. Allard)...exposed, if you like, laid out...

[English]

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Senator Everett: Let us assume you were on the stand and you were displayed well on the stand. Would that make any difference to your acceptance?

Mr. Allard: I do not think it would make much of a difference to our acceptance. When you want to buy something and if a product is good, you are going to get it. You are going to ask for it.

I say it would help. I mean, if you want a magazine and if you are going to a newsstand and you ask for this magazine and they do not have it then, of course, you have missed a sale there. If there are enough people going to that same newsstand to ask for the same magazine, the fellow is not going to keep your magazine or he will have only a few copies.

It would help but not to the extent it would make a difference between success or failure.

Senator Everett: It is the subscriptions which make the difference?

Mr. Allard: Actually I am a newspaper man so I may be looking at it in a different way, but newspapers are sold on newsstands. Subscriptions are a small part of the circulation of a newspaper. I still want to find out if I can do the same thing with a magazine—make my fight on the newsstand.

Senator Everett: Is that a fact? You say the significant circulation of the average daily newspaper is through newsstands.

Mr. Allard: I would say so in the metropolitan area, yes.

When I talk about my own experience, I mean, I was the owner of the dimanche-Matin for twelve years. With dimanche-Matin we were selling all our copies on the newsstands for five or six years and we went as high as two hundred and twenty five thousand copies a week. That was before we started delivering the newspaper to the private homes. But out of a circulation of two hundred and eighty nine thousand copies, I think that we did not sell more than thirty or thirty five thousand copies that were from door to door. Subscriptions did not mean a thing. Subscription covered maybe one thousand copies, that is all, out of two hundred and eighty nine thousand copies.

Senator Everett: I am sorry. Maybe there is a problem of terminology to us to a certain extent. There is a difference, I gather, between door-to-door delivery and subscription.

Mr. Allard: Yes, because in door-to-door delivery—it is a messenger boy or carrier boy who goes and tries to have you become a subscriber. But you do not subscribe to a newspaper the way you do to a magazine. A magazine you take for six months or you take for a year.

When you subscribe to a newspaper you say: "Well, we'll take it for four weeks and then see". Then you pay every month. There is a different approach to the problem.

Senator Everett: You had experience as a newspaper man. You are now having experience as a magazine owner. Mr. Bédard has said that he thinks that magazines are going to replace newspapers, if I quoted him correctly.

Mr. Allard: Well, I am not a prophet. But I do not think they will.

Senator Everett: What do you say is the future of magazines?

Mr. Allard: Depending on what kind of magazines, I think magazines will go on increasing and probably will have a larger part of the audience. But I do not think they will replace newspapers.

TV has not replaced radio and radio has not replaced concerts or music. They are still there. Even more people are now going to concerts than before.

I think people need to be informed...

[Translation]

There is a psychological aspect to the question.

[English]

I think your reaction to the newspaper or printed matter is that you want to be sure. You hear the news over the radio, you see the news over the TV; then you go to your newspaper to be sure that what you have heard is correct or that you are well informed.

Why do you buy a daily newspaper? You do not read your daily newspaper every day but you want to be sure that it is there. But when you read it,—I have tried this with hundreds of people—you read only about ten per cent of your newspaper. You go through it and spot one or two articles here and there which fascinate you, sports or a business. You go through the newspaper, and once you have gone through it, you have actually spent very little time in it. Surveys have shown that it takes about half an hour to go through the thickest newspaper. So actually what you want is to be sure that it is there if you need it.

Senator Everett: Why do you think you are going to have readership? Is it because your magazine is in French? Because it deals with French-Canadian problems? Or because it deals with Canadian problems?

Mr. Allard: I think that the French people will certainly be more interested in French-Canadian problems than they are in the Canadian problem as a whole (as I would be more interested in the news or events in my family than I would be interested in my parish.) But after I am interested in my family, my parish then it's my province and then my country. I think this would be the level of interest that I have developed and I think that people in general do develop.

Senator Everett: I think this has probably been asked before—but are you losing money with this venture?

Mr. Allard: Yes, we lost up to...well, I mean, the loss was not absorbed.

Senator Everett: We do not need to know the figures.

Mr. Allard: Yes, but I am good for sixty years.

Senator Everett: That really was the reason for my question. If you are good for sixty years, that is good news.

Why are you good for sixty years? What is motivating you?

Mr. Allard: My country.

Senator Everett: To go for sixty years?

Mr. Allard: My country.

Senator Everett: Do you want to be more particular than that?

Mr. Allard: I think that once you have achieved a certain security in life and you want to devote yourself, if you can, you do participate in the social gathering of people that are around you. And if you can do something about it, you do.

Mind you, I am not naive to the point that I am ready to lose money with Sept-Jours. In fact with the money I am losing with the magazine the Government is helping me. I mean, Sept-Jours Incorporated is the owner of a printing shop which is making money. So we are getting help from the Federal Government in one way, and the Provincial Government also. But that would not be sufficient to keep me interested in Sept-Jours.

I think this kind of magazine is necessary and, through the years of experience I have gathered in the newspaper business, I think that the newspaper business is in good hands now. I think if I can help the magazine field I will try and do my share.

I do not know what extent I will succeed.

Senator Everett: Do you think this is what motivated Senator O'Leary?

Mr. Allard: Yes, definitely.

Senator Everett: Is there more motivation among French-Canadians in this direction?

Mr. Allard: I do not think so. Maybe in this because we believe that we want to be heard. We like to talk a lot. So probably that could be one of the reasons.

Senator Everett: But you are talking to yourselves here, are you not, through Sept-Jours?

Mr. Allard: No. We feel English Canada is developing more interest in the French language in this country now than they have before. We are talking to ourselves, yes.

Senator Everett: But in the long pull you do not think it will be?

Mr. Allard: Yes. I think up to now our first interest is to speak to our own people, to participate in the information in French-Canada for French Canadians—that would be our first goal. But I think that we also feel that if you had read—you were not here at the moment when I read this.

The Chairman: There is my copy.

Mr. Allard: The policy and objective of Sept-Jours—it is a very short paragraph—I think it will show you what the goal is of Sept-Jours. Senator, please read here and there, that is all.

The Chairman: It is the same copy. It is just a different picture. It is the same copy basically.

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Senator Everett: Can you see in sixty years that you will be turning out—this is just a hypothetical question, but that is what we are here for . . .

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Senator Everett: Do you see that you will be turning out an English edition of Sept-Jours.

Mr. Allard: I would be ready to start one any time as long as I could have the necessary help to purchase one. I would like first of all to swallow the first pill of the French edition and all I need is twenty thousand copies. We have eleven thousand now. If we have twenty thousand copies we will be ready for an English magazine.

Senator Everett: Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator. Mr. Fortier, perhaps you want to ask a few concluding questions. I am anxious to adjourn.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Allard, in your oral presentation, at the beginning, you left us on the following note—that it will be necessary to encourage the maintenance of magazines such as yours, and you even suggested that other people—other good souls like you—should be encouraged to publish magazines. Can you be a bit more specific and tell us what type of encouragement you are asking for from the government, either federal or provincial?

Mr. Allard: I do not think that I would necessarily see a direct subsidy. It could be done in the economic field, for example, in subsidies for competence. I think that, in the fields of culture and the arts, most of subsidies go for incompetence. For example, if I wanted tomorrow to start up an industry in the automobile field, the government would not want to give me subsidies nor help me, nor would it want to give me a tax reduction, nor would it want to participate in my venture. This is because it would not believe that I have the necessary competence to go into the automobile industry. But it would do so for General Motors. That is normal. They say: "You want to set up an automobile industry in Canada, you have the competence, you have proved it elsewhere, very well, you will be given subsidies".

But in the newspaper field, the danger is the attack on the freedom of the press and I would say that there could be subsidies for a limited time as is done in industry. It could also be done in other ways but I am not sufficiently informed. But it could be, for example, that governments could allocate let's say, various government services to an information magazine. They could also allocate people, Canadians, to work on the outside. They could encourage the various departments to advertise in that publication. For example, important government messages should, in my opinion, appear in an information magazine.

Mr. Fortier: That in no way would attack the freedom of the press?

Mr. Allard: There is still freedom at that moment. For example, the Department of Cultural Affairs of Quebec would certainly have something to say where culture is concerned to Quebec readers and to the people. It could say: "Well, we are going to take a page every month; we shall have a text from the Department of Cultural Affairs which would appear in your magazine, since it is considered a valid information medium."

Mr. Fortier: This is the type of encouragement that you mentioned earlier, is it not?

Mr. Allard: Yes, that's right.

Mr. Fortier: I am very curious. You have made your mark as you said "as a newspaperman". You made your mark in the written press, a daily, a weekly, and you left all that for the magazine, did you not?

Mr. Allard: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you really believe that the era of the daily is past?

Mr. Allard: No, I believe that the daily is in good hands. The magazine does not exist.

Mr. Fortier: The daily in Quebec is in good hands?

Mr. Allard: I think so.

Mr. Fortier: Will you, please, comment briefly on the increased concentration of daily and weekly information media in the Power Corporation empire, as it is called?

Mr. Allard: Well, let's say that Power Corporation is a business firm. It is possible that a business firm can have a direct influence on the journalist's text. That happened, let's say, in France in 1940, when there was a great deal of German or foreign investment in French papers; they were not able to make the newspapers react in favour of a French mission which was defending the land. Well, there is a danger of putting that in the hands of too powerful a consortium. There is a certain danger because the consortium may have economic interests which are not the same as the newspaper's. But, we have all kinds of pressures. I just have a list here of the pressures brought to bear on freedom of the press: economic pressures—I mean the need for profitability at the outset; pressure from advertisers who do not readily accept, for example, having certain habits of people in the business world denounced; political contingencies, a publication favourable to the government in power is generally more profitable; the sources of information through press agencies, for example. Press agencies are almost all foreign and that creates problems for us. We do not have our own information; the intervention of public relations experts who feed newspapers information which is biased in favour of firms or organizations that they represent; the political climate; the union climate; the social climate; and direct intimidation or undue pressures. Those are some of the pressures anyway. There is freedom of the press. But it does not exist in this sense that it is subject...

Mr. Fortier: It is not absolute...

Mr. Allard: On the other side of the coin, there are also newspapers which commit abuses because of their power. Newspapers can go as far as blackmail to get advertising. We have often seen people who have put out a bottle of Coca-Cola with a rusty nail in it. Blackmail against authorities in power and public figures, blackmail against unions, the police, peaceful marches, blackmail against the private lives of public figures—everyone is hanged in passing. I would be—and I shall perhaps come back to a question which you asked me a while ago—in favour of the setting up of an advisory committee made up of publication owners and public publications. But this Committee should not have any executive power and should be limited to consultations to ensure the professional ethics of newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: A kind of press council?

Mr. Allard: A press council.

Mr. Fortier: On a regional basis, not on a national basis?

Mr. Allard: I still could see the federal Government acting as the promoter. Nevertheless, people should be able to settle their own problems. You cannot come and settle my family's problems but you can give me suggestions as to how to settle them.

Mr. Fortier: I'll come back to my question, is the increased concentration of newspaper ownership in Quebec healthy or is it unhealthy for you, with your long experience?

Mr. Allard: At this time, I would say, if I take, for example, the case of Les Journaux Trans-Canada, it is in the hands of very high calibre journalists—Jacques Francoeur, for example. We are sure then that gentleman knows his trade. Something else may happen at a given moment or it may happen in five years, 10 years or 15 years—perhaps there is a danger there. But, on the other hand, what they give the press is a structure. They are now giving all the structures and I am asking the federal Government to act as our promoter to aid newspapers on the whole. I think that those people are in the process of doing it. They will see to reaching all levels of the enterprise so that those people will become more and more informed about what they are doing.

Mr. Fortier: What you anticipate and what you are describing, is a danger in power?

Mr. Allard: It is a danger in power.

Mr. Fortier: Do you believe, in order to sidestep tomorrow's danger possibly, that concentration should be eliminated?

Mr. Allard: No, I think that it should be watched.

Mr. Fortier: Watched by?

Mr. Allard: Perhaps a special committee, made up of members of the government and members of independent newspapers and also representatives of that controlled or concentrated press. I think that there should perhaps be a supervisory committee. But I left newspapers five years ago; my opinions on that are poorly informed. I would like to give a great deal more thought to it and have more consultations before coming up with a definitive opinion on it. In principle, that doesn't bother me too much at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: Probably because you know the people who are there?

Mr. Allard: Yes, I know the people who are there.

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you very much Mr. Fortier and Senators and particularly Mr. Allard, thank you. Sept-Jours is by any standards—and I can say this because the Committee has been looking at the magazine now for the better part of this week—I think, a unique Canadian publication. I think that as such our overall study would have been incomplete without some reference to it.

We are grateful to you for coming. Perhaps the most effective way I could express our appreciation is to say that we certainly hope that it will not take you sixty years to turn the corner. Our fingers are crossed. Thank you for coming.

May I say to the Senators that we are receiving a brief from Toronto Life in this room at eight o'clock tonight. We will now adjourn.

The Committee adjourned to 8.00 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 8.00 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I might call this session to order. This evening we are going to receive a brief from Toronto Life. Seated with me on my left is Mr. Preston Balmer who is the Vice President of Toronto Life and on my immediate right is the Business Manager of Toronto Life, Mr. James Knox. We have a statement which has been prepared but which I don't believe the Senators are familiar with.

Mr. Preston W. Balmer, Vice President, Toronto Life: Well, Senator, I have copies available and with your permission I would like to read it and perhaps the senators could follow along and make notes.

The Chairman: That would be perfectly all right indeed and perhaps we will ask you questions on your brief and perhaps on matters which are not in your brief, and perhaps on other things, and if you wish to ask Mr. Knox to reply to any questions, please feel free to do so.

Mr. Balmer: Mr. Chairman and honourable senators...

The Chairman: Just before you begin, Mr. Balmer, perhaps I should say a word of explanation to the senators concerning my short delay. I apologize for my delay, Senators, but there was a very good reason. Today is Mr. Spears' birthday and we took him out to dinner so that is the reason for my being four minutes late.

Mr. Balmer: Well, I would like to preface my remarks by saying that Mr. Spears phoned me and suggested that maybe we would rather not be here tonight and I said "Look, as far as we are concerned we have offered our full co-operation to the committee from the outset and we would like to continue to give that co-operation. So if you are making any changes, please don't schedule it for February 17th because that is my birthday." He said, "To heck with you, the 19th is my birthday." I then told Mr. Spears that we would come over and we could celebrate our birthdays together.

The Chairman: Well, good for you. Congratulations. I believe it is also Senator O'Leary's birthday.

Mr. Balmer: When Armadale appeared before this committee in December we tried to provide you with all the information available on our established operations, namely our newspapers and our various broadcasting interests.

Tonight we return, not to brag of instant success in the magazine publishing field, but rather to indicate to you that in magazine publishing, in Canada, we have found a very challenging, sometimes frustrating, always interesting and so far dollarwise unprofitable enterprise.

However, because we realize that this committee is interested in problems, as well as, success stories, we have returned, hopefully to provide you with additional information you may require to adequately and effectively study the media of Canada. With me is Mr. Jim Knox who is our Business Manager and who, because of his more than 25 years experience in the magazine publishing industry in Canada is invaluable to us in guiding us through many of our difficult problems. I know Jim will be glad to answer any questions you may care to put to him.

May I just interrupt myself here to make sure that Mr. Fortier is armed with a copy of my opening remarks.

Mr. Fortier: I apologize for being late.

Senator McElman: Well, we have already had a full explanation of why.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, I can assure you that it wasn't a full explanation.

Mr. Balmer: We knew when we bought Toronto Life in 1967, that publishing a magazine in Canada was difficult.

Ostensibly, the price to enter this game was a commitment to share profits with the former owner.

As it turned out, we bought exclusive rights to problems and losses.

The net losses for the years 1966 through 1969 are included in the material filed confidentially and if you have noted them, you know the price we paid for the privilege of getting into the magazines business in Canada and of serving our community with a new and untried service.

It was not until the last month of last year that we actually broke even on a couple of issues and felt that we had found the way.

During those early tough years we took courage from the story of Sports Illustrated which lost $20 million before it dramatically turned around and became a very successful magazine.

We knew that Toronto was a big town and that this was a big league and we were prepared to pay the price.

Let us make one thing clear, we are not here pleading for subsidies or special privileges, we are not here asking for legislation to stifle our competition. We feel it is incumbent upon us to produce a product which will attract the necessary readership and advertising support for us to survive on our merits.

I should also like to say, however, that had we been threatened with a white paper such as that ominous document which now hangs over our heads, we certainly would not have embarked on this endeavour, for it appears that the benefit under the proposed White Paper legislation would not be commensurate with the gamble of establishing such a new service.

The question is why were we prepared to try to enter the magazine publishing game in Canada?

Well, the answer lies in the fact that Mike Sifton likes Toronto and believed that there was a need for a special magazine to meet the specialized needs of that city.

Mike looked at Toronto Life not as a hobby, but a new challenge and a new creative endeavour, and he got personally involved.

In publishing, the name of the game is readership. When we took over Toronto Life on May 12, 1967, we made up our minds that Toronto Life would not be allowed to remain as a gesture towards success—that it would commend respect for itself and Armadale.

For it to succeed, we felt Toronto Life had to be important enough to interest the most involved and productive homes in greater

Toronto—these had to be our target audiences.

I wish I could say that our aim was straight. Until just recently, the book, outside of its "Guide and Listing" function, did not clearly present its purpose and approach to service.

It was going in too many directions. In one survey we took, it became clear that the basic problem of identity lay in the fact that everyone felt the book was for someone else.

The essence of our findings was that we had to recognize the changing communications environment.

During this two year period, the City Magazine was suddenly recognized as a new medium south of the border in the United States.

Business Week featuring the City Magazine as "the talk of the town". Saturday Review and the Wall Street Journal blossomed out with full features on "the new medium" and in so doing emphasized the growing realization that in this swiftly moving world, no effort can be spared—no communication medium can be ignored—that nothing will be more pervading in the seventies than the increased need to be involved in one's own community—not just a superficial involvement—a headline oriented awareness of what's going on—but a deep involvement which can provide the sense of belonging—a special belonging which alone can insulate the human spirit from the weight of world involvement that is pouring in on everyone.

The City Magazines were spawned in the complex urban communities of the United States where the social pressures were so great that existing media found it difficult, if not impossible, to adequately service the special socio-economic entity that is represented in the current North American city. We do not contend that City Magazines will replace existing classic media, but that they are a tangible and exciting part of the answer to meeting the new requirements of these increasingly complex cities.

Two years ago we saw this need manifesting itself in Toronto.

This basic "reason for being" is why each City Magazine is different—tailored to the individual needs of a single community. That is why Toronto Life doesn't look like any other City Magazine—or any other classic magazine.

A comparison of Toronto Life with the City Magazines of the Continent, shows Toronto Life in seventh position in terms of circulation. In terms of production standards, we state our reputation that it is second to none.

Last fall, readership patterns started to emerge and our original belief was confirmed and thus, we started to move.

We now have a stated purpose and a set of operating criteria on which we intend to build.

Because taste can no longer be associated with only the highest socio-economic group, Toronto Life must be a cosmopolitan story—a continuing story of, for and about the people who, for themselves and their neighbours, are doing something that matters.

To implement this purpose, Toronto Life will confine itself to four primary areas of service:

Toronto Life will be a concise, hard facts "Guide to Living", a guide to what Torontonians and its visitors can do, see, hear and be involved in. Toronto Life's digest of all entertainment and retail services will be the pivotal point around which the "Guide to Living" Service is built. What we mean is—if we list and we comment, we recommend.

Toronto Life will be a social instrument providing readers with warning signals and prior and current insight into those things which touch family, work and a future in Toronto. With the February issue, we were proud to welcome Margaret Campbell to our lineup as part of our expanding efforts in social communication. Toronto's one magazine will provide a new depth of information on art, books, cinema, education, law, medicine, modern living, music, the press, theatre, television, religion, science and business.

Toronto Life will be "people oriented"—the faces, words and thoughts of Torontonians will be in the context of the "happenings" and the patterns of citizen involvement "About Town" in Toronto.

Toronto Life will make national and retail ads a feature—not a means to an end. In a book devoted to life and the living of it, exciting and inspired commercial copy must be a feature. The ad copy must be so placed and so creatively attuned to the reader that it is a part of the content.

So, there is the purpose translated into four specific service areas.

Operationally, we are getting better. Editorially, we are making progress. We are becoming less verbose and more consistent. Our writers are becoming increasingly succinct because Torontonians have too little time and too many opportunities to spend their limited time elsewhere.

If you leaf through the book you will see that it is now a more ordered and precise form, more familiar and more recognizable.

Through increasing adherence to commissioned features, we are strengthening and broadening the creative base and the number of contributing individuals.

We are unceasing in our efforts to stimulate the advertising community to increasingly create, especially for Toronto Life—to use Toronto Life as its testing ground for tomorrow's techniques in commercial communication.

There is no better place to try out the new, than in Toronto, and we pledge there will be no better showcase than Toronto Life. As to production—Toronto Life has been termed "Slick: Even as I agree, I must add that it has also been "stodgy and heavy handed".

We have concentrated on increasing the quality and amount of colour.

We have encouraged our clients to get special layouts and fresh copy even at added cost because Torontonians are constantly being upgraded and it does take more to motivate them. Throughout all aspects of production, we will continue to challenge the old dogma and the old techniques.

Circulation is only a measurement of where copies go. Distribution is only one part of the equation. Content and design are the other half.

We file herewith a copy of our January circulation report which will indicate the complete distribution of that month's issue.

There have been those who suggested that Toronto Life shift to free delivery of an expanded press run, thus providing advertisers with a much inflated circulation figure—a technique which is used by theatre programmers and latterly by Toronto Calendar.

We learned many years ago in the daily newspaper field, that paid circulation represents a quality of readership, a basic interest in the paper and the community which results in higher response levels to both news and ad content. It is this basic "readership response factor" which dictates our decision that Toronto Life shall continue to be sold to its readers by subscription and by newsstand sales.

In addition there will be regular extension of distribution to special interest groups or citizens inside and outside the city. We have applied for membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations and have been invited to join the Magazine Advertising Bureau.

We recognize that Toronto Life will probably never be a primary medium, that it will always be a special media consideration.

As a "one city" medium, it will compete for a somewhat limited and special type of advertising dollars. Until now sales revenue has never kept up to production cost.

As an advertising investment, we believe that Toronto Life will justify creation of new budgets because it has a new capacity to communicate in an ever increasingly complex community.

As publisher and president, Michael Sifton assumes full responsibilities for Toronto Life and works right with me in directing a four-man executive including: Business Manager, Jim Knox; Editor, Alan Walker; Supervisor of Sales, Tim Brown; Art Director, Nick Burnett.

The current staff is 24. Currently the number of contributing non-staff writers stands at 50.

We are just now starting to break even but as I mentioned at the outset, because we are not in the publishing business for a short term, we were prepared for the cost of the building. In this case, we are developing a new medium. And it has been an investment that is starting to pay off.

Toronto Life isn't just a magazine, and it certainly isn't a book. And it isn't a classic medium. It's just—Toronto Life—a special medium that will increasingly emerge as an integral part of our city and the new structure of communication which Toronto will require if it is to cope with the complexities and the potential of the seventies and the eighties, and beyond."

Thank you very much, gentlemen. I await your pleasure.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Balmer. I think the questions which we have for you we will direct to you and also Mr. Knox. I think perhaps Senator McElman has the first question.

Senator McElman: I noted that you made reference to social communications. At what level? Where are you primarily aiming this magazine? At the more affluent society or the general populace?

Mr. Balmer: At the outset, I would say that it was our intent to reach the upper income bracket, but we found and we still contend that the reader is going to dictate to us our success or our failure. We have attempted to broaden the base in recent months, but we have been very, very careful not to make any drastic changes. We feel very strongly that any changes that we do make in our makeup or our content has to be a gradual thing; so we have in recent months gradually broadened the base.

When we first started out—I refer you to our “About Town” section. This at one time—it seemed to me even before we took over, or shortly after, the “About Town” section was strictly for the upper crust, if you like...

The Chairman: The beautiful people?

Mr. Balmer: Yes, that is right, and everyone had a drink in their hands. This was the thing that we argued about—that we just couldn't survive on this basis; so now we have changed and in the introduction to our About Town section we take on one subject, if you like. In this particular case in this newest issue, it is the current production of Hair; but last month we visited one of the curling clubs, where youngsters were skiing and adults were curling. We try to broaden the base and get at the people who we think are the typical Torontonians. I am beginning to feel like a typical Torontonian myself although I have only lived there ten years.

Senator McElman: The reason I asked is because the issues that I have been able to have a look at, go back some little while; and I notice advertisements for gold and black velvet suits for gentlemen, rather expensive evening attire for ladies, and jewelry, and so on, and mind you the price listings with them are rather substantial. It seemed to me that it must have been levelled at a pretty high measure of income?

Mr. Balmer: Yes, you are quite right. As an advertising type who grew up in the newspaper business, I was rather amazed at some of the results we were getting from advertisers. A case in point was a jewelry firm who was advertising a soup taurine and this soup taurine was, believe it or not, $12,000. We had four people who wanted this one and only, and the result was that the first person got it and the other people went in and bought—as the advertiser told us—in excess of $5,000 worth of other valuable products.

In the meantime we have also found out that there was a tourist association in the United States which ran a very modest advertisement in black and white. In my way of thinking, it was not a particularly attractive advertisement. Mike Sifton came to me on day and said “What do you think of this advertisement”? And I said, “Well, I am not crazy about it, Mike but it might run,” and he said “Well, this fellow is on the phone and he is ecstatic because he had received 399 inquiries in the last ten days about it.” They had a little key in the bottom of the ad to write or phone and they knew that they were getting results. This led us to believe then that we did have an audience of people who were travel minded.

We also find—you introduced the question of us appealing to an affluent audience—we also have found that we are appealing to an audience of people with disposable incomes. Now, this may be a home where a man and a wife are both working so that as a result they have disposable incomes that would probably exceed those of an established family where only the man is working and has a family to raise.

These are the things that we wrestle with and we are trying to broaden the base and not be sleezy, if you like, and bring it down. Mr. Sifton, as you know, is a wealthy man and it is not his idea just to run a magazine just to please his friends. This is not our attitude at all.

Senator McElman: You are still looking for your own level in other words?

Mr. Balmer: Yes. I would say we are, yes. We don't think think we have arrived at any real conclusions in this connection at all.

Senator McElman: I noticed in this fly that was in the March issue...

Mr. Balmer: Yes?

Senator McElman: That you say:

“What we mean is, if we list and we comment, we recommend.”

Going back again to earlier issues, I noted that the liquor advertisements were again for a pretty high class of liquor. It is the top in each of the lines. Then in skimming several of the editorial sections, it seems to drop in here and there that it is nice to have good wines with the meal and when you come in out of the cold it is nice to be able to lift one's arm—not in this terminology...

Mr. Balmer: No.

Senator McElman: But the "drop-ins" are there. Is this a new editorial policy to work along with the ads?

Mr. Balmer: No. When I mentioned that we recommend, we were dealing primarily with our listings at the front of the book in the Life in Toronto Section where we deal with, say, restaurants and eating establishments, et cetera.

Senator McElman: Well, let us take it out of this context then. Is it a new editorial approach to tie in with the advertising that you are carrying?

Mr. Balmer: Not with the ads particularly because we are certainly not going to take any advertising which we don't feel is justified and doesn't meet our requirements.

Senator McElman: Don't misunderstand me now.

Mr. Balmer: No.

Senator McElman: I was referring to the high class of liquor ads?

Mr. Balmer: You are quite right that the advertising of the liquor is geared to the upper income groups. They themselves recognize that Toronto Life...

Mr. Fortier: Do the upper income groups buy Carlings Black Label?

Mr. Balmer: This is a good point. We do have people that think as we do and that are interested in Toronto and would like to support a book of this nature. For that reason and that particular case, this gentleman—I went to lunch with him and this I can recall very vividly, simply to discuss the magazine—he volunteered that he wanted to advertise. We were not fighting him off but Mr. Sifton said to him "we didn't come here to sell you anything", and he said "no, but I like your book, I would like to support it" and that is the reason for that advertisement. It is not a lunch-pail book or anything of that nature, and that is the reason for that.

The Chairman: Senator Petten?

Senator Petten: May I ask a supplementary on that? There were 19 liquor ads in that particular issue and in another part of the book there is an item called "Toronto Lives Guide to Entertainment" and there is a little editorial on that, and then a cooking item headed "When Holiday Guests Drop By" and there is a picture of a ski lodge with people outside and that sort of thing. Now, that is a little different than the way you answered my friend, Senator McElman. I will put my question a little differently. Is this not a tie-in with advertising and editorial content?

Mr. Balmer: Yes. Maybe I should ask Mr. Knox to answer that because this was an advertising and promotion package.

Senator Petten: Well, I don't want to beat it to death.

Mr. Balmer: We are here to answer your questions.

Mr. James R. Knox, Business Manager, Toronto Life: The original comment "if we comment, we recommend" which was referred to...

Senator Petten: Yes, it is in your brief.

Mr. Knox: The section you were talking about was in fact an advertising promotion developed to sell advertising space to help keep the magazine from showing red figures and to hopefully show some black. In that particular issue we did a readership study and those articles received a very considerable high readership figure from the readers of the magazine.

If I can add something to what has already been said about the liquor advertising which is of a high quality, I think it is because the selected companies recognize that the kind of people who read this magazine are apt to be in a position to afford that kind of liquor. We know from the figures that were just recently distributed that about one-third of Canadians show an income return of approximately $3,600 a year, so those advertisers wouldn't be selling Drambuie to those kind of people so they do have a limited market to which they could advertise. This is one of the values of a magazine like Toronto Life in that it does reach a specialized group in a specialized market.

Senator Petten: Well, just let me add that I have nothing against liquor—a couple of my friends have advertisements in here.

Mr. Knox: Well, thank your friends for us.

Senator McElman: Mr. Balmer, you have both had great experience in the daily newspaper field and more laterly in the broadcast field. I understand fully what you said in your brief and Mr. Sifton's reasons for establishing a magazine like Toronto Life, but I do find it hard to understand, in spite of the fact that the magazine field in Canada has been a sick and failing industry to a large degree, why at this point in time one would venture into it? Did your group feel that it had some sort of special expertise that it could move into this area and succeed where others weren't succeeding?

Mr. Balmer: You sound so much like Mike Sifton's father when he started into business. That was exactly the same sort of terminology that Clifford said to Mike. Mike and I happened to be out west at the time we were giving this consideration. When Mike informed his father he said "Mike, you know, at this time when all these magazines are having trouble it is just ridiculous to embark on an enterprise of this nature." But Mike is a fellow who likes challenges. I have worked with the family for 32 years so I know them pretty well. Even now he talks this way.

I recall so well the speech Mike made to the staff on the morning we officially took over the magazine. Someone there from one of the Toronto papers asked Mike how long he expected to carry on with this and his answer was "I am not used to being associated with failures." Even to this day he is looking at the odds and saying "They are not for us and we will find our way."

I don't think it is so much the expertise of our people although this comes up periodically when Mike and I sit down and discuss these things. We say "Look, there is a man out there in Regina. We will just move him in here to fill this slot." This of course would happen and I would say "Now, don't disturb this situation, just leave it the way it is." This is a Toronto magazine and I myself, being a westerner, find it difficult to field this as he does.

As is mentioned in the brief, he is a fierce Canadian and he is fiercely Torontonion. He wants this to succeed and I have no doubt in my own mind that it will succeed. It is not succeeding because it is a magazine; we try to suggest that it is different. It is not a magazine—it is a special medium that we think will emerge as being fairly successful.

Now, the ones that are successful in the United States—and there aren't many—I think one of the most successful ones now is The Philadelphian. We have watched these pretty carefully although we have tried to resist the urge to go down and see what they do because we feel ourselves we want this to remain a Canadian approach. We are not trying to make it a Chamber of Commerce document—and The Philadelphian does not carry any editorial colour.

Now, if we wanted to take the colour out of our magazine—if you have noticed this is quite colourful. This, again, is by choice. Our binding which you see is expensive, the paper itself is an expensive type of paper and this is just the approach which we have adopted. We think we can be successful, not because we are experts but we just have a feeling that we will be successful in spite of the odds.

Senator McElman: Maybe it is a good thing that you are not bound by tradition?

Mr. Balmer: Well, this is right. In our newspapers, (and you mentioned newspapers earlier) we are not radical but we are making changes in our format. Most papers now have what they call women's pages—we don't call them women's pages, and even the two newspapers don't agree on what they call it. The Star Phoenix, I believe, calls it "Family Living" and the Leader Post has another title which I just can't think of at the moment. However, it is an approach which is different and Mr. Sifton's attitude to us is just because it has been done for 50 years doesn't make it right. We are going to change and be flexible, and this is the attitude we are adopting in this.

Our approach is different and I think at a time when the magazines in Canada are having trouble advertisingwise we have been fairly successful. I would suggest that certainly in earlier months our deficit was brought on by mistakes of our own—with due respect Mr. Knox—and this is a fact. If it was just a matter of getting some black on the ledger, there are many, many ways we could trim it and we have arguments with Mr. Sifton on this.

This first page of the About Town Section is in colour and is a regular feature and is always in colour. This has been something which has come us in the last six months or so, I guess.

I have wandered a lot and I apologize.

Senator McElman: When Mr. Sifton was here I recall he told us that when he took over Toronto Life his publishing friends greeted him with roars or peels of laughter, but do you think he is getting closer to the position where he is going to laugh back?

Mr. Balmer: Periodically he smiles.

Senator McElman: Well, you took this thing over at a rather sad time when the magazine industry was a pretty sad picture in Canada.

Mr. Balmer: That is right.

Senator McElman: Apparently during the last couple of months from last year apparently you are getting to the break even point.

Mr. Balmer: Right.

Senator McElman: So you have turned it around?

Mr. Balmer: Well, I wouldn't like to say that we have turned it around—to be so positive. We feel that we are coming our way.

Senator McElman: You have shown a good measure of success from taking it where it was to where it is now.

Mr. Balmer: We would like to think so, yes.

Senator McElman: Well, call it expertise or whatever you want. There are a great many Canadians who feel that there is a need for not so much a vertical type of magazine but one with general news reporting similar to Time magazine in the English language in Canada. This afternoon we had as a witness Mr. Allard from Sept Jours and he said that he felt certain that this could be successfully done. Would you give any thought, with your successful experience, to approaching this?

Mr. Balmer: Well, I am rather amused that you should say that because as I sat in the back this morning I could feel this coming out of the meeting with the Time people. I felt that here we are banging our heads against all odds and, if you like, approaching success and at this point in time—I should really quote Clifford Sifton when he says "You have enough on your plate now. Do not tackle anything else." I think this could be done but I am not intimate with the mechanical problems of putting out a magazine like the Time people do, but in Canada to get a national publication across the country in short order, would be the major difficulty. As I heard them this morning, I was just shuddering to myself and wondering how they rely on air communications to transport films and meet deadlines—it must be a tremendous worry. I just really don't know, but I think it could be done.

Mr. Sifton himself, if you would like to get into our philosophy again, has said so many times in our meetings that this could be the daily newspaper of the future. Again, this is a pretty wild and imaginative approach, but Mr. Sifton is an imaginative character, if you like. We were talking earlier when we were reviewing our brief—you people have really created a great deal of thought within our organization because of these hearings and the suggestion—and it is a worry—as to what is the future of daily newspapers. For one who has been brought up and who has lived in the newspaper field all his life, I can't buy this prospect of pressing a button and watching.

Again, I sat in on a blue sky session with some broadcasters and some newspaper people one day while they guessed, if you like, what the future would be like in communications 20 years from now. They had some pretty wild dreams on what it would be like to sit in your own communications room in your home. Then we drifted from this and one of the broadcasters—I don't know why he took this particular attack but he turned to me and said "What is wrong with your newspapers?" He said "I get on the subway and they are big, you know. Why can't you get something that I could read without putting elbows in my neighbours face? My wife gets annoyed with me because I go to bed and I am reading the paper and I am doing the same thing there. You know, it is such a bulky thing" and he made some other reference about reading the paper in the bathroom, and I told him that "you people amaze me because you keep telling me that we are going out of business but here you are reading a newspaper in three different places that I don't"—now, I have gotten off the subject again and I apologize.

The Chairman: Well, you certainly have got off the subject and I blame Senator McElman. Senator McElman, would you care to ask a question which is more to the subject?

Senator McElman: Well, the reason I put the last question with the acknowledged genuine and enthusiastic Canadian family such as the Sifton family is and with their financial stability, it seemed to me that in view of the testimony we had been receiving, it might be a very plausible question to put to a magazine such as yours. Just to follow along those lines, the special privilege which Time magazine and Reader's Digest have in Canada—would you consider this to be a pretty strong reason for anyone, either a group such as yours or any other corporate body holding back from moving into this area? Is it a restrictive factor?

Mr. Balmer: Well, I would hate to speak for somebody else, but I would suggest yes, it must be. But again I would like to comment that when this came up years ago we did not oppose it then. Our attitude is we will survive on our merits and we don't want to have anybody legislate against our competition in order to protect us. We feel that we will survive and the reader is ultimately the one who dictates the success or failure of your publication.

The Chairman: You said a moment ago that you did or you don't oppose it?

Mr. Balmer: We did not.

The Chairman: Now, what is it that you didn't oppose?

Mr. Balmer: We didn't oppose the fact that Time and Reader's Digest received the exemption. We stated that everybody should be allowed to come here if they so desired.

The Chairman: Well, may I just ask a supplementary question? Do you regard the Toronto issue of Time a competitor to your magazine?

Mr. Balmer: Yes, I would have to say so. I think any publication is competitive, but I think anybody buying Time would not necessarily say that they won't buy us because they buy Time.

Mr. Knox: Well, let me put it this way. We rarely run into a head-on conflict with Time magazine with our retail advertisers. We do occasionally, but we do not in fact run head-on into them too many times in retail advertising. As Mr. LaRue mentioned this morning, many national advertisers buy segments of the Canadian market and they recognize the Time regional segment as being valuable to them for certain of their products just as they regard Toronto Life as a valuable marketing tool for a segment of their product.

To answer the question which hasn't been asked just now but was asked earlier, no, we don't fear competition from Time.

The Chairman: Well, if I can just find an advertiser here—here is one H. A. McLean Chevrolet Oldsmobile Limited, 195 Yonge Street, Aurora—this is a full page ad at page 33. M. Knox, how much money would that cost McLean's?

Mr. Knox: It would cost $935.

The Chairman: And what would McLean's pay for a full page in the Toronto edition of Time?

Mr. Knox: About $1,000.

The Chairman: So it is that inexpensive for him to buy a full page in the Toronto edition of Time?

Mr. Knox: Yes.

The Chairman: So you are pretty comparable, in other words?

Mr. Knox: Well, our rates are comparable but our cost per thousand is much greater.

The Chairman: However, you must have a good sales force?

Mr. Knox: Well, we have a good magazine.

Mr. Balmer: Just while we are on the matter of local advertising—I hate to get too enthusiastic but if you will turn to page . . .

Senator Prowse: Turn to page 36, that is a good page.

Mr. Balmer: Page 49—that is an advertisement created by our own people and I like to think that this is typical of our expertise, if you like . . .

Senator McElman: Page 48 or 49?

Mr. Knox: Our own photographers took those pictures, our own people wrote the copy. We have designed the campaign for Atwood's Traditional Interiors who are successful interior decorators. They came to us after three years of operation and said "we really believe your magazine is for us". This, in my opinion, is an indication that we are arriving.

The Chairman: Who is your number one competition for local advertising?

Mr. Knox: Well, our number one competition for local advertising has to be the three Toronto newspapers. We are in, if you will excuse the expression—in an unfortunate position because we just happen to have three darned good newspapers here in Toronto. The retailers in Toronto recognize this and have recognized it over a good many years. They don't understand the philosophy of the magazine because a retailer, for instance, could put an advertisement in a Toronto paper tomorrow and feel the effects of it Friday or Saturday, but if he wants to get into our issue it would be April and he wouldn't even see the ad for five weeks, so he just doesn't understand the philosophy.

Now, Mr. Ken Atwood has finally arrived at the idea that building a retail store or retail business is not a matter of simply selling an item today; it is a matter of selling traffic through the store.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I will pass for now.

Mr. Balmer: There is one good issue which worried me when I heard that we were doing a story on one of the Senators—this always causes great concern to me—but we like to think it came off all right.

The Chairman: I have no comment.

Senator McElman: I would like to get back to this matter of a national news magazine. In the light of the fair four pages, five pages, six pages that Canadians have today, in what Senator O'Leary described as a Canadian magazine do you as a Canadian feel that we need such a news magazine? A national news magazine?

Mr. Balmer: Personally as a Canadian yes. I would like to see a Canadian magazine.

Senator McElman: Do you think it has a purpose?

Mr. Balmer: Oh, sure. However, I don't agree with Senator O'Leary when he says that Time is a Canadian magazine. Time people themselves say it is an American magazine and I think Canadians buy it not because it is a Canadian magazine—they buy Time. I think if they took out those four fair pages as you call them I think they would still buy Time.

However, as a Canadian I would like to see a national publication of this nature. I recognize the difficulties in trying to achieve success with such a publication but in my own limited experience transportation and delivery are enormous problems. We have a problem right in Saskatchewan that is unique to the daily newspaper field and that is that our papers are delivered two and three hundred miles away under very difficult conditions in the wintertime . . .

Senator Prowse: Time doesn't?

Mr. Balmer: No, we serve the urban communities.

Senator Prowse: Well, it must be possible?

Mr. Balmer: Well, it is but they did mention the fact that they changed executives and I can certainly understand that. I think that is high pressure business which I would not . . .

Senator Prowse: Well, I think that was mentioned in another context.

Mr. Balmer: Yes, but I think this giant, if you like, in the States—I can't help but feel that these people are under tremendous stress and I would not like to be in it. I am very grateful that I am working in an atmosphere where there are stresses, sure, but not to the proportions that they have.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: You began saying something but you didn't quite complete your sentence. . .

Mr. Balmer: I am sorry.

Mr. Fortier: What if the so called Canadian edition of Time had removed from it the four pages . . .

Mr. Balmer: Oh, yes, I am sorry. I was going to suggest that if they did take out those four pages—and this is a personal opinion—I don't think this would affect the circulation of Time. I think these people who buy Time buy it for the fact that it is an international publication if you like. Sure, they are interested and I agree with you they would like to see much more Canadian content, but I don't agree that it is because of that little bit of Canadian content that they buy Time. That is just a personal opinion.

Senator Prowse: Newsweek has 55,000 copies in here today. You might take the four pages out today but if the four pages hadn't been in there originally—a lot of people might have thought like I do that when you bought a Time magazine you were helping to get Canada sent into the States—you would not think they would have 450,000 Times sold in Canada to 55,000 Newsweeks if they are competing on the same basis. Well, if Newsweek which sells at the same price—this would be an indication of about where Time might expect to be in Canada if it weren't for special conditions.

Mr. Balmer: Well, Senator, that is a very good question.

The Chairman: Well, before you comment on it I must say that this is a Toronto Life hearing and I think Senator Prowse, you will agree.

Senator Prowse: Well, I have other questions on Toronto Life.

The Chairman: Well, we dealt with Time this morning . . .

Senator Prowse: Well, Mr. Chairman, I just didn't want something to get a way ahead of us here.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, were you through?

Senator McElman: No.

The Chairman: Carry on.

Senator McElman: I will leave Time, but I don't want to leave the subject.

The Chairman: No, of course not.

Senator McElman: Let us accept that that unnamed one is an American magazine and I agree with you that four pages of Canadian content—it is an American magazine—an international magazine. As one who has just entered into the magazine field do you believe in the strengthening Canadian culture that we currently have . . .

Mr. Balmer: I am sorry, I missed that.

Senator McElman: Do you believe that with the strengthening Canadianism that we have presently or what Mr. Fortier said—I believe he coined a phrase here the other day "a notion of Canada." Do you believe or do you feel that such a magazine could still be produced in Canada in the foreseeable future? I am not asking whether your group can do it . . .

Mr. Balmer: No. That would be a guess, really. With the increased costs of doing this sort of thing, and they are increasing all the time, I can't see it in the foreseeable future, no. I think things tend to be more localized, and again our magazine is a local magazine.

Senator McElman: Well, I appreciate that but I am thinking of the hard battle that is going on now for the advertising dollars.

Mr. Balmer: Right.

Senator McElman: Do you think there is a possibility? In the hard fight for the buck—let's forget Canadianism for the moment—is this a vehicle for getting the bucks?

Mr. Balmer: Are you asking me that if there were such a vehicle would it be supported by advertisers?

Senator McElman: Yes.

Mr. Balmer: I can't see why not if it had the national appeal, sure. It has the advantage that newspapers don't have now because they can produce in colour which is comparable to anything that the broadcasters can do. This is why I think national television is more successful and attracts more advertising dollars—it is because it is national in scope and it is an easy thing for a national advertiser, one order, one transaction sort of thing; whereas in the daily newspapers national advertising in the daily newspapers has been a battle because there are so many transactions involved because you have to deal with this newspaper, and that newspaper, and so on. This will certainly provide a bridge, if you like, over that problem. And dealing with one local concern, if you like, will provide you with circulation right across the board.

Senator McElman: Perhaps I have led too far afield into the hypothetical Mr. Chairman, I am sorry.

The Chairman: That's fine. Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: On page 36 . . .

The Chairman: Of the magazine you mean?

Senator Prowse: Yes, of the magazine. I became completely intrigued and now I have come to the conclusion that I might be being had here. Now, this I take it is a take-off from Mad probably.

Mr. Balmer: No. This is a story indicating that somebody else has been had.

Senator Prowse: Now, can you make arrangements with the post office to find out how many of these little things here are completed and sent out to Rat Rapids, Ontario? I am not fooling, I would like to know if you get any replies to that advertisement.

Mr. Knox: Well, we are hoping, senator, if you don't mind me interrupting, that our readers are sophisticated enough to recognize that this is a satire and hopefully we will be right that they will recognize it as a satire, but I do think it would be a very interesting exercise to actually check that out.

Senator Prowse: Could you check that out?

Mr. Knox: Yes, we will.

Senator Prowse: I think it would be interesting.

Mr. Balmer: Well, I read the preliminary stories but the pictures weren't in at that time because we just picked it up from the printers on our way over yesterday—but you have a good point.

The Chairman: I am reminded of Pierre Berton's column which used to appear in the Toronto Star. Perhaps we can discuss this with him because he is coming before the committee, but he did things like this and he eventually got to the point where he had to put at the bottom of the column "this is a joke, please do not take seriously". He literally had to do that because I will be surprised if you have no response to that. I think Senator Prowse's question is a good one and it would be interesting, I quite agree.

Senator Prowse: I used to write a column in which I used to quote people and I was too lazy to look up the sources and I used the head of a Peruvian monastery by the name of His Tu and his confrere named His So and the library complained because they were getting too many requests for his books and that is why I say it would be interesting to me to see how many replies you get to this.

Mr. Fortier: A supplementary. Coming from Montreal it seems to me that if as I believe you should get a number of answers to this ad, I think you may wish to add a little bit of information to the highlight of your Toronto Life subscribers—they may not be quite as sophisticated as you indicated they are.

Mr. Knox: Well, let me if I may, Mr. Chairman, state that the study we made was made in the Toronto area subscribers.

Mr. Spears: In Etobicoke?

Mr. Knox: I consider beautiful downtown Etobicoke part of the Toronto area. We made that study in that area. Now, we have people who are subscribers who live in Nova Scotia and we have some very unusual and very strange things happening.

The Chairman: You better be careful.

Mr. Knox: For instance, a young man living in London, Ontario, and attending the University of Western Ontario acquired a copy of Toronto Life magazine and felt that it was a very good magazine and one that his mother would be interested in and so for a Christmas present he sent it to her—she became a subscriber.

The Chairman: Where was this?

Mr. Knox: It was somewhere in Nova Scotia but in any event it was in the Maritime Provinces. I received a letter from the father who stated that he didn't want his wife being exposed—being exposed...

Mr. Knox: To the magazine. We have readers—80 per cent will be in the 60, 70 mile range of Toronto. We have had outstanding evidence of the depth of readership and I am sure Mr. Spears with his years of experience in the magazine field would, if he could see some of the readership that we have would recognize this. For instance just the other day a man, who you know, came up to me and said "I just had the most amazing response to my picture which appeared in the About Town section. He said, "I walk down Bay Street and people mention they saw me there, I go to Ottawa and people mention it to me there, I go to Montreal and people mention it to me there," and he said "I even got a letter the other day from a fellow in the Northwest Territories"—now, how that subscription got up there, I will never know except that this man originally was perhaps a Torontonion and wanted to keep in touch with what was going on and picked Toronto Life as the medium that could do it for him.

Mr. Fortier: I think probably he circulated all those copies himself.

Mr. Knox: No, not really.

The Chairman: Mr. Knox, you mentioned Nova Scotia and you opened up the door for Senator Macdonald. Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: To get back to your brief here on page 2 (a) where you say that you certainly would not have embarked on this endeavour if you had known the contents of the White Paper on Taxation. How is the White Paper on Taxation going to affect you?

Mr. Knox: Well, I am not an economist and from what I have read even some of the best economists in Canada are not fully conversant to the full extent of the White Paper but there seems to be a prevalent feeling that small businesses will not be able to survive under the auspices, if you will, of the conditions of the White Paper.

Now, under those conditions a magazine which has a tough, tough row to hoe to become successful, and I think as Mr. Floyd Chalmers said in the early submission, as against the inclusion of Time and Reader's Digest that if he were embarking upon a new career today, that he certainly wouldn't invest in magazines. Now, I think this is what Mr. Balmer means by this. This is a hazardous business and with the restrictions that could be implicated I think we would be foolish to attempt anything.

The Chairman: Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: First of all, your magazine is owned and run by the Armadale Press, is that right?

Mr. Knox: Armadale Publishers Limited, yes.

Senator Prowse: Is that the same one that runs the Saskatchewan newspapers?

Mr. Knox: Yes sir.

Senator Prowse: So you are not in the $35,000 limit?

Mr. Knox: Well, we would be.

Senator Prowse: Well, are you a separate corporation?

Mr. Knox: Well, Mr. Balmer, I believe, would be able to answer that question.

Mr. Balmer: You are quite right but the fact is, and again I don't want to get into a great long discussion on the White Paper as we did on Time but I do feel that there is this threat in this White Paper, and certainly there is as far as succession duties are concerned. I think this is the one thing—I know that Mr. Sifton is concerned about this that when it is all said and done, it just goes back to the Government, if you like, and what is the incentive for him to embark on a new enterprise.—I can recall again when he first came into the business, his father came out west and mentioned to me, before I had moved into the position I am in now, he said "I told Mike if he wanted to go and sit on the beach the rest of his life, he could do that, but if he wanted to be a newspaperman here was his opportunity and he had to declare himself." He said, "Dad, I want to be a newspaperman." He did and he succeeded and this has been building up and of course Mr. Sifton has been as proud as can be because Mike is now the third generation publisher. Mike certainly looks forward to the day when he can turn over his enterprise to his family, but he is fearful that under the terms of the White Paper this may not be.

Senator Prowse: Well, what I am interested in is this. You indicate that there is something wrong with the White Paper and I am not about to justify everything that is in the White Paper, but I think that if we are going to attack the White Paper at the present time when this is merely a proposal or a series of proposals that we should be specific about what we are talking about. I am interested here because I think I can take the thing one by one and ask you questions about it and that is what I propose to do.

First of all, let's take—for instance, you operated at a loss for a period of time?

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

Senator Prowse: That is a deductible expense for Armadale Press of 52 or 54 per cent at the present time. So, with 54 per cent of your losses being carried by the Government while you are getting the magazine into business. They are your partners in the risk...

Mr. Balmer: Right.

Senator Prowse: Now, once you become successful then you have the right to pay out all the money in the way of salaries in which case people will be paid income on the basis as other Canadians receiving salary?

Mr. Balmer: That is right.

Senator Prowse: And have no income tax as such to pay. You can do that.

Mr. Balmer: I wish our accountant were here. I am not an accountant and when you start quoting 52 and 54 per cent...

Senator Prowse: Well, you made a statement.

Mr. Balmer: Well, the fact is that the chief concern—well, this was finalized only yesterday and that is the reason for it being page 2 (a), because I was concerned and the one thing I did want to make clear was the fact that we weren't looking for concessions—but we were concerned about the aspects of the White Paper as we envisage them now. The one thing in my limited knowledge of the White Paper is the fact that the succession duties are going to remove the possibilities of the paper being moved on.

There was one other reference—I think it was Saturday Night mentioned that when you are out selling advertising that there are expenses that are considered legitimate expenses...

Senator Prowse: These are salesmen's expenses?

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

Senator Prowse: This is your Diner's Club card, et cetera?

Mr. Balmer: This is a reasonable expense and I agree with you when you say "well, let's stop the abuses; let's not eliminate everything completely."

Senator Prowse: But that isn't putting your paper out of business, is it? What I am wondering about is you use the phrase White Paper. Mr. Chairman, we have been getting this sort of thing in three or four places and I think this is as good a time as any to tie it down.

Mr. Balmer: Well, here is another thing that concerns us. I was out Saskatoon way last week talking to a very good friend of mine and they are concerned with the White Paper. This is a man who is in business and they came down to him and tried to get him into a discussion on this thing, and I have no reason to doubt him because he is a man of the party...

The Chairman: It wasn't Mr. Thatcher was it?

Mr. Balmer: No, it wasn't Mr. Thatcher. He made the point that Mr. Benson was going to make some changes and they were asking him just exactly what they were. They said "Why don't you tell us what they are so we can get off your back?"

Senator Prowse: Well, let us not deal with your friend. Let us deal with your brief.

Mr. Balmer: Well, I am just saying that this is a concern of ours because of that.

Senator Prowse: Now, let us get back to your brief and to your magazine.

The Chairman: May I just interrupt long enough to say that Senator Prowse was going to read three points. I believe he has read two of them—how many do you have?

Senator Prowse: I wanted to deal first of all with the question of loss, they can write it off. Secondly, if they make a profit they can distribute it to themselves and they can take it there and if their income is in that bracket they get the same break as every other Canadian.

The Chairman: Well, why don't you go from there?

Senator Prowse: Now, the next point is on a capital gains basis. Fifty per cent of your capital gain will have to be thrown in and you will have to pay half of that so you will pay 25 per cent on the capital gain that you might sell this for at some later date. The Government has paid 50 per cent of your cost to get there in the beginning carrying you through the first stages and it doesn't seem to me that you are getting such a really dirty deal on that basis. That can't be what you are complaining about and this is what the White Paper says. It must be—when you say White Paper what you really mean is the estate taxes there, isn't it?

Mr. Balmer: Yes, I would suggest that maybe it is. I would like to qualify this...

Senator Prowse: Well, would you like to take that out now if you can't substantiate it?

Mr. Balmer: Yes, I would be content to do that as a matter of fact, but why I put this in here yesterday—it was after a discussion with Mr. Sifton—was the fact that he is concerned and his concern again is, I suppose, primarily from the estate taxes.

Senator Prowse: Well, suppose his father had done nothing but build up a trucking business that Mike would be taking over and then he would have precisely the same concern that you have here.

Mr. Balmer: I would think so, yes.

Senator Prowse: So this is not a problem that applies just to the publishing business?

Mr. Balmer: No.

Senator Prowse: But it applies generally to industry?

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

Senator Prowse: That is all I have on this point.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald?

Senator Macdonald: In that third paragraph where you say:

"Business Week featured the City Magazine as the 'talk of the town'."

You say that there will be nothing more prevailing in the seventies than the increased need to be involved in one's own community.

To go down further it says:

"A deep involvement which can provide the sense of belonging—a special belonging which alone can insulate the human spirit from the weight of world involvement that is pouring in on everyone."

Do you care to explain that? I don't seem to be able to follow you?

Mr. Balmer: Well, if you like, the magazine as we view it—we think our success in this coming decade is going to be because we are appealing to people who are involved in their communities. The pressures—there are pressures as we all know—that are real pressures. We are talking of belonging to the community. Toronto Life is not a national thing, it is a local thing. We are trying to localize the entertainment, if you like—I have put this very badly and I apologize—but we are trying to be more entertaining in a localized way and this is a classic example, I suppose, of one phase of the magazine that takes the pressures off the world around us. If you see all the daily newspapers you will see that in most cases they are printing nothing but the bad news, and yet when I think it is balanced out it isn't all bad news. I think this is particularly so with our youth. It seems we have said nothing in the newspapers but bad things, and yet when you do surveys in any one paper or any one series of papers for a period of time that it is not all bad news. This is what we feel is going to be one of our functions—to entertain and remove these pressures that build up on an international basis.

The Chairman: Senator Petten?

Senator Petten: I would like to ask a question directed to Mr. Balmer. We have had many people who have come before us and to whom we have posed this same question. You have a regular travel department and when your editor travels, do you pay for their travel or accommodation, or do some of the other people pay for this, such as the airlines?

Mr. Balmer: No, I think Jim is the man to really answer this question, but I would think that they usually provide a seat on a plane for them to travel on, or something like that.

Mr. Knox: It isn't always that easy.

Mr. Balmer: It isn't easy, no, I would agree.

Senator Petten: But they would look after the travel?

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

Mr. Knox: I wouldn't say 100 per cent.

Senator Petten: But then are you not obligated to write about that airline or country, or what have you?

Mr. Knox: Well, I think if you read the article that Merika Robert has done where she referred to an airline—for instance she might say that the trip to New York via Air Canada was most pleasant, and the services were efficient, and this is about the only amount of mention they get.

Senator Petten: Well, supposing the service hadn't been good and supposing the food was chicken and again wasn't good...

Mr. Knox: No, because that isn't what the story is about. The story is about where she has been.

Senator Petten: Well, when she gets there by Air Canada—they are taking her there for free, aren't they?

Mr. Knox: In some instances, yes.

Senator Petten: The country she is going to is paying for it?

Mr. Knox: In some cases they pay for the hotels. Merika, if you will excuse me for using a modern idiom, tells it as it is. We are very proud of the fact that we have many letters on file which say to us that Merika Roberts' articles are factual and interesting. I can quote as a for instance a woman who wrote that she was recently in Spain and Merika had written not to go to such and such a place or restaurant because the food was poor, the service was bad and the prices were high. All of the travel catalogues offered this as the place to go—I went and I am sorry I didn't take Merika's advice. So, Merika Robert does tell us as it is.

Senator Petten: She does write things that are not too complimentary.

Mr. Knox: That is right.

The Chairman: I just have a couple of questions which I would like to ask.

On page 79 of your magazine is that an editorial page or is that an advertisement?

Mr. Knox: No sir. That is a paid advertisement and was created virtually at the request of a number of advertisers and primarily these.

The Chairman: But shouldn't you indicate that it is a paid page?

Mr. Knox: Well we don't because it is "Toronto's guide to excellent dining"—"not Toronto Life's guide"—we eliminated that word so the readers would not be confused with the fact that we were advocating that they should go here.

The Chairman: Well, you wouldn't agree then, Mr. Knox, that most people would think that this is editorial copy?

Mr. Knox: I would hope not. I think that we have made some errors in the presentation. I think, for instance, we should have had bolder headlines on the names of the establishments. I think we have made errors in the presentation.

Mr. Balmer: I think that the Chairman has made a good point Jim, and this is a new issue off the press yesterday and certainly we don't want to mislead anybody into thinking that this is anything but an advertisement. We like to use editorial style, if you like, because they are attractive, but I certainly don't think we were deliberately trying to mislead them.

The Chairman: May I ask you on page 3 of your brief in the second paragraph you say that you want your magazine to meet the specialized needs of that city. What are the specialized needs of Toronto in your opinion Mr. Balmer?

Mr. Balmer: Well, the specialized needs—using this word specialized—they are again removed from, say, a publication which we were speaking earlier as a national publication...

The Chairman: Yes, I understand.

Mr. Balmer: This would be something dealing with the intimate goings on in Toronto. These are things which are unique to Toronto alone.

The Chairman: By goings on you mean information about?

Mr. Balmer: Yes. Well, there is a story in this particular issue on page 43. Now, one thing we are not trying to do is become a dictating magazine but we do think there are special problems that are unique to Toronto that we can deal with and this is the sort of thing that I had in mind there. Maybe the phrasing again—in the haste in which I dashed this brief off is somewhat misleading. I am sorry, but I did not intend it to be.

The Chairman: Well, just on the same subject—I don't want to chew it to death but you say in your four primary areas of service that Toronto Life will be a social instrument. What is Toronto Life going to do as a social instrument?

Mr. Balmer: Well again, dealing with subjects without becoming...

The Chairman: Well, you list here books, cinema, education, law, medicine, modern living, and so on and so forth, and you list a lot of things. I am not particularly proud as a Torontonians to inform my fellow Senators—I don't think I have to inform them, I think they know—that we have the most dramatic examples of urban poverty anywhere in Canada. Is this a thing which Toronto Life is going to concern itself with?

Mr. Balmer: Yes, sure. We have done and will do so but again without trying to be a crusading magazine.

The Chairman: What is wrong with being a crusading magazine?

Mr. Balmer: Well, we just don't feel that we ought to become a crusading magazine.

The Chairman: Why? Can you be a social instrument without crusading?

Mr. Balmer: Well, I think this again—we are trying to strive for a balance. There have to be people who are unconcerned. I think this is a basic problem with our community that there are people who are unconcerned. We, if we are going to be successful, we, again, we are trying to be balanced so we can deal with these things in a limited way without devoting our entire resources to all these things that are wrong. We don't think, and I don't think any magazine, or anybody, or any publication can survive if all they are going to do is pick out all the things that are wrong with their communities.

The Chairman: Well, are you going to pick out any?

Mr. Balmer: Are we going to?

The Chairman: Yes?

Mr. Balmer: Oh sure.

The Chairman: Well, there are lots of things wrong in Toronto?

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

The Chairman: Are you going to deal with these things?

Mr. Balmer: Yes. This is our thought again to deal with them in a limited way without becoming—I am sorry to keep on harping on this subject but we don't want to become a crusade magazine. We just don't think that this is feasible for our own welfare. The readers themselves...

The Chairman: Well, let us talk about the readers. That is really one of the other points that I wanted to raise. You made a reference to controled circulation magazines and the fact that you are not going to become one—

Mr. Balmer: No.

The Chairman: On page 3 again, the second last paragraph, you say:

"For it to succeed, we felt Toronto Life had to be important enough to interest the most involved and productive homes in greater Toronto—these had to be our target audiences."

Now, this phrase or sentence "the most involved and productive homes in greater Toronto"—you say these are going to be your target audience—isn't that the same target audience that Toronto Calendar is after? The identical audience?

Mr. Knox: I would say not, sir.

The Chairman: What is their audience?

Mr. Knox: Well, let me go back a little bit and explain it. Their medium is a device for creating advertising. When they started out they said that they were going to reach 80,000 people with incomes over $10,000 in Toronto. Now, they have changed their tune a little and say that they now reach the 20 per cent of the audience of Toronto which are in the over $10,000 bracket. Now, they are a free distribution. We could go that way...

The Chairman: Would you give me that figure again?

Mr. Knox: They are now saying that they reach 20 per cent—the 20 per cent of the people in Toronto who have an income of $10,000.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Knox: Now, a magazine for instance like Maclean's could quite easily go out and acquire a three million circulation tomorrow, on free distribution, and as such become a very good advertising vehicle—not perhaps a productive one, an effective one, but to use the terminology that the television people have used they would have "reach". They would have cost efficiency and these are the things that they could get with free distribution, but when a person invests his dollars in a magazine like this he is doing it because he wants to do it and therefore he is going to become involved with it and becoming involved with it is part of the things that we are talking about. He will become an involved person in the community.

The Chairman: Well, I follow what you are saying. Toronto Calendar then reaches 20 per cent of the people in Toronto who make over $10,000, but a highlight from an October 1969 study of Toronto Life subscribers estimated average household is $15,500 and if 72 per cent of the reader household has $10,000 or more income.

Mr. Knox: But we are not talking about those 20,000 people.

The Chairman: Well, nonetheless it says to me that you are after the same audience that Toronto Calendar is after?

Mr. Knox: Well, we are after that in a different way.

The Chairman: Well, I concede that at once.

Mr. Balmer: Well, the Senator is asking if we were actually in fact after the same audience and I think basically this is true.

The Chairman: I think they are.

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

Mr. Knox: I thought you said are we after the same audience.

The Chairman: Well, I think you are. You are both after the same audience.

Mr. Knox: Yes, but I would rather have it that they were coming after ours.

The Chairman: Well, I don't particularly care who is after whose audience, but the point is it is the same target group.

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

The Chairman: What concerns me is that there are an enormous amount of people in Toronto, the majority I would say that none of you care about in terms of magazine coverage. I am thinking of the people who ride the subways and who listen to Gordon Sinclair, who read racing forms and who watch Ed Sullivan on television, whose kids play hockey, the people who shop at Eaton's, and all this type of thing. I don't think these magazines reach those people?

Mr. Balmer: You are quite right.

The Chairman: You are not intending to?

Mr. Knox: No sir. We believe that there is a changing marketing concept in Canada. I think there is a changing attitude towards advertising, and attitudes towards readership of things, and there is a changing attitude of doing things. There is a changing attitude in the belief of things...

The Chairman: Well, as I look through the picture section I can't help but observe that these are real people but they are the beautiful people. I don't say that critically, incidentally, but for my own information that presumably is your target group?

Mr. Knox: Yes.

Mr. Balmer: Yes, I think you have a good point and again looking at this you are quite right. We have a colour shot there—and it was my own suggestion—because I go by that corner of Bay and Adelaide—the little boy that sells the fruits every day?

The Chairman: Yes, I know the corner.

Mr. Balmer: Now, we had his picture in that same section and it was because I thought this was Toronto and this is what Toronto Life is all about but we don't always stick to this sort of thing.

The Chairman: Please believe me I may sound as though I am being critical, I am not. All I am suggesting is that there is a considerable section of Toronto life who do not live beneath the poverty line that certainly are not in the Hunt Club set?

Mr. Balmer: Yes.

The Chairman: And I don't think you are reaching those people.

Mr. Knox: Senator, may I say this. We have now entered our fourth year of publishing.

The Sifton organization is entering its third year of ownership of this publication. There are some publications in this country who have gone past their fortieth year of publication and they still do not seem to know what their target group is or what their editorial philosophy will be. We must agree that we have not yet reached that decision. We hope that we can edit a magazine that will appeal to, that will interpret the activities and interest of the people—Torontonians who are involved and interested in their community.

The Chairman: Well, I must object very strongly to that statement because I think there are an awful lot of Torontonians who are involved and interested in their communities whose average income isn't $15,500.

Mr. Knox: I agree, and we have done.

Senator Prowse: Mr. Chairman, with all respect this is an interesting dialogue but it is getting a little repetitious. You have brought up your point and they have stated theirs.

The Chairman: Well, I appreciate Senator Prowse's advice...

Mr. Knox: May I just make one more point?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Knox: Two per cent of our readers earn under $2,000—20 per cent earn under $7,000. Fortunately or unfortunately, depending on the way you look at it, 12 per cent of our people make over $20,000.

Mr. Balmer: I think in answer to this question...

Mr. Knox: I think we are reaching a fairly broad sector of interested people.

Mr. Balmer: I think you have a very good point and I appreciate your concern. There is a great number of people in the category that you are speaking of and I think it would be great if somebody could come along with a publication that would appeal to those people. They have a need for a publication such as that the same as anyone else, but I don't think you can just bridge the gap—it is a very difficult thing.

The Chairman: Well, I think Senator Prowse's point is well taken and we have dealt with that at enough length. Are there other questions that the senators have?

Well, that being so I wish to thank the witnesses and to say that perhaps unlike other Senators I am familiar with Toronto Life—I have read it since its inception and I must say that I think that is an interesting magazine and I am delighted for example to have seen the story on Mr. Kennedy which I look forward to reading with great interest and I hope that I have not with my comments been forward in a critical sense at all.

Mr. Balmer: No sir.

The Chairman: We are grateful to you for coming and it was our original intention in having you here—we did consider having you here at the time we had the newspapers but our second consideration was that it would be more helpful to us to have you here during the week that we were dealing with magazines. As you have pointed out in your brief the phenomenon of the city magazines is something new and something which will doubtless be an increasing trend and so we are very grateful to you for coming.

Thank you very much.

The committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, February 24, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, we are receiving a brief from Québecor Inc. Sitting on my immediate right is M. Pierre Péladeau, the President of Québecor Inc. Accompanying him this morning, on his immediate right, is M. Jean-Claude Elie, Assistant to the President of Québecor Inc.; and on my immediate left is M. Jacques Craig, Managing Director of Québecor Inc.

M. Péladeau, as we requested in our guidelines, the brief you prepared was sent several weeks in advance of this hearing. It has been circulated to the Senators and, presumably, studied by them. We now turn to you for an opening statement in which you can explain your brief or expand upon it, amplify it, add to it or say other things which you may have in mind.

In our question period we will ask questions on your brief and oral statement and, perhaps, on other matters which interest us and which may not be referred to by you. We will put our questions to you, but you should feel perfectly free to refer the answering of such questions to either of your colleagues.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Péladeau, President of Québecor Inc.: We are appearing before you because we believe that we have gone through times which perhaps few people or few printing firms have gone through in the past few years. We believe that we are the only ones who have succeeded in giving birth, so to speak, or in bringing into the world a daily newspaper under present conditions, with all the technological difficulties which confront anyone who wants to start up a newspaper.

We thought—particularly after a few briefs which have been submitted to you to the effect that it seemed to be impossible to start up a daily in a region where there already was one—I am referring particularly to a statement by Mr. Bassett who has stated right here, I believe, (at least if we are to believe the reports that have been published) that he did not see any possibility of starting up a new daily in a region that already has one—we think we have proved the opposite. At present we are publishing two dailies which were created out of nothing. The first, Le Journal de Montréal has a circulation, according to the reports of the A.B.C. of September 30, 1969, of 58,000 copies a day. At the present time, we are over 60,000 copies a day. That will actually be shown in the forthcoming reports of the A.B.C.

In order to succeed in this venture, we have gone through enormous difficulties, which we mention mainly in our brief. Let us say, at the outset, that to start up a daily at the present time, it must be done with enormous temerity, and undoubtedly, perhaps, a certain sense of adventure. It is not an easy thing. At the outset, we had almost everything imaginable against us. First, there was the feeling, or I would even say an opinion, circulating in our opinion, falsely, to the effect that it is not possible to start up dailies today. We believe that we have proved the opposite. But to do that, we had to overcome extraordinary difficulties, including the difficulty of building up a circulation, the difficulty of getting the press services essential to the publication of a newspaper, and then the distribution services for putting this newspaper at everyone's disposal. Secondly it was also necessary to get advertising support, without which a newspaper today cannot prove itself. We solved those phenomena, with a great deal of trouble but also with a great deal of joy, because, to succeed in such an undertaking gives an enormous amount of joy.

There was question before your Committee about the danger of ownership concentration of the printed media. I believe, today, that that phenomenon can no longer even be discussed because it is a phenomenon that we have to live with. Certainly the large newspaper firms, that have means available that we do not, can pay prices that we cannot pay. Our stand, when faced with that fact, instead of fighting at a disadvantage with firms which, at the outset, were in a position to offer more than we could, was to start publications ourselves. Therefore, I think that the best answer at present to the concentration phenomenon is to start up new publications, and it is feasible, in spite of what is said about it.

To do so, we drew up a few recommendations which, if they were implemented, might permit the birth of new daily publications, particularly in the Province of Quebec.

The Ontario market has permitted and has proved, moreover, the possibility of having dailies in several small localities. In Quebec, that does not exist. We have publications concentrated in the large metropolitan areas, namely Montreal, Trois-Rivières, Sherbrooke; but there are, nevertheless, in our opinion, several other locations where the publication of dailies might be successful. It is our intention to meet that obligation. We are counting on applying the techniques that we used in the case of Le Journal de Montréal and Le Journal de Québec, with which we are not yet at the stage of operating at a profit. We believe that we must and can do it this year.

We suggest several types of recommendations. We believe, and at that moment we fall somewhat in the same position as Mr. Bassett, that paper companies could be of great use in permitting the birth of new dailies. To do so, they would have to offer favourable prices to these new dailies. It is obvious that they can do so, on their own, but it is rather doubtful, and it is a bit quixotic to hope that they will do it. At the same time, the government could perhaps allow them, through tax arrangements, to meet and offer any assistance whatever to the new dailies. So we believe that the federal government could be of great usefulness.

In Quebec, and we mentioned this in our brief quite precisely, we are used very emphatically by the provincial government which makes great use of the media, of dailies to express its messages. If the federal government used similar methods, we believe that that might enormously help the dailies, particularly those which are having difficulties when starting up. Also as we mentioned in the brief, since the federal government undertakes to become our partner when things are going well for us—a 50 per cent partner, moreover, that is, a major partner—why would it not be our partner also at a time when we need it? We have always thought that a partner should show his worth not only at a time when it is a question of reaping the profits but also when it is a question of bearing the initial difficulties. We believe that the federal government particularly is not fulfilling its role completely.

As we also mentioned in the brief, the newspaper, the daily particularly, generates regular employment, in addition to being a very important economic lever. It is public knowledge that when a city—this is what is happening now in Vancouver, and what happened recently in Detroit—when a city experiences a newspaper strike there automatically is an economic slowdown. In our opinion, this is therefore important and relevant enough proof of the very important economic role, I would even say major role, of a daily in any city whatsoever.

Furthermore, apart from the fact that the federal government could give positive assistance by giving advertising—and it could do so by spreading out such sums, (because after all the federal government spends considerable sums in various media), I do believe that by diversifying slightly such types of advertising, it could be a more direct way of presenting its message.

Furthermore, starting up a daily requires sums of money, considerable expenditures. We also suggest that there be a certain tax abatement formula. This is one way; there surely are several others.

The federal government, among others, subsidizes certain industries, such as the mining industry, which represents considerable sums of money invested, with considerable risks. We believe that starting up dailies falls somewhat in the same category, and we do not see why it would not be possible to have government help there also. It would be, let us say, the opposite of advertising assistance, a somewhat negative element—that is, the publisher, or the entrepreneur who feels the obligation or who answers a need to start up a daily would be able to recover a part of the losses incurred by this daily.

For a number of years, we have seen the collapse of a certain number of dailies. Some, at the outset had every reason to succeed. They had a great deal of capital and they had very able and experienced teams of journalists. For our part, we did not have such opportunities and we did not have such advantages. But, if such publications which have gone under had taken advantage of the suggestions we are making, perhaps they would still be with us.

Let us say that we ask the question, and we very much hope that the federal government particularly will revise its stand both at the tax level and in a greater understanding of the role of the dailies.

For our part, we have been handicapped, at the start, in several ways, and we still are. We are forced to handle only local news because our present means do not permit us to do what we would like to do. As we progress, we are counting on contributing all the elements and all the staff which make up a complete daily. But to do that, obviously, we must have greater advertising support and this is what we are counting on at present. As we are progressively more capable of being more and more profitable, we shall give our newspaper the elements it is lacking. We are counting, at that moment, like everyone else, on offering a more complete newspaper, which will be ahead of the news, and in the new spirit which is today the French Canadian fact.

There it is, gentlemen.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Péladeau. I gather that the other two gentlemen are not going to speak now, but they are available for questions.

Mr. Péladeau: Certainly.

The Chairman: I think perhaps we should begin with Mr. Fortier.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Before I went to university, I recall that my father told me (because I hinted to him that I was not sure whether I should practise law) that law leads to everything. And if I look before the Committee today, I notice that it is true that law leads to everything. You, yourself, have studied law and Mr. Elie also studied law, didn't he?

Mr. Jean-Claude Elie, Assistant to the President, Québecor Inc.: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Péladeau, did your law course prepare you more particularly for the role that you are playing today in your communications undertaking?

Mr. Péladeau: I would like to say, Mr. Fortier, that before studying law, I took a degree in philosophy and, from the degree in philosophy, I was faced with the necessity of taking a degree in law. I think that both have been useful to me.

The publishing phenomenon can be considered on two planes, I think. On one hand, there is the so-called philosophical, disparate and esoteric element; on the other hand, there is an extremely practical, extremely real and extremely authentic element. Both have been very useful.

Mr. Fortier: Why did you invest in the print medium rather than in another field. What attracted you to print?

Mr. Péladeau: I might wonder what attracted Mr. Dansereau to it?

Mr. Fortier: He would answer: money.

Mr. Péladeau: And I would answer the same thing. I think that if one wants to be honest, it is almost the same problem everyone has, because a press undertaking must first of all be a profit making undertaking; otherwise there are no advantages.

Mr. Fortier: That is what you say in your brief.

Mr. Péladeau: Yes. Therefore, from that, once profitability has been established, if you have something on your mind and if you have something to say, I think that it is only from that moment on that you can contribute anything. I cannot conceive of a press undertaking at the present time as an educational undertaking, contrary to several other opinions. I believe that education comes as an extra. I do not believe that a newspaper reader at the outset wants to be educated. I do not believe that. I believe that a reader wants to get news; then at that moment, that depends on "what is news"? In our case, we took it for granted that the news that we could get, with the basic means that we had, was local news. As we progress, we shall go and look for more comprehensive news in other areas.

Mr. Fortier: Do you feel a very special responsibility due to the fact that you are the owner of a daily, or of a weekly? What I mean is if I drew a comparison between...

Mr. Péladeau: A car salesman and a newspaper salesman?

Mr. Fortier: That's it, although I believe that there is a difference...

Mr. Péladeau: I think that there is a great difference. Although a car salesman must sell a car that is in order, what happens quite frequently is that he sells a lemon. Well I think that he will not be selling for long. Therefore, a newspaper is almost the same thing. We have to give information in the newspaper that is correct, that is fair, because, if you give information that is incorrect or incomplete, well, you will not keep your readers. It's as simple as that. The quality of the newspaper necessarily goes with your reader.

Mr. Fortier: Would you go so far as to say that the citizens of Montreal were poorly served by the newspapers they had in 1964, is that why you decided to start up in the newspaper publishing field?

Mr. Péladeau: It is not really up to me to answer that. At the present time, if we have sixty thousand readers, they are sixty thousand readers who certainly were dissatisfied elsewhere.

Mr. Fortier: You answered a certain need?

Mr. Péladeau: Without a doubt.

Mr. Fortier: I am sure that before starting up a daily; you had profitability studies made?

Mr. Péladeau: Curiously no. We left that to others. And, a remarkable thing, Le Nouveau Journal and Métro-Express—two dailies that were started, one shortly before us and the other at approximately the same time—made many studies and the studies were summarized in a rather curious way because they are more or less valid today. But no, we did not make studies.

Mr. Fortier: You did not make studies?

Mr. Péladeau: Not at all.

Mr. Fortier: Are the members of the Committee right in believing that you, as a Montrealer considered that there was a shortcoming, that there was a gap that had to be filled?

Mr. Péladeau: Undeniably.

Mr. Fortier: Was that gap, at that time, in 1964, exclusively in the field of local news or in the field of sports, or were those two fields imposed on you by circumstances?

Mr. Péladeau: When we started Le Journal de Montréal, La Presse was on strike. Even though we knew that La Presse would not be on strike long...

Mr. Fortier: But you had decided before?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, we had decided to start the newspaper in the fall. We went ahead with our project because at the same time we learned that another group was planning to start up a daily newspaper, and we got a head start.

The study was fairly simple. I read in Executive recently a very fine biography of a man who heads Versafood Services Ltd. who said that he had started his firm after noting that there was a definite gap on the market and that he intended to fill that gap through his firm.

We examined the market in a very simple way. We had before us Montréal-Matin, which was heavy on sports, with an extraordinary sports section, particularly professional sports. But they had a very definite shortcoming: as a political newspaper, they put a great deal of emphasis on the political party to whom they had to answer.

On the other hand, there was also Le Devoir which, in our opinion performed and still performs, an essential role but which was nevertheless a newspaper which placed very little importance on information. There was La Presse which, in our opinion also, represented a very heavy monument and perhaps too heavy, in that it was thick and it took too long to read. We recognize the fact that the impact of television, which attracts a large audience, does not permit a publication as large and as complete as La Presse to be read fully. On the other hand, La Presse could afford to have four or five representatives in Quebec, three or four in Ottawa, and news services which were too costly for us; so we went to specifics.

There were things that the others did not publish; in particular Montreal-Matin, which was greatly concerned with sports, (I am speaking of professional sports) had neglected amateur sports. We are greatly oriented towards amateur sports and I believe that we have filled a gap, a vacuum, and from that moment on, we have attracted a public interested in amateur sports. As for news, the same thing applied. If there was local news, whether it was Montreal-Matin or La Presse that had more substantial means than we did, it would cover the event in question, but we were also able to cover it. And if we were able to cover it better and more completely than they did, we had a response.

At a time, when it was being said—and people were repeating everywhere—that it was impossible to produce an off-set daily, we proved that it was possible to do it. The off-set enabled us to have extraordinary clarity of photography and a graphic play that ordinary typographic printing did not permit. Thus we made use of the means we had and we maximized them as much as possible and from that moment on, we had created an identity. We did not try to go into the others' market and we did not try to come up with a publication that we could not cope with.

At that time, I used an expression which has proven quite true. When Le Nouveau Journal was published, I said to my friends—the mistake that Le Nouveau Journal is making is that they want to compete right from the start, completely and directly, with La Presse and with services that are as large as La Presse. La Presse, having been built up over a number of years, did not become La Presse in three or in five years. It took a long time. First of all, there is an element of continuity.

It's as if someone in Montreal were to decide one day to open as large a store as Eaton's beside Eaton's. I think that it would not be able to breathe. It has to be done gradually and very calmly, taking on the difficulties of starting up and correcting them as they arise.

Mr. Fortier: Now, in your opinion, is that the major reason for the failure of Le Nouveau Journal which tried to compete on the same level with La Presse?

Mr. Péladeau: Undeniably, and the second reason is that they, at the same time, wanted to make all the same services available. What was also one of the major handicaps, was that they were not putting their paper on the market. There is not much point in having the best paper in the world...

Mr. Fortier: The newspaper has to be on the market...

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, and whether it is the most complete, or the best produced, if people cannot buy it, obviously, you are then wasting your time.

We believe that a daily at the outset must first of all have an element of continuity which people can find in your newspaper. It has to be there. Whether it is well produced or badly produced—it has to be there. From the moment that it is there, you can be in a position to be able to make corrections inch by inch. I think that it is the one and only way to make corrections—as you notice errors.

Mr. Fortier: What are you planning to correct now in Le Journal de Montréal?

Mr. Péladeau: Oh, we have a long way to go—we are just beginning, really. Our next step will be to have very comprehensive reporting. Except occasionally in a few other papers, we do not see properly conducted inquiries these days, with complete reports on given topics. I would say that the press—I mean that in the broad sense, I am not referring to the Montreal daily, La Presse—in Quebec, especially in Montreal, has in some cases failed to fulfil what I believe is its appointed role.

As examples, I would cite the Ville St-Michel incidents, in which a young lawyer instigated a complete reassessment, and corrected some rather questionable conditions. I cannot see why these problems and this scandal, were not exposed by the newspapers. I believe that on that occasion it was the duty of the newspapers to expose the situation, and not the duty of a young lawyer, risking his health and possibly even his life to shed some light on some very suspicious conditions.

Mr. Fortier: You are replying here, are you not, to opinions expressed by journalists who preceded you here, that a newspaper's function in a community is not only to report news, but also to make news, as it were?

Mr. Péladeau: That is absolutely right; but in order to do it, you have to have the means.

Mr. Fortier: You have to have the means—and it is in that area that you intend to work now to improve your paper?

Mr. Péladeau: Most certainly. Moreover, and here we are talking strictly about Quebec—we feel that the French-language press is not doing its job reporting economic affairs. What we have in Quebec newspapers are bad financial pages from the Toronto Star, the Toronto Telegram or the Globe and Mail. We have taken more or less the same attitude as the Toronto papers, and made poor copies of them. We intend eventually to have a financial section, clearly based on the Quebec economy which actually is not at all the same as that of Ontario or that of Eastern Canada. We feel we have something to say in this area, and we are going to say it.

Mr. Fortier: By emphasizing today, as you have for the last five years, local news and especially amateur sports news?

Mr. Péladeau: We started by emphasizing amateur sports. Last year, with a profit margin assured, we went a step farther, and set out to get what we consider the best sports reporting team in Montreal. We believe that we now have the best sports news of any paper in Canada. We have a complete and absolutely first-class sports section, including amateur sports. We started out with just amateur sport, and today we have complete sports coverage. We think we have the most complete sports section anywhere in Canada. We intend to take roughly the same course in other fields.

Our broader ambitions are in other fields. I was talking about the area of major reports...

[Text]

The Chairman: If I could just ask you a question about this sports coverage. Is the ratio now about fifty per cent amateur and fifty per cent professional?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Perhaps not fifty-fifty, but "over and above", yes.

[Text]

The Chairman: In other words, you still give the coverage to amateur sport that you began with—I mean, you have not abandoned that?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Oh, no. I would even say we were very wise—I don't want to take all the credit, but I think that is pretty fair. We had a lot to do with the upsurge in the junior leagues, for example. In 1964 and 1965, junior games were played before very small crowds. In the 1968-69 season, with the added importance we gave them—we were followed in this by the other papers, because it was we who started the trend—there are crowds of as much as fifteen thousand for junior games; they have the same importance as the big leagues.

[Text]

The Chairman: May I interrupt you with just one more question? This really refers to your weekly, which we will be talking about later, but I noted in your brief you said that a weekly devoted to sports would not be successful. Why is that? I would be surprised if that were so.

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: The reason is very simple.

Because the daily papers do a very good job with sports.

[Text]

The Chairman: I am thinking about the success of Hockey News, which I think you would agree is a successful publication. It has a big circulation in Quebec as well.

Mr. Péladeau: I know very well, because we print Hockey News in one of our plants.

The Chairman: What is the circulation of Hockey News—do you know?

Mr. Péladeau: I think it may be around 20,000...

The Chairman: Oh no, I think it would be much bigger.

Mr. Jacques Craig, Managing Director, Québecor Inc.: It is around 100,000.

Mr. Péladeau: I am surprised. It would seem to indicate that the English press is not covering sports as well as we are.

The Chairman: That is a good answer. You stand by that statement that a sports weekly would not be successful in Quebec?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: For a very simple reason: there have been three or four weekly sports paper ventures that have failed, one of which was particularly well produced.

[Text]

And we were printing it too, so there was a very good printing of it.

The Chairman: Just expanding on your comment on coverage in English Canada, it is my understanding that Hockey News exports more issues to the United States than any other Canadian publication—newspaper, magazine or anything else. Is that true?

[Translation]

Mr. Craig: That is true. I think it is sold in every stadium in North America where hockey is played.

Mr. Fortier: It is the same story as with Time magazine, only the other way around?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, that is quite correct. I saw that my friend spent six or seven millions on Le Sport and Le Spectacle and that is a low estimate, in that field.

Mr. Craig: Nor should we forget Parlons Sport, which was owned by Mr. Fancœur, who is here in this room. Much care was taken with it, and a good many formats were tried, without it, I think, ever showing a profit. For an unknown reason, sports papers have found it very difficult to survive in Québec—French-language ones, at any rate.

Mr. Péladeau: There is also another problem. French-language sports papers have had much more difficulty in obtaining advertising from the United States. That is one reason; it is related to what was said in our brief. It is obvious that the agencies, which are largely concentrated in Toronto, do not fully grasp the scope of the French-language papers. As I mentioned, there is no doubt that a newspaper like our own, The Journal de Montréal, or Journal de Québec, if they had been launched under the ownership of a large chain, either in Toronto or elsewhere, would have benefited from the services of a sales force, something we did not have. We have to build one up and we not only have to build up a sales force, but we also have to justify ourselves in the minds of English-language agencies that find it difficult to grasp the scope of our paper.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I should like to return to that point later. There is no doubt that when you are discussing sport, you have some very sympathetic ears to your left...

[Text]

Mr. Péladeau: Yes...

The Chairman: But the Maple Leafs and not the Canadiens, that should be made clear.

Mr. Péladeau: That is a good thing because the Canadiens help us a lot.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: What I am wondering, and this may be typical of your average reader—if such a person exists—is whether the Montrealer who buys Le Journal de Montréal or the Quebecker who buys Le Journal de Québec has the full range of international news, women's page, sports, etc.; Is the news necessarily restricted to those fields in which you have decided to offer him full coverage?

Mr. Péladeau: That is true, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is he satisfied with that?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, on the basis of the principle that, since we could not cover the rest completely, we tried to give full coverage to what was within our capabilities.

Mr. Fortier: It obviously satisfies some 50,000 to 60,000 people in Montreal?

Mr. Péladeau: On the other hand, of course, we should say that, as our readers very probably realize, we are putting into our papers, to the extent that we can afford it, the quality we know it lacks. We are well aware that our international news coverage is very weak. We shall have much better international news photography as and when we have more to spend in that area.

Mr. Fortier: From the point of view of readership, who is your main competitor? It's Montréal-Matin, is it not?

Mr. Péladeau: It is probably Montréal-Matin, yes. The remarkable thing is, though, according to the latest figures, which are for September 30, 1969, our circulation is up by 4,000—from 46,000 we went to 50,000. While the other papers, the Star, the Gazette and even Le Devoir lost circulation, our own increased and so has that of Montréal-Matin. It is rather interesting to note that the ones that could be expected to be our competitors also had an increase.

We are inclined to believe there is simply a shift away from the evening papers towards the morning ones. This is the case in the United States. We are experiencing a rather unusual phenomenon here in Canada, because even in Toronto, as well as in Montreal, it is the evening papers that receive the bulk of the advertising, while in the United States it is the morning papers that have both the circulation and the advertising.

Mr. Fortier: How do you explain this phenomenon, Mr. Péladeau, in the light of your experience?

Mr. Péladeau: It is probably because the morning papers have not done their job properly, and perhaps we are now covering the market more than it was covered. We are taking a place that did not exist; we certainly are not gaining it at the expense of Montréal-Matin, since that paper is also making constant progress. It is the evening papers—although the Gazette and Le Devoir are morning papers—it is the evening papers, that have lost ground.

Mr. Fortier: You are in competition with a political paper, Montréal-Matin, are you not?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: If your competitor were not a political paper, would you produce a different paper? Is the appearance of your product dictated by the policy or "politics" of Montréal-Matin?

Mr. Péladeau: Well, the question is a hypothetical one, but I think we might change our approach in that event.

Mr. Fortier: You are politically independent at present?

Mr. Péladeau: Absolutely.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think there is a future, firstly, in Quebec, and secondly, in Canada, for what are called political newspapers?

Mr. Péladeau: To a lesser and lesser extent.

Mr. Fortier: How do you explain that?

Mr. Péladeau: I feel that today, it is rather like the editorial aspect. We do not believe very much in an editorial page. We have a page—not really an editorial page—on which we allow three political parties to express their views, as we have stated in our brief. We have two provincial Government ministers, Mr. Cardinal and Mr. Tremblay, who provide us with weekly comment. We have Mr. Bourassa or, until quite recently, Mr. Laporte, plus two members of the Parti Québécois, which gives the public a full range from which to choose. We regard the editorial column as an almost entirely paternalistic phenomenon. I do not believe that people today read an editorial and then form an opinion. Perhaps the editorial was valid twenty years ago, but we have less and less faith in it today.

Mr. Fortier: You do not think that a newspaper in a given community should express its point of view on a topical problem?

Mr. Péladeau: In such a case, it is not the newspaper that is giving its point of view, it is one man, x, y, or z, one person's opinion.

Mr. Fortier: John Bassett of the Toronto Telegram told us that there was not a single opinion expressed on its editorial page that he did not endorse 100 per cent, and that he would not allow an editorial to be written with which he did not agree.

Mr. Péladeau: That is pure paternalism.

Mr. Fortier: But you do not think that is a newspaper's function?

Mr. Péladeau: I do not think you can dictate the thinking of 50,000 or 150,000 people.

Mr. Fortier: I might say, though it is not my intention to argue with you, that perhaps it is not the aim of the editorial to dictate people's thinking, but rather to act as a sounding-board and review broad problems?

Mr. Péladeau: Mr. Fortier, both you and I have read editorials on the White Paper. Now the interesting thing is that the editorials came two or three days after the publication of the White Paper, and any tax expert will tell you that he studied it for two or three weeks before being in a position to make a judgment. Yet a number of editorial writers gave their opinions two or three days after, so unless they are born with the knowledge, they must be extraordinary people with a highly developed feeling for economics.

Mr. Fortier: I think that is an excellent example, but I could suggest to you that in an election period, is it paternalism?

Mr. Peladeau: There, it becomes favouritism.

Mr. Fortier: No, to say on the eve of the election, or the day before that, for the following reasons, Le Journal de Montréal endorses Candidate X rather than Candidate Y?

Mr. Peladeau: That is a prime example of prejudice.

Mr. Fortier: You do not think that is the function of the written press?

Mr. Peladeau: I do not think so. I think it is an outdated function.

Mr. Fortier: Really?

Mr. Peladeau: It is a fact that we are today witnessing a protest movement, particularly among the young people, a movement that is universal in character but comes down to a refusal to be told: look, here it is in black and white, you are going to do this and that. It is a very good thing that people today are able, or think they are able, to make their own decisions. I think it is a very healthy phenomenon.

Mr. Fortier: So a newspaper should inform, period?

Mr. Peladeau: I think that is a newspaper's primary function.

Mr. Fortier: And after that?

Mr. Peladeau: After that, perhaps to act as a watchdog over situations that should be condemned and corrected.

Mr. Fortier: This is what you were speaking of just now—in-depth reporting?

Mr. Peladeau: Take the city of Montreal, for example, where we are not yet in a position to do it, because it requires highly specialized journalists and qualified people who have the time to do it, and can give it, not only the necessary time, but also the money. A man covering Montreal City Hall, at present cannot get very far, nor can those covering the provincial legislature or, I might even say, Parliament, where everything that can be given out is handled by press releases. There are many things that lie behind the press releases, but finding them requires thorough inquiries. The work requires, firstly, extremely competent people and, secondly, budgets to match.

Mr. Fortier: Primarily to inform and then to shed light in areas where you have the necessary manpower to do a satisfactory job?

Mr. Peladeau: I think the best example is the one I gave—Ville St-Michel. The same thing now applies to Ville d'Anjou, in Montreal, and it could apply to all the other areas.

Mr. Fortier: I am looking here—what is it called—I forget the exact word?

Mr. Craig: The masthead?

Mr. Fortier: The masthead, thank you. Do you have full-time journalists in places other than Montreal and Quebec City?

Mr. Peladeau: No.

Mr. Fortier: You do not. Do you intend to?

Mr. Peladeau: Yes. In particular, we intend to cover Ottawa, something we shall be doing shortly.

Mr. Fortier: I would very much like, as I am sure the members of the Committee would, to hear your comments on a phenomenon peculiar to Quebec; as you say in your brief, as in many other fields, Quebec is not like the other provinces. How is it that the weekly has always been successful in Quebec, while dailies are not as popular there as they are in other Canadian provinces? How do you explain this phenomenon?

Mr. Peladeau: First of all, there is the language factor. In Ontario, for instance, it is possible to obtain good-quality magazines—Life, or Time, or Look or Fortune. This gives a much wider choice than we have in Quebec. Because of the language factor, these magazines have a much smaller impact in Quebec than they do in the English-language provinces. This meant it was very easy to fill the vacuum, and that is why the newspaper, which costs much less to produce than the magazine, has been able to meet a need.

Mr. Fortier: What you call newsprint magazines?

Mr. Peladeau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you really think magazines are a lost cause in Quebec today?

Mr. Peladeau: Oh, yes, undeniably.

Mr. Fortier: Naturally, the representatives of Actualité, and even Mr. Robert Allard of Sept-Jours, whom we heard last week, struck a very different note. Do you think they are being optimistic?

Mr. Peladeau: I would say they were over-optimistic. With regard to Actualité, we refer to it in the brief as a magazine that is here to stay, though not mentioning it by name. Let us say that, from the outset, they enjoyed rather unusual assets; they built up a readership through a variety of techniques, though it is not certain they can meet its needs. The magazine Actualité, which appeared as a parochial publication, was in reality strictly a clerical magazine. They changed their approach recently and moved into something else. They may be capable of making the change, but in order to do so, they must rely heavily on advertising. As far as advertising is concerned, they must show an ability to keep their production costs competitive with those of magazines like Châtelaine or Le Magazine Maclean. These magazines are counterparts of English-language publications, and therefore enjoy support that is much more readily obtainable than is available to Actualité. They thus stand a chance of taking over the market sooner or later, particularly if we go by the last report of Grant Johnson Ltd., which clearly stated that magazine advertising was falling off.

I think they are being optimistic.

Mr. Fortier: They nevertheless have quite a large and impressive circulation, between 125,000 and 150,000?

Mr. Peladeau: Yes. Besides, magazines are now being supported in a different manner from our publications. They are sustained solely by advertising while we rely on our circulation. I think this is why we have confronted the agencies with a phenomenon they do not yet seem to understand; in other words, we have the circulation, we have a devoted readership, and we therefore have the medium that gives access to the markets they wish to reach.

Mr. Fortier: Last week, Mr. Robert Allard said the exact opposite with regard to Sept-Jours. He said his magazine was going to survive not by advertising alone, but also by its circulation. He was going to charge $10 for a year's subscription, and that was going to give him the necessary funds to publish his magazine.

Mr. Peladeau: Mr. Allard is a very good friend of mine, and I wish him all possible good luck.

Mr. Fortier: Still in the daily newspaper field, force of circumstances has led you to specialize in local and sports news. Have you also specialized in the field of weeklies?

Mr. Peladeau: Yes, in the same way.

Mr. Fortier: You stress the theatre and entertainment, do you not?

Mr. Peladeau: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Except for Le Nouveau Samedi?

Mr. Peladeau: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: Have your studies, or your lack of studies...

Mr. Peladeau: We do studies every day.

Mr. Fortier: Has your experience shown that these weeklies that emphasize show business in French Canada have their equivalent in English Canada?

Mr. Peladeau: No.

Mr. Fortier: The second question, once again, is: why?

Mr. Peladeau: I think it is because of the very large number of American publications available in Ontario and the rest of Canada.

[Text]

The Chairman: But the American publications do not give the same kind of coverage.

First of all, before I go into that, I should like to ask you a more general question: Why are there so many? Are they competitive with each other? How do they differ?

Mr. Peladeau: Some of them are.

[Translation]

We are trying to work out a definite identity for each of the papers. Now, to answer your first question: Why aren't there any on the Ontario market? Perhaps simply because that sort of thing hasn't been done. I don't see why it shouldn't be possible to do it. It is done in a very general way—take The Gazette, for example, which publishes a TV guide every weekend with a few pages of notes on the people taking part in the television programs. That is more or less the sort of thing we are doing, but we are doing it in a more complete way. I don't see why it shouldn't be possible to have similar publications on the English-Canadian market.

Mr. Fortier: Why don't you undertake to produce them?

Mr. Péladeau: I haven't said that we won't.

[Text]

The Chairman: Do these entertainment newspapers carry articles on American performers and on English-Canadian performers, or is it all on French performers?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: We have one publication which is devoted to young people and which is called Photo-Vedettes. It is aimed particularly at the young and contains articles concerning English-Canadians, Americans, English from England and French from France—the whole scene in fact, the youth revolution, the international social picture.

[Text]

The Chairman: May I come back to the question Mr. Fortier put to you. Perhaps it is not your problem, of course, but I wonder why this phenomenon has not happened in English Canada. I do not think it has. Surely the American magazines are not supplying that need in the rest of the country.

Mr. Péladeau: This means it is time to do it.

The Chairman: Why don't you do it?

Mr. Péladeau: Well, I just answered that.

The Chairman: Are these papers competitive with each other?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: In a way, perhaps, a little. We are trying as much as possible to give each one of our papers a distinct identity. That is the key to our success. If they all resembled one another, I am quite sure we would fall flat on our faces somewhere along the way.

[Text]

The Chairman: Would a reader take more than one?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: It is very possible, yes, for one simple reason: these magazines are sold at a very reasonable price, 20 cents.

[Text]

The Chairman: I do not want to anticipate questions that Mr. Fortier will ask. I have only one more on these weeklies at this point. I would be curious to know whether their advertising revenue is local or national.

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Very, very little national. This is one of our problems at the present time. We mention, however, that we are in a sense doing the work of pioneers, because, as these publications don't exist on the English-speaking market, we have to constantly explain what they are all about and try to make people realize that these papers are much more like magazines than ordinary papers. We also mention that we very often use the "four colour process", which is a process used in magazines.

[Text]

The Chairman: What is the circulation breakdown of these papers as between urban and rural?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Very nearly 50-50.

Mr. Fortier: On page 13 of your brief, on the subject of Le Nouveau Samedi, you say that it is intended to be a summary of "the principal events of the week". If it succeeds, it will become, it will be, in fact, another Sept-Jours, won't it?

Mr. Péladeau: Not quite. Sept-Jours is a digest along the lines of Time. But we choose three or four events and devote ourselves entirely to those three or four events—here is an example. At the time of the moon landing, we devoted 8 to 10 pages to the moon landing, on the occasion of General de Gaulle's visit, we devoted the whole paper—40 pages—to it. We even cut out the sports section on that occasion and put everything we had into the de Gaulle event and several others like it. For example, at the time of Daniel Johnson's death, we set aside about 7 to 8 pages and retraced Johnson's career. It depends on the case.

Mr. Fortier: The idea is really to summarize the main events of the week, whereas Sept-Jours and Time magazine...

Mr. Péladeau: Let's say that, with a case like the Vietnam war, if we summarized the Vietnam war, we would talk about it every week. The same goes for the troubles in the Middle East—except for something like what happened yesterday.

Mr. Fortier: Are there, in your opinion, any weekly digests in Quebec which give summaries, of nearly all the events of the preceding week. I am thinking of Dimanche-Matin, for example, or Dernière Heure. Are these papers in your opinion what have been called in certain circles Sunday dailies, or are they really weeklies which provide a point of view?

Mr. Péladeau: Remember that you will get a better answer from Mr. Francoeur. In my view, Dimanche-Matin is a Sunday daily which performs that function very well.

Mr. Craig: Like Dernière Heure.

Mr. Fortier: Like Dernière Heure. I come back to my question. You say, then, you think Sept-Jours is doomed—not to failure—but as for being optimistic...

Mr. Péladeau: I do not think Sept-Jours is doomed to failure.

Mr. Fortier: I mean that they are optimistic, and that you wish them all the success they deserve.

Mr. Péladeau: They deserve a great deal, it is a marvellous effort.

Mr. Fortier: He told us last week that he had lost only $45,000 last year.

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, but the magazine itself lost quite a bit more; he has stepped into the shoes of another.

Mr. Fortier: But do the people of Québec really feel the need for a weekly magazine which would provide a point of view, and which would be able to do a proper job of it with the necessary advertising?

Mr. Péladeau: I think so. I think that Mr. Allard can play a role which is actually not being carried out. I should be very happy if he could succeed in these ventures.

Mr. Fortier: You will agree with me that there is a gap?

Mr. Péladeau: I think so.

Mr. Fortier: However, I believe, one of the best examples of this gap—I don't remember the figures—is that the number of French-speaking Quebecers who read Time magazine, is absolutely staggering. It seems to me that a well-presented magazine appearing in French every week...

Mr. Péladeau: Even a magazine appearing in French every week cannot achieve the quality of Time, with all the shades of meaning which ought to be included, because, you know, they have facilities which a French-language magazine cannot have. Of course, we have a similar magazine, L'Express, which is in French and which tries to be, or doesn't try, but which is, in a certain sense, in the same vein as Time, and they have a great many difficulties.

Mr. Fortier: A great many. It contains, for all practical purposes, no news of Quebec, no Canadian news.

Mr. Péladeau: But they did make an attempt at one time, when they had several pages on Quebec and Canada, and they dropped them when the Act was passed by Mr. Diefenbaker.

Mr. Fortier: You make a great deal in your brief of the difficulties you have encountered with the national advertising agencies, don't you, Mr. Péladeau?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Can you enlarge a little on the matters you summarize on Page 21 and the following pages?

Mr. Craig: To give a sketch of the situation, we arrived on the scene shortly after the break-up of Le Nouveau Journal, and, as is mentioned in the brief, Le Nouveau Journal had from the beginning enjoyed the support of the experts and of everyone in the profession and in advertising etc. Right from the start people liked it and it was something new and, of course, it was in the advertising market of the Montreal dailies. Therefore it was a very welcome thing because the big advertisers were committed to the Nouveau Journal, and they were guaranteed a considerable circulation from the start.

Then, when we came on the scene, perhaps a year after the collapse of Le Nouveau Journal, everyone was very upset. I was advertising director of the paper, and, when we appeared at the agencies, the enthusiasm had cooled down and they were saying to themselves that this time they wouldn't be caught. We were a little upset by their attitude, but we were told: "We want to be sure that you are going to stay on the market; three years should probably prove that you are established."

Mr. Fortier: Prove yourselves?

Mr. Craig: "Prove yourselves, and we will encourage you." That is what we did. As was our tradition we made our living at the news-stands. It annoyed us all the same, but people took up our cause, and our business developed pretty well nonetheless.

[Text]

The Chairman: Did you know these people through the weeklies?

[Translation]

Mr. Craig: I must say that our weeklies have always done very well on the newsstands.

[Text]

The Chairman: I mean, did you know the advertising agency people because of the contacts you had made through the weeklies?

Mr. Craig: The weeklies at that time were not trying very hard to get advertising.

The Chairman: So this was really a first call.

Mr. Craig: Exactly.

Then, last week, five and a half or nearly six years later—just to tell you what happened to me—I went to Toronto with the national advertising director of the firm and I enjoyed myself very much. I met charming people (for advertising people are very easy-going). But right from the start I was surprised to learn that people were making excuses on behalf of the Federal Government for the fact that all the other dailies had profited by government advertising for unemployment insurance while Le Journal de Montréal had been excluded. The fact is that our representations to the advertising agencies had no results. I must tell you that there have been some since.

Mr. Fortier: Results?

Mr. Craig: Yes. The young man who was director of research into the media warned them, (because they are fairly sensitive people) that they would be discussed here, and he told us: "It's a 'fifty-fifty deal'. Perhaps you haven't told us of your existence, but we should have known, because we are set up for that." And, all during the week, I met with the leaders of the national advertising agencies, or their representatives and I enjoyed prodding them a little and saying to them, for example, I would open like this: "You have an excellent research department here." And they would be very pleased. "How is it that you did not know about us? We have a circulation of about 500,000 weekly and 72 or 75,000 daily. That is, after all, quite a chunk of a market where there is a very pressing need for the media?" They of course admitted that they ought to have been informed of the situation, but argued that, as they do not read French, these publications are less accessible to them. The market of the province of Quebec is a little foreign to them; it is very divided up, and they know less about the phenomenon of the weeklies and are very surprised to hear about them. But in the good city of Toronto, for example, if you want to cover everything, you have three big papers, and that's it. In Montreal, to cover even a small part of the market with a piece of advertising you must either use French and English television—and in English that's fine—but in French you must use the press. Everyone has his favourite: La Presse, plus a certain weekly, plus a certain other weekly, and it's complicated; there is a little duplication of readers, which it would take too long to explain but which is of some importance.

That then is more or less the reaction we had in Toronto. I think we are going to have our work cut out for us to make our position known.

[Translation]

The people of Montreal all seem to be familiar with us—at least they see our papers on the newsstands. The advertising firms of Montreal, despite the fact that we have not made any great efforts, have supported us all the same, to the point where, almost without solicitation on our part over the last five years, our account amounts to about 15 to 20 per cent of all the agencies' business.

[Text]

The Chairman: Do you belong to the Canadian Daily Newspaper Publishers Association?

Mr. Craig: No, we do not.

The Chairman: Why don't you, when it is so related to advertising?

[Translation]

Mr. Craig: You can perhaps ask Mr. Péladeau that.

Mr. Péladeau: We began to discuss that possibility a few months ago, and we will know very soon.

[Text]

The Chairman: I raised the question because it is related to advertising sales.

Mr. Fortier, are you going on with a new subject?

Mr. Fortier: No, not really.

The Chairman: I was going to suggest that we adjourn for a moment or two. Would you like to ask this question first?

Mr. Fortier: I will be four or five minutes on advertising.

Senator Smith: Why do we not deal with questions on advertising after the recess?

The Chairman: Yes. I suggest that we deal with them after the recess. We will reconvene at 11.25—Thank you.

(A short recess.)

(Upon resuming:)

The Chairman: When we adjourned I think you were going to ask several more questions on advertising.

Mr. Fortier: Just a few, if I may.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Craig, don't Toronto advertising agencies have French counterparts?

Mr. Craig: Just about all of them have.

Mr. Fortier: Then how do you explain the fact that they haven't gotten together with you—or you with them—for your mutual benefit?

Mr. Craig: It's odd because the market was there. There was a market for daily newspapers, but over the years everyone probably got used to the situation as far as weekly papers were concerned. I must say—this will amuse Mr. Francœur—that there was a great deal of talk about the "Sunday daily." I believe that it is a feather in the cap of our friends at Les Journaux Trans-Canada. And they didn't have an easy time of it. Theirs was the only Sunday weekly and they called it a "Sunday daily" and advertising receipts have been high over the years. There weren't enough daily newspapers around so the advertisers used the existing daily that gave the best coverage (45 per cent of the Montreal market—La Presse and a strong weekly. There has always been one; at one time it was "La Patrie", at another time "Le Petit Journal" and now we have "Dimanche-Matin". It would seem that the people, being far from the market and understanding little of what was going on, did not read French newspapers and were not informed of the situation. In fact it's odd that no one hailed the fact that a new daily was making its mark and that it wasn't used more until now.

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that this will change or is in the process of changing?

Mr. Craig: I'm sure of it. As Mr. Péladeau outlined this morning there is tradition among advertisers. Business and advertising agencies over the years are very traditional and if something worked well last year, why shouldn't it work well this year. But very little use is being made of morning newspapers. It's an anomaly that more advertising isn't being done in Quebec's morning newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: You mention this in your brief Mr. Craig, but what should be the reaction of advertising agencies when a new daily starts up? Are you suggesting that advertising agencies should have a blind faith in certain undertakings?

Mr. Craig: No, I don't believe I said that.

Mr. Fortier: In one of your recommendations you say that an advertising agency should encourage and should advertise in a new daily.

Mr. Craig: Indeed I think they could be a little less conservative.

Mr. Fortier: And from the practical point of view, how do you propose to counter-balance, the element of risk...

Mr. Craig: There is no real risk involved. If a newspaper is published today and ceases to publish next week, today's advertising message is in no way weakened.

Mr. Fortier: That's true.

Mr. Craig: In a community like Montreal or any other centre, as Mr. Péladeau pointed out earlier, a new publication, if it be a weekly, fine, or a daily, even better—is a source of wealth to that community. It means that there is a new vehicle for social exchanges and news. But what is even more important to the business world is that the daily newspaper is a great economic force. To my way of thinking the new daily newspaper or publication should be given more consideration and should be studied by those in the advertising trade because there is no great future for advertising in Canada since there aren't too many Canadian publications and most of them are in the form of magazines. A new publication is an event in Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Of course, but the advertising agencies and the firms they represent are probably going to say that their advertising budgets are worked out several months or even a year in advance. So when a new daily or publication comes along, the national companies have already arranged for their budgets to be divided among existing magazines or newspapers.

Mr. Craig: That's perfectly right and I repeat what has already been said in the brief: to my way of thinking they should still help us to some extent. We haven't really made our presence felt yet and I don't think we are blaming others for this. We're going to have to take a good look at our faults—and it must be said that it's up to us to do it and we have done it badly so far. But that will be changed because if we want to continue to improve our newspapers we're going to have to count heavily on advertising.

There is another matter that we have hardly touched upon. As a managing director of the papers, I am reminded every day of the fact that the ten cents per copy that we get from our readers barely covers printing costs. This means that if we wish to improve our publication—in addition to making a small profit—we have to rely on advertising. There is no question about it.

Mr. Fortier: By improving the advertising aspect you might also—I notice from the brief—attract more readers through carrier-boys, for example. This would mean more money.

Mr. Craig: Of course, this extra income would come from advertising.

Mr. Fortier: No matter how much I may agree with your argument if there is no home delivery of the morning paper, to my way of thinking, if it isn't read while you're having your coffee and corn flakes it isn't a morning paper.

Mr. Péladeau: You can offset that by reading it while you're riding the metro.

However, I'd like to say something else before we leave this subject. There are other things that bother us. That's the reason we mentioned that the Provincial Government distributes its announcements and advertising "at large" without the need of undue and constant solicitation on our part. I don't see why the Federal Government shouldn't do things in the same way. For example, we mention that after being in existence for five years we have not had a single ad from Air Canada or CN. I can go even farther than that—take the CRTC for instance. It publishes reports regularly—why shouldn't these reports be published in all daily newspapers instead of in just one or two? And this is only one example among many.

How about the Benson Report? The Federal Government printed a very substantial brochure on it, and of course it was expensive. So the Report didn't get into the hands of everyone who was interested in it. If only a condensed version of the Benson Report had been published in the daily newspapers. After all, this could have been worked out, it was possible and at the time it was very important. This is a fundamentally important report which could change our whole way of life or the trend of the economy. Yet it is published in brochure form only. Of course, we have to admit that the President of the Bank of Montreal ("My Bank" to just about everybody) has made numerous comments. But these are only opinions of a report which has by no means been made available to everyone. Why shouldn't it have been made available to everybody through the publication of such messages.

It's the same with the C.B.C. The Federal Government spends a considerable amount of money subsidizing the film industry. But why aren't daily newspapers subsidized? They have major problems too.

Mr. Fortier: You've just hit upon something else and I don't want to pass up the chance of going into this further. What do you think of the argument that freedom of the press would be endangered if...

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, I answered this question in our brief. The Provincial Government sends us a lot of government advertising and no one has tried to influence us in any way. It's as simple as that. This is the way it is across the board. Everything is done very openly. I don't believe there has been any request whatsoever for something in return. I think that this is just a nice argument of semantics. How easy it is to say that subsidizing the press would pose a threat to its freedom.

Mr. Fortier: The problem does not exist?

Mr. Péladeau: I don't think so. Undoubtedly there could be a problem, anything is possible—so what does that prove?

Mr. Fortier: What does freedom of the press mean to you and your group, Mr. Péladeau?

Mr. Péladeau: If you will, Mr. Elie?

Mr. Elie: If you will permit me to say so, Mr. Fortier, this concept is a bit theoretical, but when questions are asked it becomes academic. Freedom of the press, if I may make a comparison, is recognized in some quarters as a right. The moment we use the word "right", we are, as you know, reminded of certain other rights.

There is an article—please remind me if my memory does not serve me correctly—in Civil Code, article 407 or 402, which says that the right to property is the most absolute of rights. Yet experience has taught us that the right to property is far from being an absolute right. It has become one of the most relative of rights in our day to day life. Take for example all the quirks of expropriation and the conditions imposed on day to day life by social development. By way of comparison, freedom of the press can be considered an absolute right. But if we consider it in the light of day to day happenings, what has freedom of the press become? If you want us to take all the risks, we must, since ours is a business undertaking, make a profit in order to survive. The result is that theoretically we print our news with an eye to "profit" and "markets". And the moment you become selective about the news you print—we have elaborated on this at the beginning of our brief—the right of the press to exercise its freedom becomes very relative.

However, I would like to get back to public enterprises, for example. I would like to know the point of view of the Government or certain administrative committees on this so called freedom of the press. If news is screened for national security or other reasons, this freedom of the press becomes a hypothetical right indeed.

If the daily newspaper cannot survive on its profits because of tax laws or because of the various economic phenomena we have to live with, the right of freedom of the press—which was absolute—becomes one of the most relative of rights. We could go even further and say that this is a sort of brain-storming that we might perhaps investigate further. As for myself, I've spent hours thinking about this very question. Values are being questioned more and more. As a matter of fact, the young people of the world are protesting against this bureaucracy bequeathed to them by preceding generations. So do we start from the presumption that absolute freedom of the press would amount to license when the thinking of our time shows it to be perhaps one of the most familiar or relative of rights? Perhaps even in politics—without being partisan to any political party—it is a right worth thinking about, a right that is more and more being thought of in the absolute sense.

[Text]

Mr. Fortier: I was just going to change the subject.

Senator Prowse: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Is yours a change of subject?

Senator Prowse: No.

The Chairman: Senator Petten has indicated that he wants to ask a question, but it is on a different subject. Why do you not ask your supplementary and then I will go to Senator Petten.

Senator Prowse: If understand what has been said it amounts to this: there is no danger of the freedom and independence of the press being challenged by Government spending a good deal more money than they have in using the papers, on a broad basis, as a means of reaching the public on matters which they think ought to be brought to the attention of the public. Is that what you were saying?

Mr. Péladeau: That is it exactly.

[Translation]

That's right, as long as it's done this way, what I would call "at large". If it were done on a selective basis there could be an element of risk.

Mr. Fortier: To help everybody?

Mr. Péladeau: That's right. That is what we are saying in the brief. Couldn't the Federal Government change its present methods of distributing its paid announcements? Isn't it feasible that some of the announcements made by the CBC (because it receives a lot of money) could be passed on to the public through other channels. For example, we notice that there are a great number of CN and Air Canada commercials on the CBC. I'm sure that our publications could handle these messages. Perhaps it's just a matter of diversifying the media used.

Mr. Fortier: This would put everything on a more competitive basis?

Mr. Péladeau: That's right, and that's the reason we mentioned the way the Quebec Government does things. Recently it launched a new lottery and all newspapers benefited from the announcement of the lottery. There was no question, we didn't have to raise a hue and cry to prove that we existed, to prove that we had something to say and were capable of saying it and to prove that we were an integral part of the whole.

[Text]

The Chairman: Does that satisfy you, Senator?

Senator Prowse: No, I have one more question. I take it what you are suggesting is the advertising or carrying of messages with regard to services provided by government departments in a very broad way, and not necessarily explanations of government policy by the Government, might be carried in the same broad way. Or would you be prepared to carry both? This is what I had in mind.

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: I think so. I did mention the way the White Paper was handled. To be more exact, I believe the White Paper could have been presented in another way since it is not legislation and the Government showed a sense of democracy in presenting it this way—and we have to have a great deal of respect for this fact. So why not carry this sense of democracy further and let everybody know what's going on, instead of just a few individuals.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: And not leave the public at the mercy of the particular feelings of the independent owner of an independent paper?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: That's it exactly.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: Thank you.

Senator Pettit: Mr. Péladeau, you say in your brief that Canadian Press wanted the sum of $100,000 plus a transmission charge to give you a franchise. You feel this was an excessive price. Do you think it is the policy of Canadian Press to discourage new competitors for its own members?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: No, I wouldn't say that this discourages them but it certainly doesn't encourage them. There is no question about it. I quoted the figure $100,000, actually they asked us for $136,000. At the time this was obviously prohibitive—and these were only entry fees. They asked Le Nouveau Journal for $76,000. They were only a few years ahead of us, yet they asked us for $136,000, an undeniably discouraging figure. They didn't refuse us but this was a very eloquent way of saying: "We don't take you seriously, so prove how serious you are by putting $136,000 in our coffers. When you have done this we will be at your service." In my opinion this can in no way be interpreted as encouragement. You mention the fact that this could be a deterrent. Let's just say that it comes close to hitting the nail on the head.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know how they arrived at the figure of $136,000?

Mr. Péladeau: I didn't ask that kind of question. As far as I'm concerned, the $136,000 represented a colossal deterrent.

[Text]

The Chairman: Were the transmission costs on top of that again?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, there was no question about that. And what is more transmission costs were far from ideal. Of course they were also better and more complete—because United Press International is particularly suited to America.

Mr. Fortier: So you were forced to go to an American agency.

Mr. Péladeau: We had no other choice.

[Text]

The Chairman: Why did CP ask $60,000 more from you than they had from Le Nouveau Journal? How many years was it?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Le Journal de Montréal was in 1964, and the other I think in 1961 or 1962.

[Text]

The Chairman: $60,000 more?

Mr. Péladeau: $65,000 more. The ones that can answer that question much better than we can, are Canadian Press.

Senator Prowse: You could come to Alberta and drill an oil well for that! Maybe you will get a dry hole.

The Chairman: When they asked $136,000, what was your reaction?

Mr. Péladeau: Very simple.

The Chairman: You did not enter into negotiations?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes. We tried to discuss that to see what could be done. They came forward to tell us that maybe they would discuss it if we were to send them a $13,000 certified cheque (10 per cent) and afterwards maybe they would consider what could be done. This was in October, 1964 and, as far as I remember, they were suggesting that the next meeting would be in April. So we had a few months to wait, but they also told us that they might have a meeting to discuss it, and at one time it had been permitted that the entrance fee...

[Translation]

if you wish, I will continue in French, it will be easier that way. If the entry fees could have been paid in installments—this had been done before, but only for a newspaper that was already in existence, a newspaper that had proved itself, so, as our newspaper had not yet proved itself, it was pretty clear that we wouldn't be allowed to pay by installments. However, if we had sent them a cheque for $13,000 they might have considered the possibility of accepting us.

[Text]

The Chairman: It might be very valuable and interesting to us to know with whom you were negotiating at Canadian Press.

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Mr. Stewart of Montreal, and Mr. Purcell in Toronto. Mr. Stewart, I feel, has been very useful and who has made admirable efforts to get us in; as far as Toronto goes, there were a few problems. On the other hand, a very amusing thing happened last year—they approached us again.

Mr. Fortier: They approached you again concerning this subject?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, last year, and we could have joined then—it was quite amusing.

[Text]

The Chairman: I was going to ask you that. They approached you?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

[Translation]

Yes. Originally they had asked us to pay a fee of $136,000, at a time when we really did not have the means to make such an investment. Now that we are in a position to establish our profitability, they are prepared to accept us at no cost.

Mr. Fortier: At no cost?

Mr. Péladeau: At no cost.

Mr. Fortier: Are you going to accept?

Mr. Péladeau: For the moment, let us say each one in his turn; they are resting a little on our...

[Text]

The Chairman: Are you going to join now?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Quite probably.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know what other French papers think of this, what attitude Canadian Press takes of other French papers of Quebec in so far as these admission fees are concerned?

Mr. Péladeau: I am familiar with the Nouveau Journal case.

Mr. Fortier: What happened in the Nouveau Journal case?

Mr. Péladeau: They joined, I believe, and they paid the $76,000 in question, as far as I know.

Mr. Fortier: Canadian Press, therefore, is said to have a monopoly in Canada, as far as press agencies go?

Mr. Péladeau: I wouldn't say they have the monopoly, since United Press International performs certain services for us too.

Mr. Fortier: A growing monopoly...

Mr. Péladeau: Let us say more complete.

Mr. Fortier: That's what I meant—more complete. Is it possible for a paper such as yours to survive without the services of Canadian Press?

Mr. Péladeau: Most certainly—Montréal-Matin does not have the services of Canadian Press either.

Mr. Fortier: Montréal-Matin belongs to U.P.I., I believe.

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know the answer, and if you would prefer not to answer, please say so, but do you know why they joined U.P.I. instead of Canadian Press?

Mr. Péladeau: I couldn't answer that. I might point out that U.P.I. has an excellent sports service, but as for the rest, I couldn't answer for Montréal-Matin, though this was most likely one of the reasons why they used U.P.I.

[Text]

The Chairman: UPI has a separate sports service as well, does it not?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

Senator Prowse: I have a question for Mr. Craig on advertising. Is there a difference between the kind of advertising that national advertisers will place in a morning paper as compared to an afternoon or evening paper?

[Translation]

Mr. Craig: I am going to tell you what we seem to be doing. We seem to be using the Montreal afternoon papers for everything that concerns the home, for example, grocery store advertisements, furniture—in short, everything that is of general interest. It seems we have the habit of reserving the morning papers for things which are of interest to the men, for example, the financial market, and so forth. This seems to be the accepted practice, roughly speaking, though there is no real reason for it since morning papers get into the homes too.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: In other words, the advertisers seem to feel that through advertising in the morning papers they reach the men, and through the evening papers they reach the household completely?

[Translation]

Mr. Craig: It seems to be the custom, but the facts are that with our own newspaper facts have proved the contrary. For example, right now we are doing a volume which is classified as approximately 30 per cent furniture and house furnishings, and approximately 10 per cent grocery items, and our customers seem happy enough. It's a custom.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: I see. That applies to advertising generally and not just to national advertising then?

Mr. Craig: Oui.

Senator Kinnear: I think that my question is supplementary to almost any of the questions that have been asked, Mr. Chairman.

How do you arrive at your city retail trading zone? For instance, you give the Ottawa area a population of 903,000. What territory does that cover?

Mr. Péladeau: These are figures published by Canadian Advertising Rates and Data.

Senator Kinnear: Have you any idea of what territory it would cover?

Mr. Péladeau: I would not be able to tell you.

Senator Kinnear: I ask you that question because the City of Ottawa itself has a population of about 300,000.

Mr. Péladeau: Those are the figures we got from Canadian Advertising Rates and Data.

Senator Kinnear: It takes in a wide area.

The Chairman: Perhaps it goes as far as Peterborough.

Mr. Craig: Canadian Advertising Rates and Data establishes city zones which are greater than the cities themselves. They are the retail trading zones, and they usually take in a radius of about 50 miles around the city. These things will most likely change. We have had correspondence with our confrères at La Presse because the intervals between the city itself and the retail trading zone is getting smaller and smaller due to better communications, and so on. So, the trading zone of Joliette extends almost to Montreal. It takes the Joliette people 45 minutes to get to Montreal. So, these things will likely change.

The Chairman: Mr. Péladeau, I should like to read you this passage from your brief, p. 29. This is a translation, but it reads:

"Contrary to Mr. John Basset, who recently stated that it is virtually impossible to establish a newspaper in a city where there is one already, we state, and our experience is testimony of it, that it is always possible to do so, and, what is more, to make it profitable."

Do you think some one could start a daily newspaper in Toronto using your formula?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: I think so. At the outset, there were three major newspapers in Toronto and if there had also been a tabloid, I don't see why, as a digest, it would not have been successful.

[Text]

The Chairman: Would you start with the accent for example, as I think you said, on amateur sports?

Mr. Péladeau: I think so.

[Translation]

I do not share Mr. Bassett's opinion though I couldn't say why.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Péladeau, in a relatively rich area such as London, Ontario, where there is only one paper, is it not odd that there is only one newspaper?

Mr. Péladeau: Under the circumstances, I think that it was established by some qualified group that to introduce a newspaper in Calgary...

Mr. Fortier: In Edmonton, I believe...

Senator Beaubien: Yes...

Mr. Péladeau: In Edmonton, would cost somewhere in the neighbourhood of 6 or 7 million dollars. I might add that if we are talking about a paper which is eventually to be made as big as the others, and we have as an example, the Nouveau Journal experience, where between 5 and 6 million was spent in 6, 7, or 8 months, obviously, it can be done—they can do it. Spending money is the easiest thing in the world to do.

Senator Beaubien: Yes...

Mr. Péladeau: But if it is done within the framework of exactly what is given, and if it is done inch by inch, I think that it is possible, here as well as elsewhere.

In our case, we produce within a radius of 50 miles of Montreal—we are really a Montreal paper, and therefore our accent is on Montreal. If our accent changes, then we will touch upon other subjects or even go further. But we will move at a pace within our means. We are not going to try and engulf all services in one fell swoop—that would be impossible. If you wanted to establish a printing shop overnight—and it has been done, in Suffolk County near New York, for instance, where they shut down having a circulation of 80,000 and with everything progressing normally. But they opened a news vendor service, which took a considerable amount of money to do, and they built up a complete editing team—whereupon it became impossible.

I would like to give an example—it is completely unrelated—but say I was trying to open a store of the same size and importance as Eaton's in Montreal, right across the street from it. Well, I think anyone who would attempt this, would have to be a pretty strong fellow for quite a while, unless he started with a little store and progressed slowly, in which case, he would have a much better chance of succeeding. It's as simple as that. We and others have been doing this since the beginning. At present, we are the largest and most complete offset printers in America. However, we initially began with a small shop, and from the small shop, we built up a large business.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Chairman. Do I understand that you had your printing establishment and your delivery service set up before you tried to establish your dailies?

Mr. Péladeau: No, we had only the printing.

[Translation]

No, we had nothing but our printing-house at the time when we began publishing the Journal de Montréal, we had offset printing facilities. We also had, apart from our weekly newspapers, a specialized firm, which was already in good standing, to distribute our weeklies, and we initially had them distribute our dailies, since we did not want to take on the job ourselves at that time. In 1965, after having operated through this agency for a year we established our own distributing house, and for a very simple reason: we were selling 75,000 copies a day because of the La Presse strike. This has to do with the reason I mentioned in my brief—it wasn't a great asset to be publishing a paper during the La Presse strike, since, as soon as the La Presse went back to work, our sales dropped to 12,000, as I said—we had to start all over again. And it was infinitely more difficult to begin again, having seen our production up to 75,000 copies. It was a little like someone who is used to eating a very hearty meal suddenly having to make do with potatoes.

From that moment on, quite obviously our distributor ceased to make a profit from distributing our paper, and we were forced to establish our own firm. Nevertheless, we had had the chance to polish up our editorial staff and our printing shop into assuming the responsibility of publishing a daily. Then the next move was to build our own distributing house and this was done in stages. This is why we believe there is no other way—that one must progress by stages. To want to do everything at once is to make the same mistake as, for instance, the Nouveau Journal, or the Vancouver Times.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: In other words, you had your offset printing press established first as a going operation?

Mr. Péladeau: Exactly.

Senator Prowse: Then the other things that came to you through your weekly operation gave you experience, and from there you were able to analyze the situation, and then you saw the gap and you could move into it from that base?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Suppose a person did not have an offset printing press, and suppose he did not have the other organizations that were necessary for the printing of your weeklies—I am thinking of the City of Edmonton, for example, where it would be necessary just to move in cold. The first thing you would need, of course, would be a very specialized and rather expensive press. Would this not be a much more difficult situation than that which you faced?

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: Undeniably. I would say that this would be an extremely risky undertaking. Moreover, you have the same situation repeating itself, so to speak, in many regional publications of Quebec, where a printer, after successfully getting his shop to operate at a profit, builds up a local weekly paper around it. But, if he had tried to survive on the regional weekly alone, he would most likely have run into trouble. Only because his printing shop enabled him to operate, was he in a position to publish a weekly newspaper.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: To what extent do you depend on advertising and to what extent on circulation income to cover your operating costs.

[Translation]

Mr. Péladeau: At this time, we are, I think, one of the rare publications of this nature—60 per cent of our income comes from circulation and 40 per cent from advertising. Our aim is to reverse this situation, so that 60 per cent of our income comes from advertising and 40 per cent from circulation. Then, we will be in a position to carry out all the improvements which we are planning to bring to the editorial content of our paper.

Moreover, this is something which we included in our brief. We feel that the sooner the various publications start working together, the better—especially at the technical level, on all technical matters. For example, in Montreal, there are three or four newspaper distribution boxes on every corner. There is one for The "Gazette", one for the "Montreal-Matin", one for "Le Devoir", and one for "Le Journal de Montréal". We think that if there was only one box with four dispensers, everyone would save money. This is all money which is being spent for nothing, so everyone would save. Whoever wants The "Gazette", buys "La Gazette", and whoever wants "Le Devoir", buys "Le Devoir". Then we would have a single box, fewer complications, and a better service. We would have considerably on costs.

The same thing applies to the newsvendors. We believe that if newsvendors were better organized and distributed two or three publications, we would have better newsvendors, and the newsvendor himself would make a better income. We would thus maintain our newsvendors in a more constant manner. This is along the lines of what we are aiming for.

At present, we are printing "Le Devoir" in one of our shops. Obviously, "Le Devoir" has saved a considerable amount of money by having us do the printing. It is obviously a smart move on their part. We also distribute "Le Devoir" from our distributing firm in Montreal. There again, "Le Devoir" has taken a step in the right direction—that is to say, instead of having two trucks deliver one paper at three or four in the morning, one truck does the job. What is the sense of wasting money on trucks and gas? Or any expenses of this kind for that matter? The money could be put to better use elsewhere, in improving the quality of the product.

We plan, as much as possible, to promote co-operation among existing publications; obviously, the same move is being made by certain groups who are buying up publications, but their purpose for doing so, obviously is to have a more centralized service, better organization, and to benefit each of the publications from the strength of the parent company. The same thing could be done in another way. I think that a concentration of the press could be offset by imagination, first of all, and also by a more concerted effort to co-operate among publications on the market. For instance, from the point of view of advertising, if "Je Journal de Montréal", "Le Devoir" and "Montréal-Matin" formed a team and had one central advertising office in Toronto, they would have better sellers, better advertisers and they could offer a better service. Then the three of them would be able to profit; instead of each having his own totally inadequate service, they would all share one complete service—the same principle applied by Maclean-Hunter, for example, or Southam Press, or some other truly stable enterprise. They are doing it for their own firm and the same thing applies or could apply to newspapers, which are, in themselves, independent.

"Le Devoir" has a free hand as far as editorial content goes, but it has rid itself of the technical problems of printing and distribution. Thus, they are able to apply all their energies and attention to production and the quality of their publication.

Mr. Fortier: That's very interesting, what you are advocating. But just how far, Mr. Péladeau, would you go? You spoke of common boxes, common distribution, perhaps even common marketing. Just how far would you go before creating a single enterprise?

Mr. Péladeau: The ultimate goal of any newspaper is to produce a good paper, to have a good product. And the product of a newspaper is its editorial content. Thus, for myself, I think we could go as far as the necessity of keeping each paper's individual editorial identity would permit. As for the other services, they could very easily be lumped together.

Mr. Fortier: Are you familiar with the Pacific Press situation in Vancouver?

Mr. Péladeau: Well, these days, yes!

Mr. Fortier: Do you know how Pacific Press works?

Mr. Péladeau: More or less.

Mr. Fortier: Is that about what you want?

Mr. Péladeau: We are heading towards it. We are heading towards large press enterprises like those presently in existence in Quebec, and which also exist elsewhere in Canada in the form of huge chains. Thus, if it is a matter of maintaining those newspapers which do not belong to such chains, I feel they should make use of the same methods employed by the latter.

Mr. Fortier: An exchange, I would say, but on the other hand, Mr. Péladeau, would you not just be building another chain?

Mr. Péladeau: That's not such a bad thing.

Mr. Fortier: But, it is a fact?

Mr. Péladeau: It's a fact simply because, when you have people on the various papers working away at their desks without any kind of common direction, well, perhaps it would be just as well to have them all under the same roof.

Mr. Fortier: Without direction from a single owner?

Mr. Péladeau: No, no. On the contrary, I am saying that each paper would retain its own identity. "Le Devoir" is almost a perfect example. They leave the printing to us. Thus, they rid themselves of a bothersome problem.

Mr. Fortier: Distribution?

Mr. Péladeau: And distribution. Obviously, it is a very profitable move for them. Anyway, these secondary services, they are not the real services. The service of a newspaper is to provide information. Thus, the news service is still the essential element of a newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Why don't you share a shop with Le Devoir, since that association is already in existence?

Mr. Péladeau: We plan to—we are thinking about it.

Mr. Fortier: Would the purpose of this union with various parties be to meet the competition in Quebec, more precisely, the Power Corporation group, or would it be to insure the survival of various papers such as your own?

Mr. Péladeau: I would say it would be for both reasons.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent are either of your publications competitive with those of Les Journaux Trans-Canada or La Presse?

Mr. Péladeau: We are not trying to be competitive with anybody. We need all our energy to do our own work, without wasting it on competition.

Mr. Fortier: Until a short time ago, La Presse was also owner of a radio station, CKAC, was it not? And several other Quebec newspapers have also owned or jointly owned radio stations. A few years ago, if I am not mistaken, you applied to buy CHRS in St-Jean, Quebec, did you not?

Mr. Péladeau: That is correct—two stations.

Mr. Fortier: Two stations?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, CKJL in St-Jérôme...

Mr. Fortier: Oh, yes—in St-Jérôme, and I believe your request was turned down by the Board of Broadcast Governors, at that time. Is that right?

Mr. Péladeau: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: Can you explain, Mr. Péladeau, the philosophy behind your offer to buy those two radio stations, and also your present philosophy?

Mr. Péladeau: On this particular point, our position hasn't changed very much. I believe that newspaper and radio services are related. If I am not mistaken, it was the Montreal Star which said that those who are in the best position to operate a radio station are those who are already in the news market. That is precisely our approach. At that time, we were already in the entertainment market, and we felt that radio was very closely linked with it, that it was an integral part of the entertainment field; so, we become interested in radio. However, we were very disappointed with the B.B.G.'s decision. We were given the explanation that we couldn't own a radio station because we held a certain monopoly in the entertainment press. That was ridiculous as we didn't have a monopoly at all because several other publications were contributing considerably to the field of entertainment, especially at that time. Therefore we found the decision extremely inaccurate and unfair.

At present, it would seem that they are continuing to enforce this rule, at least it would seem that they are doing so. Obviously we want them to continue to enforce it since we don't see why anyone else should benefit from something that was denied us.

Mr. Fortier: If the CRTC opened the way and allowed simultaneous ownership of written and electronic media, would you be interested in entering the field?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, because we believe, as we pointed out before, that the two are very much related. Moreover we have had the experience as we mention in our brief. Initially when we were recruiting our staff of journalists, we drew enormously from reporters who were working in radio stations, and at that time, we were in close contact with these people. We took note of their ability and value, which undoubtedly was a normal reaction.

Mr. Fortier: Would you go so far as to say that you would be interested in television?

Mr. Péladeau: Maybe.

Mr. Fortier: Perhaps, I should rephrase the question. Do you think the owner of a newspaper should also have access, should he so desire it, to a television station?

Mr. Péladeau: That could be dangerous. There, it could become something else. There, I would say quite definitely that it could turn into a monopoly, as, for example, the city of Sherbrooke experienced when their newspaper, and both radio stations and the television station all belonged to one and the same firm.

Mr. Fortier: This is bad business, in your opinion?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, I think that is going too far. I think there should be more of a balance than that.

Mr. Fortier: Where do you draw the line?

Mr. Péladeau: Quite obviously a television station should not belong to a newspaper which is in a position of power, or, in other words, is the only newspaper in the area.

Mr. Fortier: Should a newspaper owner have access to...

Mr. Péladeau: Obviously, I would like to have it. But, in a city such as Montreal—not in a little town where it is something altogether different—even if a newspaper did own a radio station, there would still be plenty of others to present a different point of view. There would also, of course, be television to present a different viewpoint. But in a closed town like Sherbrooke or Trois-Rivières, let's say, it would be dangerous.

Mr. Fortier: At the present time, do you find it a good or bad thing that newspaper owners can also have interests in other businesses, say for instance, in the automobile industry, as we were speaking of car salesmen earlier, or in a pulp and paper company, etc.?

Mr. Péladeau: That, I believe, is being done quite a bit in France. It is somewhat more rare in the United States. Newspaper owners in the States are people who are in the communications field. I would be inclined to believe that it would be best to remain within the field of communications, since otherwise, you run the risk of conflicting interests, which men being what they are, could lead to the distortion of news. Though I have no definite proof of this, I would still say that there is an element of danger.

Mr. Fortier: Of danger?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes. I was particularly struck by an article in yesterday's La Presse on the front page which described a bus accident that had occurred in Quebec, in which the Provincial Transport Company was implicated. Now, everyone knows that the Provincial Transport Company is Paul Desmarais, and that Paul Desmarais and La Presse are one and the same thing. But they were very fair all the same, and they duly published the facts, mentioning quite clearly that it was a Provincial Transport bus. I found that they had risen above their personal interests.

Mr. Fortier: That occurred to me too, when I read it.

Mr. Péladeau: I was pleasantly surprised.

Mr. Elie: If I may...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Elie: If I may be permitted, Mr. Fortier, your question raises another possibility, perhaps in the business world, in the sense that many companies, particularly in the United States, feel that the profitability factor is a prime concern in the field of information and commercial enterprise. Consequently, this is the kind of industry that is becoming more and more evident in the United States, not to mention all the commercial giants such as automobile manufacturers and so on, and diversification is playing an important role in their activities. Thus, we have created a conflict—not necessarily theoretical or vital to survival. Perhaps it would be a good idea at this time to analyse the diversifications of commercial enterprise.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Péladeau, are you recommending that the diversification in communication enterprises be curtailed?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes, I think it's the best way to produce a better newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: The following appears on page 43 of your brief:

"...would it not be wished that the shares capital of a company which publishes a daily could become the property of the public in general. Freedom of the press in a democratic country would only be better for it."

Could you first explain what you mean by the idea of the company belonging to the public, and then, what you mean by the freedom of the press being the better off for it?

Mr. Péladeau: I think that a press enterprise should aim at having its shares put on the open market for the very simple reason that newspaper investments amount to a considerable sum.

A little while ago, we mentioned the possibility of establishing a newspaper and opening a printing shop in Edmonton, and the cost involved; the investment would be a considerable one. Thus, there comes a time when one must resort to funds other than those immediately at one's disposal. Short-term funds are often difficult to obtain even for a firm with a large income. The most logical solution would be to offer the firm itself directly to the general public, and ask them to participate in it, which would result in a diversification of ownership, and consequently, a democratization of the firm as such.

Mr. Fortier: And, do you feel that this should be done, not only in Quebec, but elsewhere in Canada too?

Mr. Péladeau: I do. Whenever a firm is in the position to do so, I think it should act in this manner.

Mr. Fortier: When Claude Ryan appeared before the Committee, he suggested that daily newspapers belong to the citizens of the community in which they are read.

Mr. Péladeau: Like the CBC?

Mr. Fortier: That's right.

Mr. Péladeau: No, I don't think it's the same thing at all. I think that it is precisely the form of enterprise which is on the open market.

Mr. Fortier: Like Maclean-Hunter?

Mr. Péladeau: Like Maclean-Hunter. To my way of thinking, it is the most logical and most genuine solution.

Mr. Fortier: I see that you have recently purchased a new printing house, Dumont Publications Inc?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Did Québecor feel it was necessary to acquire another one? What was the reason behind the purchase?

Mr. Péladeau: I would have to say that the acquisition was made for the purpose of creating a package of sufficient solidity to be put on the open market and to be more attractive value.

Mr. Fortier: Who are the shareholders of Québecor Inc., Mr. Péladeau?

Mr. Péladeau: The shareholders are Péladeau's; the shares are, in fact, owned by my children.

Mr. Fortier: Then, it really belongs to you?

Mr. Péladeau: Yes.

[Text]

Me, myself, and I.

Mr. Fortier: I have no more questions on this point, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you. Honourable Senators, it appears that there are no more questions so on behalf of the Committee I express our appreciation to Mr. Péladeau, Mr. Craig, and Mr. Elie.

From the point of view of the Committee, this has been a most worthwhile session, particularly in respect to our learning of your success which I think can be said to have come from a standing start. I must say that some of the views you have expressed this morning are very much the opposite of the views we have become accustomed to hearing from publishers. It is a refreshing viewpoint that you have brought to us. The Committee is always interested to hear of the renewed vitality of the mass media in the Province of Quebec.

Your brief is a very valuable one, and we are grateful for it. It is made the more valuable by your presence with us this morning. We appreciate your coming, and I will simply say "Thank you" to the three of you.

I remind the members of the Committee that we shall reconvene at 2 o'clock when we will receive a brief from Mr. Desmarais, La Presse, and Les Journaux Trans-Canada Ltée.

The committee adjourned.

The Committee resumed at 2 p.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this afternoon we will receive three separate briefs: the final brief will be from Les Journaux Trans-Canada; the second brief will be from La Presse; the initial brief, the one we will receive now, is from Gelco Enterprises Limited.

Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Paul G. Desmarais, the President of Gelco Enterprises Limited. On my left is Mr. Jean Parisien, who is Vice-President of Gelco Enterprises Limited. Sitting on Mr. Desmarais' immediate right is Mr. Jules Deschênes, who is a lawyer and is appearing with Gelco Enterprises Limited.

Gentlemen, the procedure we follow here is to ask our witnesses to make a brief opening statement. Usually at this point I say that the briefs were received some three weeks in advance, as we requested. This was not the case with the Gelco brief. I think some honourable Senators saw it for the first time last evening, and indeed perhaps some of them saw it for the first time this morning.

That being so, as it is my understanding that Mr. Deschênes will make the opening statement, my suggestion would be that you, Mr. Deschênes, may want to review the contents of the brief and say anything else you may wish to add. Take as much time as you need, but hopefully not more than 15 minutes.

Then, Mr. Desmarais, the Senators will proceed to question you on the contents of the brief and on Mr. Deschênes' statement, and perhaps on other matters that may be concerning them. The questions will, I think, be directed to you, Mr. Desmarais, and if you in turn wish to refer them to your colleagues, that is fine with us. After that we will turn to the other briefs later in the afternoon, when we will be delighted to have you stay with us, but we will not keep you.

Mr. Paul-G. Desmarais, President, Gelco Enterprises Limited: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Jules Deschênes, Lawyer, Gelco Enterprises Limited: Mr. Chairman, I was delighted to learn that you did not want to hear from me for more than 15 minutes, and I assure you that I will certainly abide by your advice.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of Gelco, we have filed a brief which, without a doubt, is now in the hands of the members of this Committee.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that the first thing we would like to put quite clearly to your Committee today is a response to what is foremost in this Committee's terms of reference. I have the English version in front of me at the moment, and we read that: the committee was "appointed to consider and report upon the ownership and control of the major means of mass public communication in Canada..."

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, we thought it advisable to dispel immediately in the presence of this Committee some of the ideas that have been spread among the public on the matter of control over the principal written media in Montreal, and by that I mean—in particular the newspaper "La Presse"—whose President, Mr. Dansereau, and Vice-President, Mr. Bureau, are also here today—and the various newspapers operated by Trans-Canada—whose president Mr. Francoeur is also present here today.

I would ask whether it is advisable, under the circumstances, for us to refer immediately to the brief prepared on behalf of Gelco Enterprises, and especially to the very last page of the brief which is Appendix "B".

In it, Mr. Chairman, Gentlemen, we wanted to give a diagram as simple and clear as possible, of the financial organization of the company which currently operates and publishes the newspaper "La Presse".

We notice, then, that "La Presse" has a certain number of ordinary shares (7,500) and a certain number of preference shares which, likewise, are ordinary shares (10,000). You can see on this last page of the Gelco brief that the 10,000 preference shares are the personal property of Gelco President, Mr. Paul Desmarais, who is seated on my immediate left, and that this bloc of ordinary shares constitutes the majority of the share capital of the La Presse company currently in circulation.

As for the ordinary shares that are held by the Gesco Limited, this company is a fully affiliated subsidiary of Gelco Enterprises Limited which, in its turn, is 75 per cent controlled, as indicated in the diagram, by the interests of Mr. Desmarais, and 25 per cent controlled by the interests of Mr. Jean Parisien, the Vice-President of the company, who is here on the left of the Chairman.

The net result of this situation is that, whatever could have been said about it in the past, "La Presse" of Montreal is controlled at the present time by Mr. Paul Desmarais, who holds most of the stock, personally and through his control over Gelco Enterprises Limited, stock which he shares moreover with Mr. Jean Parisien in the amount of 25 per cent.

I will invite you to turn to the page immediately preceding, Appendix "A", in the Gelco Enterprises brief where you see the organization chart giving the ownership of the other company, Les Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée (which will appear before this Committee shortly) and which shows the ownership of the share capital rests in the hands of four groups. If we take the organization chart, reading from left to right, we see that a part of the share capital of this firm belongs to Mr. Pierre Dansereau, another part to Mr. Paul Desmarais, another to Mr. Jean Parisien and the last to the Société Générale de Publication (which is the firm controlled by Mr. Jacques Francoeur). We also see that this firm of Les Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée which, as you will learn shortly, manages a group of newspapers in the province of Quebec, like "La Tribune" of Sherbrooke, "Le Nouvelliste" of Trois-Rivières and "La Voix de l'Est" of Granby. These firms, like "La Presse", are independent firms, and when we look at the chart for "La Presse" today, we realize that the matter concerns organizations independent of any other financial control, whether it is considered from the corporative standpoint or otherwise, and I believe that to be a vital issue. It was the first factor we wanted to put before the Committee today: This organizational independence of the two systems which today are responsible for "La Presse", on the one hand, and the newspapers managed, or published, by Les Journaux Trans-Canada, on the other.

I mention it because it is as well to state matters clearly, Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, and you are already aware that it has been said in some circles, and quite frequently, that the leading French-language newspapers of Quebec were under the control of the Power Corporation of Canada Limited.

I believe it sufficient to consider the diagrams we have put before you and which represent the situation as it exists today (at the time when we are discussing it) in order for us to realize that there is no corporative connection of any kind between Power Corporation Limited, on the one hand and, on the other, the interests, which are the ownership interests, i.e., the ownership of either "La Presse" or Les Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée.

Having clarified that point, Mr. Chairman, I would like to take just two minutes to make a very brief summary of the brief which Gelco Enterprises Limited filed before this Committee.

We have already said over and over again—and there is no harm in repeating it—in the background information we gave at the beginning of this brief. Here is the proof of the present control of this company—control which rests in the hands of the principal stockholder, Mr. Paul Desmarais and the lesser stockholder, his associate for the past quarter of a century, Mr. Jean Parisien.

This firm considered—and without a doubt its representatives will be able to tell you Members of the Committee, much more eloquently than I that it would be they who wanted this firm considered the importance of a press company in the age we live in today. In the brief we have set forth the circumstances that led the Gelco Company, through Messrs. Desmarais and Parisien, to take an interest in the press companies in Quebec.

Some quite fortuitous, almost chance, factors were involved which decreed that, aided by the circumstances, Gelco interests should concern themselves with the field of news.

Our brief lays before you the principles which seem to us to be fundamental to the operation and management of press companies. In particular, on page 6 of the brief, we find the statement of what we consider to be the fundamental principles for operating press companies in Canada, and especially in Quebec, today. We have said quite explicitly that we recognize, on the one hand, that the public is entitled to news, the most honest and objective news possible.

Secondly, we have placed in the forefront the principle that the traditional editorial presents the editor's thoughts—and I do not think anyone will fight with us on that statement of principle.

We have also shown that the press companies are controlled by Gelco Enterprises and Les Journaux Trans-Canada, and that they are, in the first place, Canadian companies, and at the same time, French-speaking Canadian companies with the purpose of spreading the news and seeking to serve the needs and interests of the readers and the community in which they are established. Our conclusions are to the effect that, with an exact understanding of the necessity for freedom of the press, which has been talked about a great deal, but which has become almost a disreputable expression today, precisely because it is being talked about. We are of the opinion—and when I say "we" here, that is to say, Gelco and Messrs. Desmarais and Parisien—are of the opinion that this freedom is one of the freedoms we ought to cherish and protect with the utmost care and energy, and against which, it seems to us, we have no need, for the time being, nor, we hope, in the foreseeable future—for any guideline or protection or any governmental control.

However, Gelco does understand, too, the concern that has become apparent in the public during recent years—its wanting to participate in the evolution of thought, and especially to have its own say in the working out of methods of news coverage and having its own say in the news media. It is common knowledge, for example, that almost everywhere today citizens' committees are being set up because the citizens want to participate in the evolution of government policies.

Under these circumstances, Gelco supports the suggestion which has already been made (and which probably will be voiced again still more forcefully) for the establishing of a press council which would have as its objective the introduction of some discipline, to a certain extent, to the field of news media. However, it is still necessary, and here we have suggested certain conditions, for this press council to be formed on a regional basis to begin with, because we believe that the disparity in regional interests across Canada demands that a press council be established solely on a strictly regional basis. We suggest that this press council ought to be an entirely voluntary organization following an agreement between the parties, and that the public especially be represented in it and be represented by a majority of members.

Under those conditions, Mr. Chairman, we think the formula for the press council is one which should satisfy the misgivings shown, (sometimes with due cause) by the public and in news circles, and we are happy to support this suggestion.

Those, Mr. Chairman, are the outlines of the policy of Gelco Enterprises Limited in matters concerning news media. Messrs. Parisien and Desmarais are of course at the disposal of your Committee, Mr. Chairman, to answer any questions you might wish to put to them.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Deschênes.

I know that Senator Prowse has a question to ask, but I will turn to Mr. Fortier first.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: I think, Mr. Desmarais, that before going any further, I would like to settle one point in view of the reference Mr. Deschênes made to Power Corporation of Canada Limited. You are, are you not, the president of that company?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes. Chairman of the Board.

Mr. Fortier: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Desmarais: Chairman of the Board.

Mr. Fortier: Chairman of the Board and responsible for the administration?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Directly or indirectly, how many of the shares, or, what percentage of the ordinary shares of the Power Corporation belong to you?

Mr. Desmarais: I think that, from the voting standpoint, we—the Gelco company hold 30 per cent of the shares at par.

Mr. Fortier: About 30 per cent.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: That is Gelco, or you?

Mr. Desmarais: And Mr. Parisien, yes. Mr. Parisien's interests and mine.

Mr. Fortier: All right. Now, Mr. Desmarais, in 1967, you decided to get into the communication industry, so might I ask you the following question? In your brief, you explain very clearly most of the reasons which caused you to take this action, along with Mr. Francœur and others. I wonder if you could tell the Committee whether you considered this interest in companies which publish newspapers in the same way that you considered investments in other companies, like insurance or trust companies, or whether you feel that it is an altogether separate sphere?

Mr. Desmarais: From the business standpoint, if we consider the newspapers as a business matter, then we consider them in the same way; but when we consider the nature of newspapers, it is not at all the same thing. It is necessary to take special measures where the newspapers are concerned. It is true then, that since we have control over the "Investors' Group" now, it may at a particular moment, I suppose, give rise to conflict between the owner of the mutual funds and the newspaper proprietor. So, in order to avoid that, what we did first of all, when I became president of Power Corporation, was we decided to dissociate certain things including, among others, the realms of the newspapers, radio and television. In Gelco, we kept the field of the newspapers. Now, to see to it that there is no conflict between the two, we have delegated our authority, as regards the newspapers, in "La Presse" to Mr. Dansereau, Mr. Pierre Dansereau, and in Les Journaux Trans-Canada to Mr. Francœur. That being so, then, we have no say from the standpoint of the editorial, or the newspapers, or control over the newspapers, apart from what we say we are keeping, in the brief we presented.

Mr. Fortier: On page 6, when you speak of the "editor", and you say:

"We believe that we fulfil our role of editor..."

To whom are you referring at that moment?

Mr. Desmarais: Well, when a person takes on a newspaper, he has the responsibility that goes with its ownership. One of the things that comes of owning a newspaper is that one has the right to determine the editorial attitude, so the opinions expressed in the newspaper are our opinions. Now, to ensure that there is absolutely no conflict between the views expressed in the newspaper and certain interests we might have outside the newspaper world, we have transferred this authority to the president of each newspaper in each region.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Bassett, as you probably know, when he came before this Committee, said—and I think that you will agree with him—that there was no editorial published in his newspaper which did not represent his point of view, and that, if an editorial was published by one of his employees, and if it did not coincide with his own political or other ideology, that employee would not remain in the employment of The Telegram

Mr. Desmarais: No. That is not the case with us, because in our company and...

Mr. Fortier: Could you explain for us, please?

Mr. Desmarais: As I told you, we delegated that authority to Mr. Dansereau of "La Presse" and to Mr. Francœur; and, that being so, I cannot afford the luxury of saying to those people: "Well, see here, I would like to have such and such an opinion voiced in the newspapers," or, "show up such and such a thing", or, "put forward an opinion on such and such a matter."

Mr. Fortier: Do you see in your brief at the top of page 7, paragraph 2, you say: "The editorial traditionally reflects the editor's thinking."

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, it is true. But the editor of the newspaper is, to be precise, Mr. Dansereau, and it is he who takes care of it, not me.

Mr. Fortier: I would like us to understand each other properly on that. Who is the editor of "La Presse"? Is it you, or Mr. Dansereau?

Mr. Desmarais: Me—but I delegated that authority to Mr. Dansereau.

Mr. Fortier: But, in the final analysis, it is you.

Mr. Desmarais: But when you say that, are you talking about the proprietor?

Mr. Fortier: No, there I am using your terms—you were speaking of the editor: "We believe that we fulfil our role of editor."

Mr. Desmarais: Oh, yes.

Mr. Fortier: You were speaking of "editor"—and we have to understand each other—and I would like to know who is the editor?

Mr. Desmarais: The editor of the newspaper has to be me, the owner of the newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: All right. So when you say that "the editorial traditionally reflects the editor's thinking", for "editor" we should read

Paul Desmarais, Jean Parisien—Gelco—is that right?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes. That is why I say that when someone takes on a newspaper, he is the editor of the newspaper, and he is entitled to his opinion which is reflected in the editorial page of the newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: In its brief, which you have probably read—I believe the matter ought to be raised now while you are before the Committee—"La Presse" states on page 5 in paragraph 20:

"The parameters of la Presse's editorial policy have already been expressed in the brief of Gelco Enterprises Ltd. and of Messrs. Paul Desmarais and Jean Parisien."

It should be said that the brief from "La Presse" was received at the end of January, and in it there is mention of a brief submitted by Gelco Enterprises Limited, by Messrs. Paul Desmarais and Jean Parisien. We received it yesterday, so they have had the advantage of reading it before us.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes. We often discussed it.

Mr. Fortier: Touché!

Mr. Desmarais: The control does not lie where you think, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: The brief from La Presse says "these memoranda reveal the parameters of the editorial policy of "La Presse", and it continues in paragraph 21:

"Within these parameters, the President of "La Presse" (that is to say, Mr. Dansereau) is responsible for the editorial policy of "La Presse".

What does it mean, "within these parameters"?

Mr. Desmarais: Well, look at page 7, and there you have the answer.

Mr. Fortier: Page 7 of which brief?

Mr. Desmarais: The Gelco brief, paragraph 18, point 3, I think.

Mr. Fortier: That is what I was getting at, these "parameters" are what we find in your brief in paragraphs 18 at No. 3(i), (ii), and (iii). Is that it?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: They are the parameters of the editorial policy of "La Presse"?

Mr. Desmarais: They are the only parameters we have.

Mr. Fortier: And, within those parameters, Mr. Dansereau is...

Mr. Desmarais: Perfectly free...

Mr. Fortier: And he has every latitude?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: If an editorial writer from "La Presse" decided to publish an editorial endorsing, let's say, the party of René Levesque, the Parti Québécois, what would you do yourself, as editor of "La Presse"?

Mr. Desmarais: Well, myself, I would ask Mr. Dansereau why he allowed such a thing.

Mr. Fortier: Such an editorial would not fit in with the...

Mr. Desmarais: Not with the thinking of the editor of "La Presse".

Mr. Fortier: Do you think that editorial writer would be dismissed from his duties?

Mr. Desmarais: In that event, you would have to ask Mr. Dansereau that, as I am not too sure what direction the matter would take.

Mr. Fortier: Perhaps I should ask if you would give specific directives touching upon the possibility?

Mr. Desmarais: No.

Mr. Fortier: But, you do admit that such an editorial would not be within the parameters of your editorial thinking?

Mr. Desmarais: It is something Mr. Parisien could...

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: I did not get that answer.

Mr. Parisien: We are Canadian enterprises and certainly fostering separatism would not be within the bounds of our directive nor of our editors nor of our presidents.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: All right. Could you explain to the Committee why you deemed it advisable to sell your interests in Quebec Télémedia Inc.?

Mr. Desmarais: It was quite simply a matter concerning Power Corporation. At that time, when I became President of Power Corporation, we decided to simplify the business, as there were investments divided up among too many things. We decided to sell some of them, and when an opportunity arose to sell Québec Télémedia, so we sold it.

Mr. Fortier: Should we read into this sale a decision other than one motivated by business sense?

Mr. Desmarais: No, no.

Mr. Fortier: So my question then is this: do you believe that it is sound practice, in Canada, for a firm, or an individual, holding shares in companies which publish daily or weekly newspapers, that is to say, in the written press, also to hold shares in a company that operates a radio or a television station?

Mr. Desmarais: For my part, I think it may be something worth considering. I even think that, perhaps ten years from now, if a newspaper is to survive, it will have to be connected with a television station or with a cable system, because the future, I think, is going to lie in that medium, and the newspaper will perhaps be more a part of that business.

Mr. Fortier: Do you visualize yourself one day in the near future taking an active interest in radio or television?

Mr. Desmarais: Well, no. As it happens, we have just sold a part of it, and I do not think that we intend to go right out and buy another radio or television station.

Mr. Fortier: In view of what you just said a few minutes ago, that it is, after all, tomorrow's medium, how do you reconcile your sale with what you have just said?

Mr. Desmarais: I mean that it is not clear-cut and distinct. Today, people say that if you want to work in that field, your operations should encompass that whole field, the whole spectrum. Not only in the case of the newspapers either—if it becomes clear that if the press wants to survive, there will come a time when it will have to have radio or cable connections, or something—well, when that day comes, I think it would be necessary to see about it.

Mr. Fortier: In your conclusions, Mr. Desmarais...

[Text]

The Chairman: Concerning Quebec Télé-média, that sale has not been finalized?

Mr. Desmarais: No, it is before the CRTC for approval.

The Chairman: What would you do—well, I cannot ask that question.

Mr. Fortier: You might say “I would give it away”.

Mr. Desmarais: I am not sure.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: You say in your brief, Mr. Desmarais—in paragraph 21: “We believe that the regrouping of newspaper enterprises is a natural and positive phenomenon”.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes. I believe—as in the case of “La Tribune” of Sherbrooke—when we bought “La Tribune”—I believe that that was a very good thing because “La Tribune” was not a very big newspaper. It was a newspaper suffering from a shortage of capital, and we were able to provide it with funds. So I think, today, that “La Tribune” is a viable and a more successful newspaper on account of that.

Mr. Fortier: The same tactics applied...

Mr. Desmarais: For “La Presse” and “Le Nouvelliste” also.

Mr. Fortier: In your present activity, is there a point at which the concentration now in progress, not only in Quebec, could become dangerous to the public interest?

Mr. Desmarais: Well, we must consider whether they come into being in the same way as ours. No, because I think it is a phenomenon that is occurring everywhere, not only here, but in the United States and in France, and elsewhere.

Mr. Fortier: So, you consider that maybe one day all the press companies in Quebec will belong to one group?

Mr. Desmarais: Oh, no. Perhaps that is possible, but I do not anticipate it.

Mr. Fortier: No. But that is why I put the question to you. From the viewpoint of your Board of Directors, or from the viewpoint of Messrs. Dansereau and Parisien, and yourself, do you think that at a certain moment “it will be enough”.

[Text]

Mr. Desmarais: I am not sure that it will be enough. You see, if it is in the actual interest of a newspaper, if a gentleman wants to sell a newspaper some time, then that is when it will be necessary to consider the matter. I do not know where a person can draw the line for saying when “it's enough”.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: So, it is not a problem yet?

Mr. Desmarais: No, it is not a problem yet.

Mr. Fortier: Now for a question that we have put to the representatives of the groups who have appeared before the Committee to date... Are you still on the market for daily or weekly newspapers?

Mr. Desmarais: If there were any opportunities for purchasing newspapers in the west of the country, we would buy some; and if there were any opportunities for purchasing them in the United States, we would buy some there, too.

[Text]

The Chairman: What about Toronto?

Mr. Desmarais: Certainly I would love to buy a paper in Toronto. Is there one for sale?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: So you do not preclude the possibility of buying daily newspapers outside Quebec?

Mr. Desmarais: No. Not at all.

Mr. Fortier: In Quebec, now, to be more specific, what if “Le Soleil” was for sale in Quebec?

Mr. Desmarais: It has been talked about a good deal in the last two years—but we are not negotiating to buy “Le Soleil”.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gilbert would not allow me to put the question in that way. But, as a purely hypothetical question, if a press company were to be for sale in Quebec, would you be interested?

Mr. Desmarais: It would then be necessary to consider the matter, as it would perhaps be in our interest and in the interest of the newspaper we buy. I do not know. We would have to look into the matter and see how we could supplement our chain of newspapers in order to get better newspapers.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: Mr. Desmarais, why do you buy newspapers?

Mr. Desmarais: First of all, when we first thought about newspapers, that is, when we came to buy them, I looked upon them as a business transaction. Mr. Francoeur was the man who came to see me and asked me if I wanted to buy. We decided we would, because in the Province of Quebec it became obvious that many of the newspapers would come up for sale. We had a good look at them; some of them needed a lot of management and capital, and know-how in sales and so on. We had a good look at La Tribune in Sherbrooke and decided that we should buy it. There is a lot of responsibility tied into buying a newspaper. We bought it knowing there was that responsibility and I think we have better newspapers because of the fact that we have bought it. I am sure people would say inevitably, and it is a fact, that La Tribune is a better newspaper.

Senator Prowse: The point I am getting at is this. Do you get as good a return from your investments on newspapers as you get from your other enterprises?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, I would say as good and sometimes better in some cases. But it depends on how things are going.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you buy newspapers clearly because you get a return on your money there better than you would get on any other kind of investment that is available.

Mr. Desmarais: That is one of our motivations. Certainly, the newspaper business is a business and that is the way we first look at it. But I realize there are other responsibilities that go only with newspapers.

Senator Prowse: What other reasons would you have? And you may talk about those other responsibilities in answer to this, if you desire.

Mr. Desmarais: If you buy a newspaper and own one then you have certain responsibilities as editor of a newspaper and you have to see that the newspaper is run on the proper basis. You will see, if you look at our brief on page 6 and page 7, that we outline, generally, the way we think a newspaper should be operated.

Senator Prowse: Yes, I see that on page 6 you say: "We believe that we fulfil our role of editor in pursuing and in insisting that others abide by the following principles:" and then you enumerate the principles. What experience had you had with newspapers that led you to believe that this was an area in which you perhaps had a particular talent?

Mr. Desmarais: If I look at something that is not well managed and is under-capitalized, I can tell. On the other hand, I am not a newspaper man at all. However, I know many good ones and we have associated ourselves with some that we thought were good ones and successful ones. Jacques Francoeur is one, and there are others. They have become part of this and are really running things.

Senator Prowse: They had the papers originally?

Mr. Desmarais: No, they had some of them. The first paper we bought was La Tribune. It was owned by Power Corporation at the time. At that time I had nothing to do with Power Corporation. After that we got into Power Corporation.

Senator Prowse: What I am interested in—and which does not appear in the Gelco brief—is that you have very substantial interests in Power Corporation.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, I do.

Senator Prowse: I think it would be correct to say a controlling interest.

Mr. Desmarais: Not a controlling interest but a major interest. I am Chairman and Chief Executive Officer, and in that way I control it along with the Board of Directors.

Senator Prowse: At the moment you have to answer to the rest of them for the way it is running.

Mr. Desmarais: And we have to answer to our shareholders as well.

Senator Prowse: Because of your interest in Power Corporation and because of your interest in Gelco these are really indivisible interests so far as you personally are concerned; is that not so?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, I would think so.

Senator Prowse: What are the various types of interest that Power Corporation has in the province of Quebec?

Mr. Desmarais: They have an interest in the pulp and paper industry, shipping in transportation companies (bus companies and trucking), a glass company, and chemical companies.

Senator Prowse: In other words, you are what is generally referred to as a conglomerate.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, I would think so.

Senator Prowse: That is in the general, popular and loose language of the term.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, very loose.

Senator Prowse: Are you telling us today that you get a better return, or even as good a return, from publishing newspapers as you receive from the other types of business that you have been interested in?

Mr. Desmarais: No. There is no such thing as a set percentage. In some cases it is better; in others it is not as good. It depends on whether you have a good year or not, I suppose, in different areas.

Senator Prowse: What kind of average return would you get on the invested capital in what we just called the conglomerate interests as compared with the average return you would get on your communications interests?

Mr. Desmarais: I don't know. That would be very difficult to answer. You could say, generally speaking, that we would be looking for 10 per cent. Today, with the bank interest rates the way they are, we would be looking for a little more.

Senator Prowse: They want about 11 per cent.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

An Hon. Senator: Maybe they should buy a bank.

Senator Prowse: Perhaps we should not pursue that subject.

What I am concerned with is the possibility of big business imposing a control on communications. For example, if the pulp and paper industry gave cause for complaint, and I don't know whether it ever would, and one of your newspaper editors decided to pursue a policy of complaining, what would be your attitude?

Mr. Desmarais: I am sure they would complain, if there were a need for it.

Senator Prowse: But suppose you were going to be hurt badly in a given area by what one of your newspaper editors was recommending?

Mr. Desmarais: We realized when we bought the newspapers that this could be possible, and our attitude is that, if it does happen, well, that's it—I mean these people have the responsibility of running these papers and they have to run them in the interest of the community they serve. If that does not coincide with our interest, that is too bad for us. The newspaper has to be honest and report the news as it is and pursue the interests of the people of the community it serves.

Senator Prowse: As a percentage of your total holdings, what part of your total investment does your investment in the newspaper business represent?

Mr. Desmarais: You know, I never thought of that. What would it be, Mr. Parisien?

Mr. Jean Parisien, Vice-President, Gelco Enterprises Limited: I would say roughly half, Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: You mean that if you took the total value of all the interests of Power Corporation and all of the other things...

Mr. Parisien: Oh, no. It would be nowhere near that.

Mr. Desmarais: No, it would be 7 per cent. We are referring to our own holdings.

Senator Prowse: I am interested in Paul Desmarais.

The Chairman: He said 7 per cent.

Senator Prowse: So, of your total interests, 7 per cent is in the newspaper business. Does that include all the communications or just the newspapers?

Mr. Desmarais: Just the newspaper business. We have no other interests now except the newspapers.

Senator Prowse: So 7 per cent of your interests is in the newspaper business. Do you have any kind of rule-of-thumb guide to determine at what point you would write off a bad investment?

Mr. Desmarais: I suppose, if you are losing that much money, you would have to write off a bad investment sometimes. You would have to, if it is worthless. That would be determined by how it was going.

Senator Prowse: Suppose your newspaper started to pursue a policy inimical or hostile to your other interests?

Mr. Desmarais: It would have to be hostile to all our interests. I cannot foresee that. You are talking about 7 per cent being hostile to 93 per cent. I can't foresee that sort of situation. If it did happen, we would certainly have to let the people who run our newspapers take that decision.

Senator Prowse: I wonder if you could. Do you have an interest in Warnock Hersey Int'l Ltd. or do they have an interest in you?

Mr. Desmarais: No. There is no interest either way.

Senator Prowse: No interest at all?

Mr. Desmarais: None whatsoever.

Senator Prowse: Shawinigan Industries Ltd.?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, they are a wholly-owned subsidiary.

Senator Prowse: You have an interest in Canadian Steamship Lines Ltd., in which you hold more than 50 per cent interest.

Mr. Desmarais: That is correct.

Senator Prowse: And the Imperial Life Assurance Company of Canada, in which you hold more than 50 per cent.

Mr. Desmarais: That is right.

Senator Prowse: Dominion Glass Company Ltd.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

Senator Prowse: Then, there is Canadian Interurban Properties Ltd. What do they do?

Mr. Desmarais: They build.

Senator Prowse: What do they build?

Mr. Desmarais: They build houses.

Senator Prowse: And then Trans-Canada Realities Company Ltd., what about them?

Mr. Desmarais: What does it do?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Desmarais: It is a small holding company.

Senator Prowse: A holding company.

Mr. Desmarais: Very small. It holds some properties.

Senator Prowse: Suppose that the editor of your paper decided he was opposed to very large corporations and felt that everything should be broken up into very small units, would you not feel at that point that you should exercise the control that you have?

Mr. Desmarais: Well, what we have done, Senator, simply is that we have delegated authority to him. There is no way we could change it.

Senator Prowse: What do you mean, that there is no way you could change it?

Mr. Desmarais: Well, we have to live by that principle.

Senator Prowse: But what is to prevent you from changing it?

Mr. Desmarais: Nothing really if we wanted to. We could, but we won't.

Senator Prowse: In other words the assurance of the public that the newspapers will be completely free depends entirely on your continuing goodwill, does it not?

Mr. Desmarais: No. Perhaps they are, but I think it would be against our interests to do anything else. If we did, then the people would not believe the newspapers and they would not buy them. We have to leave them alone to reflect their own opinions in these areas.

Senator Prowse: Do you have publishers as such appointed for each paper?

Mr. Desmarais: The publishers are the presidents. The president is in effect the publisher of the newspaper.

Senator Prowse: How is he selected?

Mr. Desmarais: What we have done when we bought the newspapers is this: Mr. Francœur and Mr. Dansereau became in charge of the newspapers because of their ability, their proven management ability in running successful newspapers.

Senator Prowse: If they were successful, why would you want to interfere with them?

Mr. Desmarais: We didn't. We just bought them.

Senator Prowse: Because they were good investments?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

Senator Blois: And they were for sale.

Mr. Desmarais: They were for sale.

Senator Prowse: Why were they for sale?

Mr. Desmarais: I think you will have to ask that question of Mr. Francœur and Mr. Dansereau.

The Chairman: I think that is a good answer, and you will have the opportunity of asking that later.

Senator Prowse: And you yourself had no experience in newspaper publication?

Mr. Desmarais: No, I had none.

Senator Prowse: You were lending them your corporate strength.

Mr. Desmarais: Our management strength and I would hope our capital.

Senator Prowse: What did this offer them?

Mr. Desmarais: From the point of view of accounting controls or merchandizing or sales?

Senator Prowse: I think you should explain the word "controls"—it could be misunderstood.

Mr. Desmarais: Financial controls, budgets and so on. Some of the papers did not have budgets when we bought them. They were virtually running on a shoestring operation.

Senator Prowse: And you have been able to bring them financial strength?

Mr. Desmarais: I think so.

Senator Prowse: As far as your present experience has indicated, there has been no inclination on your part to interfere with the operation of the newspapers as such?

Mr. Desmarais: None whatever. I don't think I have even talked to any of the editors about their policy.

Senator Prowse: Now has the advantage that you have been able to bring to them been limited purely to the financial advantages that would flow from expertise and management or has it been reflected in better service to the community?

Mr. Desmarais: I think it has, and I think you could ask that question more specifically of the people from La Presse and La Nouvelle. I think the answer will be that La Presse and the others are better newspapers since we bought them. In fact I think the answer will be that two of them would not be there today if we had not bought them. They would have been closed down.

The Chairman: Which two?

Mr. Desmarais: I think La Tribune was headed for difficulties and the other one was La Patrie which was bankrupt.

Senator Prowse: Are any of them now making money?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, they are.

Senator Prowse: You can build a professional management into them and put them on a better basis?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, because there is a business side to a newspaper, and they have to be run on a business basis.

Senator Prowse: Would you think, in connection with news and editorial policy, that it would be to the advantage to publishers or owners of newspapers generally to also obtain the services of professional editors, to use that phrase?

Mr. Desmarais: You mean from a management point of view?

Senator Prowse: Yes.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, I think it would be all right, but, in these cases, the people that we dealt with wanted to sell outright. It wasn't a question of their going and getting expertise—they wanted to sell.

Senator Prowse: They wanted money to get them over various problems?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes.

Senator Prowse: On page 7 of your brief at paragraph 19 you say you have "delegated the responsibility of implementing the foregoing principles to the president of each of our newspapers". Before that you have given a list of principles among which you say that those who provide the news "must do so with the most honesty". I think this is most important. But who decides if this in fact is being done?

Mr. Desmarais: Who decides what?

Senator Prowse: Who decides if in fact the president of the paper is implementing these policies you have listed on page 7, as number (i), (ii) and (iii)?

Mr. Desmarais: I think one of the things that happens is that if they were not doing that, you would hear somebody complaining about it or belly-aching about it. We have not had any complaints.

Senator Prowse: Well, let us assume a situation where you do get somebody belly-aching about it.

Mr. Desmarais: Well, I suppose if one of our newspapers became a Separatist newspaper, we would have to do something about it.

Senator Prowse: Who would?

Mr. Desmarais: Ourselves.

Senator Prowse: That is Gelco?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, we would talk to the president of the company involved and ask him to explain why he has gone beyond the parameter. Let us suppose he did not report the news objectively and he was slanting it, then we would do the same thing.

Senator Prowse: As a matter of principle and not dealing at the moment with specifics, the owner has to exercise the power which he possesses by virtue of his ownership.

Mr. Desmarais: There is a responsibility from that point of view to stay within the general parameters. That is what we have tried to do—to determine what it is and how far we can go in view of the fact that we have other interests.

Senator Prowse: The fact is really that the public depends on your goodwill as to the kind of newspaper they get.

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, but that is dictated by the public, really. We have to serve their interests or we will die. There are so many counterchecks. You cannot slant news. There are many other ways to obtain news, like television and other newspapers—that is a check in itself. You have to produce the news objectively and honestly or I do not think you would be in business.

Senator Prowse: Are any of your newspapers produced in areas where they are the only ones that people have access to?

Mr. Desmarais: There are many newspapers which come to Sherbrooke. The main newspaper is La Tribune. La Presse and Le Soleil also come to Sherbrooke.

Senator Prowse: So it would be true to say that you do not really have a closed shop, or a monopoly situation?

The Chairman: A local daily press monopoly?

Senator Prowse: Yes, a local daily press monopoly. Do you have any problem getting advertising, particularly from the national advertisers?

Mr. Desmarais: Could we pass that?

The Chairman: Can you give us some examples of editorials or articles which have appeared in any of your newspapers to which you have taken exception?

Mr. Desmarais: No. I cannot.

Senator Prowse: Perhaps you should ask him to which he felt he might have liked to have taken exception.

Mr. Desmarais: Oh, boy.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Desmarais, I would like your comment on a statement which Mr. Péladeau made before the Committee this morning. Mr. Pierre Péladeau, stated that it might be desirable for the share capital of a company which publishes a daily newspaper to become the property of the public in general and that freedom of the press in a democratic country could only benefit. And he added that it was a move that their companies will consider in the near future.

Mr. Desmarais: Does this mean that he will relinquish his control?

Mr. Fortier: He did not suggest that he would necessarily abandon his control, but that he would offer a percentage of the shares to the public. Do you feel that this is a wise move?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, I think it is probably a good thing if the public wants to share in purchasing a newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Do you plan some day to do that?

Mr. Desmarais: Yes, perhaps at some time.

[Text]

The Chairman: We will turn now, Mr. Desmarais, to the reception of the brief from La Presse. I will thank you more fully at the end of the afternoon. I had hoped you might stay for the rest of the afternoon. You can go to the back and relax. We may have other questions and hope you will answer them as you did these. We are most grateful.

Honourable Senators, we are now going to receive the second of the three briefs this afternoon, that from La Presse. Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. Pierre Dansereau, who is the President of La Presse. Seated next to Mr. Dansereau is Mr. André Bureau, Executive Vice-President. At the end of the table is Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier, Director, Personnel and Labour Relations. On my immediate left is Mr. Pierre Lafrance, who is the Managing Editor.

Mr. Dansereau, the brief from La Presse was received several weeks in advance, as requested. It has been circulated, read and studied by the Senators. We now turn to you, sir, for an oral statement in which you may amplify and explain the contents of the brief, adding anything that might occur to you. Following that we will ask you questions with reference to your brief and oral statement. If you wish, any of your colleagues, may answer as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Dansereau, President, La Presse: Mr. Chairman, Senators, as President of the newspaper, La Presse, I am pleased to lend my co-operation and the experience of my co-workers to the work of this Committee. I hope that one of the effects of this inquiry will be to alert you to the new dangers which threaten written communication.

Among these dangers, let us consider in particular the unfair competition represented by the national radio-television network which not only draws from the same advertising resources as the newspapers, but, in addition, benefits from state subsidies amounting to close to $170 million annually.

Let us also mention the competition from the foreign media which are more and more flooding our markets, particularly in Quebec where the public is interested not just in French publications but also in those translated from English, not to mention the purely English Canadian and American publications.

Another threat to the citizen's right to information is the unreasonable and constant increase in postal rates which, in Quebec alone, from the first year of its application, has deprived the daily newspaper of more than 40,000 subscribers, representing over 125,000 readers. Let us also mention in passing that the second-class rates in the United States underwent an increase from 3 to 5 cents per pound in three stages over three successive years, whereas in Canada we have had to absorb the same increase in a single blow, and to assume two others equally as great a few months later.

In addition, these increases in postal rates are discriminatory since, according to the figures of the Post Office Department itself, Canadian daily newspapers must assume 81 per cent of the cost of the delivery while foreign publications such as Time and Reader's Digest assume only 31 per cent of the total cost of delivery.

In addition to the dangers which have just been outlined, we must face a number of other serious problems. There are, for example, the problems of jurisdiction which arise between the unions of employees whose trades have been changed through technological development; the influence over news exercised by the journalist unions; the tendency of governments and other authorities to limit access to information. These are some of the problems which we hope your Committee will consider.

On the other hand, I am personally convinced that regrouping of the written communication media is absolutely essential to the survival of these enterprises. Recent experience has shown that because of the severity of succession duties, the lack of the necessary capital to carry out technological change, the impossibility for a single enterprise to attract and create a competent staff, an isolated daily newspaper is inevitably called upon to combine with some form of regrouping if it does not wish to disappear. To avoid such a consequence, I would be in favour of a regrouping of press enterprises, whatever their nature. Moreover, this would involve no danger as there will always be other means of written or electronic communication.

I also feel that regrouping of the newspapers, radio and television stations in a single area of influence can be acceptable, provided competition does exist. Such regrouping could also be permitted if it favoured the survival of a newspaper. Furthermore, in addition to providing a guarantee for the future, regrouping of the communication enterprises at the same time sets up a barrier against the Americanization of Canadian society; every time an enterprise disappears, the influence of the foreign media increases.

I wish to emphasize that La Presse is firmly opposed to any government control in the field of information, particularly in the field of written information. We favour and work towards the creation of a regional rather than a national press council whose function would be to safeguard freedom of the press, without government intervention, in all the communication media. Such a press council would be formed following an agreement among the three parties concerned: first of all, the public which would receive the majority representation, then the journalists, and lastly editors and radio and television broadcasters.

We have illustrated in our brief how news is handled in our office, what the role of the editorial is and what internal and external means and guarantees ensure freedom of expression and news honesty at La Presse.

Since La Gazette was founded by Théophraste Renaudot in 1631, parliaments have almost all had the desire (and several have succumbed to it) to pass laws governing the press. Experience has proven that any government intervention in the information field has always resulted in abuses, the inevitable consequences of which were to deprive the public of its right to information, and the individual of his freedom of speech; this is what must be avoided at all costs.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Dansereau. We will begin the questioning this afternoon with Mr. Fortier.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Dansereau, do you at La Presse have access to certain facilities or persons employed by les Journaux Trans-Canada or are the two sectors mutually exclusive?

Mr. Dansereau: The two areas are mutually exclusive.

Mr. Fortier: There is no relationship between the two sectors?

Mr. Dansereau: There is co-operation on the technological level, but regarding news, there is only one point of co-operation and that is Pierre O'Neil's column which appears, I believe, only in La Tribune.

Mr. Fortier: You mentioned, in the statement which you have just read, that you favour regrouping of press enterprises, whatever their nature. Are the members of the Committee to understand that in the case of Les Journaux Trans-Canada and La Presse such regrouping does not exist?

Mr. Dansereau: Not at present, no.

Mr. Fortier: Do you recommend it should?

Mr. Dansereau: I do not recommend it, but if circumstances demand it, I feel that to ensure survival it would be a good thing.

Mr. Fortier: Is it just a question of survival or is it not, as I understood, a question of a pooling of resources, if you will?

Mr. Dansereau: Naturally, a pooling of resources favours expansion which a single newspaper could not allow itself. Obviously, once this has taken place, it brings considerable development with regard to both information and technology. A newspaper alone could not consider this. Let us take as an example Le Nouvelliste in Trois-Rivières. When I was there, I could not consider the establishment of a research branch. The same holds true for a promotion or a marketing branch. Inevitably, therefore, we were relegated to rear guard action. We were consigned to slow extermination.

Mr. Fortier: I am trying to follow you. From Mr. Desmarais' and your presentation earlier, it seems to me that the end result must be—I used the term "pooling" earlier—and I am going to use it again—a pooling of the interests of La Presse and those of Les Journaux Trans-Canada while at the same time preserving editorial freedom.

Mr. Dansereau: Well, I am not prepared to say that this must be the end result because the nature of a provincial newspaper and the nature of a metropolitan newspaper are completely different. As long as both identities are preserved, I feel that it is a good thing to preserve them.

Mr. Fortier: You say, "As long as they are preserved." What could force La Presse to...?

Mr. Dansereau: Economic conditions.

Mr. Fortier: This is all that you consider?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Today, would La Presse not be a better newspaper if it were part of the Trans-Canada group?

Mr. Dansereau: La Presse is a better newspaper because it is the property of Mr. Desmarais.

Mr. Fortier: I shall not go further. If La Presse were to become—I shall not mention ownership—an integral part of Les Journaux Trans-Canada, I am asking you whether, in your opinion, La Presse could become a better newspaper?

Mr. Dansereau: No, I think not.

Mr. Fortier: It is not a necessity?

Mr. Dansereau: It is not a necessity. It is not a necessary step for La Presse to become a better newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: You state that freedom of La Presse in Quebec does exist, is that not so?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Did it exist to a greater degree before it became the property of Mr. Desmarais and associates? Has this freedom diminished since La Presse has passed into Mr. Desmarais' hands?

Mr. Dansereau: I believe that it is greater.

Mr. Fortier: Could you elaborate somewhat?

Mr. Dansereau: Does your question refer to the period after the purchase of La Presse by Mr. Desmarais?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Dansereau: Personally, I was not with La Presse before Mr. Desmarais' arrival. However, being in the newspaper business, I have been given to understand that there was much more direct influence by the owners of La Presse over the news under the previous ownership than there is today; there is none today.

Mr. Fortier: If there is some influence on the part of the owners today, as President of La Presse, what do you consider it to be?

Mr. Dansereau: There is no influence.

Mr. Fortier: With regard to the editorial comments which you mention in your brief, paragraph 20, can you explain to the members of the Committee how these are suggested?

Mr. Dansereau: Orally.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon?

Mr. Dansereau: Orally. There are no exact rules, there are no written edicts, nothing.

Mr. Fortier: Have you ever at any time submitted a planned editorial to your owner?

Mr. Dansereau: Never.

Mr. Fortier: Or mentioned to him that you intended to undertake a detailed study of a subject?

Mr. Dansereau: Never.

Mr. Fortier: Were you here this morning? I know that I saw Mr. Bureau...

Mr. Dansereau: No, I was not here this morning.

Mr. Fortier: Le Journal de Montréal sells approximately 50,000 or 55,000 copies. Montréal-Matin has a circulation of approximately 138,000 copies.

Mr. Dansereau: Today, it is 160,000.

Mr. Fortier: And with regard to both Le Journal de Montréal and Montréal-Matin, we were told this morning that their circulation will increase.

Mr. Dansereau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Their circulation will increase while that of the other Montreal newspapers remains almost the same, or in some cases decreases. Can you explain this phenomenon?

Mr. Dansereau: The only explanation that I see—and we are working on it at La Presse—is that, to date, La Presse has not made enough attempts to reach the masses. It has produced a newspaper which was much too intellectual to appeal to the lower levels—I am not saying the lowest level—as Le Journal de Montréal does through a degree of sensationalism and Montréal-Matin through sports. We, on the other hand, provide complete news coverage. Now, as for the chap who works at Vickers, Bill 63 will pass right over his head while the horse races will be somewhat more interesting.

Mr. Fortier: Do you intend to do something to draw more readers?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes. Mr. Lafrance who is here today, the news director, has a project in this regard. He is studying the matter and may perhaps explain his ideas to you.

Mr. Fortier: Will you inform us of this project?

Mr. Lafrance, Managing Editor, La Presse: I should first like to add to what Mr. Dansereau said. Obviously, La Presse is a very serious newspaper which also seeks to reach the masses. However, it is an afternoon newspaper and perhaps at present the morning newspapers have a certain advantage over us. Perhaps we should revise our way of reaching readers. Nevertheless, I claim that at present La Presse is a very complete newspaper, a newspaper which is approachable for readers. On the other hand, I agree with the President when he states that ways must be found of increasing our circulation. We have now begun a series of surveys to determine what the real tastes and needs of the readers are, and to attempt to meet these needs through our product. Now, with the organization we have set up here, we claim better to meet the tastes and needs of the readers. The new system has not been set up long—a system enabling us to take into account day by day the major interest areas of the population we serve—but we are anticipating excellent results. However, I hasten to add that I feel it is a question of time. Our newspaper already answers the needs of its readers, but we have perhaps a little way to go yet. We are perhaps too stable. I feel that we are not progressing fast enough. I hope that in the months to come, we will.

Mr. Fortier: I hope so. Do you feel—I am attempting to summarize your thought—that more and more Quebec and Canadian readers are looking for newspapers which offer them all the news in one, two or three areas—as Mr. Péladeau mentioned to us this morning, such as sports and local news—and the rest is superfluous, whereas at La Presse you attempt to cover the entire range. You state that La Presse is a complete newspaper. Do you feel that in the daily newspapers, the accent is being placed increasingly more on news in a few areas, rather than in all areas?

Mr. Bureau: I should like to comment on this if I may, Mr. Fortier. First, the fact that our circulation is already at least four times that of Le Journal de Montréal proves that there is a sizeable segment of the population interested in general news coverage. What Mr. Péladeau explained to you this morning—I attended part of his presentation—is precisely what we are looking for ourselves. Mr. Péladeau is in the process of conducting an experiment which was done by La Presse several years ago, that is, he has begun by interesting certain categories of readers, what are called target groups, like sports readers, readers of sensational news or factual news. At La Presse these readers have already been served over the past years so, today, we must vary the readership we have had for many years. When Mr. Lafrance spoke to you earlier of new units, new information structures, he was referring precisely to this new direction in areas of interest. In this way, the some 200,000 readers of La Presse will continue to find what they are looking for in La Presse and, as well, a number of other readers will be attracted—readers who, today, perhaps do not find what they would like to find in La Presse since areas of interest today are not quite what they were a few years ago. Taking sports as an example, we have one of the most complete teams, a team of 15 reporters covering sports. Entertainment news is an area which is of special interest to some weekly newspapers. However, until a few years ago, the large newspapers, the large daily papers had neglected to provide their readers with information of this kind which we have done, and there is a fairly encouraging response to this.

Mr. Fortier: With Spec?

Mr. Bureau: With Spec and La Presse, because on Saturdays we also publish a television guide providing information on the world of entertainment; on Thursdays, Spec provides information in the same area. We have also emphasized other areas, for example, economics and finance—and Mr. Lafrance may perhaps give you some explanations in this regard—and national and international politics. Certainly the reader is primarily interested in local politics. He is first of all interested in local events. However, the fact remains that there is a whole category of readers preoccupied by national and international news and we are finally attempting to place more emphasis in the newspaper on national and international news. We have, moreover, reorganized our Ottawa office with this in mind. We have three full-time journalists here in Ottawa and occasionally Montreal newsmen come here to help out their Ottawa colleagues with special assignments or investigations on areas of interest to the Canadian nation as a whole.

Mr. Fortier: There is a phenomenon in Quebec which has amazed several members of the Committee and that is the outstanding success of the weekly newspapers when compared with the weeklies in English-speaking Canada where they are practically nonexistent. How do you explain this, Mr. Dansereau or Mr. Bureau?

Mr. Bureau: I feel that for too many years, the daily newspapers have begrudged the influence of radio and television. They viewed television as a dangerous competitor and remained almost silent on a subject of increasingly greater interest to segments of our population. What people failed to find in their daily newspapers, they found in the weeklies which dealt with entertainment, and this was probably one of the reasons for the success of such weeklies. In these newspapers, people were able to find things they could not find in our dailies. Now, there is a way of approaching these subjects and a certain importance which must be accorded them. In La Presse's Thursday supplement, Spec, we attempt to give information on the world of entertainment—as offered in the prominent and highly successful weeklies—in keeping with the standard of information maintained in the rest of La Presse.

Mr. Fortier: How do you explain the fact that in Toronto there are two daily newspapers with circulations of some 400 thousand and 300 thousand whereas in Montreal, a city with a greater population than Toronto, there is only one French evening newspaper and a single English newspaper?

Mr. Bureau: In Montreal, we have a score of French and English newspapers, and French Canadians in Montreal also read the English newspapers. One should count the total circulation of all daily newspapers here in Montreal in order to form a relatively accurate comparison with the circulation of newspapers in Toronto. This is the first factor.

[Text]

The Chairman: Do you have many English readers reading your papers?

Mr. Bureau: I do not think we have so many English readers. Maybe Mr. Lafrance could answer that.

Mr. Lafrance: I saw from a survey on Saturday we have 6,000 English language subscribers.

The Chairman: And there would be more French readers reading, for example, The Star?

Mr. Lafrance: I suppose so.

The Chairman: I am sorry I interrupted you.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: When Mr. Price of The Star and others were here, they told us that twenty per cent of their readers were French-speaking.

Mr. Bureau: I would be interested to know how many French-speaking persons read The Gazette. If we add the 20 per cent who read the English newspapers to the circulation of the French Canadian newspapers, it will perhaps be seen that we have a readership comparable to that of the Toronto newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: In your opinion, is there room in Montreal for another French evening newspaper?

Mr. Bureau: Evening newspaper?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, which would be in direct competition with La Presse.

Mr. Bureau: Well, the matter has not yet been raised. Have some others answered you on this subject—if I may take the liberty of asking?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, we were given to understand that there was room.

Mr. Bureau: Well, everything depends upon the extent or size of the newspaper imagined. We feel that there is room for an additional French daily newspaper in the morning and there is perhaps room for an additional French daily in the evening. We shall certainly attempt to recover everything we can recover, and if there is something left over, so much the better.

Mr. Fortier: With regard to the reader's time, what do you consider to be your first competitor in Montreal?

Mr. Bureau: Television.

Mr. Fortier: Television, then, in the press?

Mr. Bureau: I do not have the figures on hand. I do not know whether Mr. Lafrance remembers the figures we had concerning the percentage of time represented by the various newspapers, but they are already a few years out of date and I feel that it would not be right to give you a reply based on statistics for 1965-66. I know that, generally speaking, with regard to the written media and electronic media, our competitor obviously is the electronic media. However, among the written media themselves, I am afraid that I cannot supply any figures. I do not know whether Mr. Lafrance...

Mr. Lafrance: I do not remember either.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Bureau, I am not old enough to answer this question. You and I are the same age.

Mr. Bureau: We are the same age but you seem to be more serious than I.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Dansereau or Mr. Bureau, has the arrival of television as a communication or news medium changed the newspaper, the press, the daily newspaper of the past, and if so, in what way?

Mr. Dansereau: I feel that television has actually helped, and perhaps has not changed the newspaper. But like all competition, even if it is another newspaper, has improved the product. Television has definitely forced the newspaper to dwell less on spot news and more on analysis, the reason behind the news, the reason behind a situation or thing, whereas previously the event was simply reported. This, I feel, is the major change which television has forced the newspaper to make.

Mr. Fortier: Before the Committee in December, a newspaper owner stated that with the arrival of television, the daily paper has been compelled to become more honest, more frank, because the reader could compare the news. What do you think of this statement?

Mr. Dansereau: Not necessarily so because he could compare the news before in another newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: That depends, of course, on whether there was another newspaper available.

Mr. Dansereau: Yes, but take a city such as Montreal. If The Star reported something one way and the Montréal-Matin another, he could always compare.

Mr. Fortier: A year ago, Mr. Bureau, you started publishing Télé-Pressé, you started publishing Spec and you explained earlier that it was to compete with certain...

Mr. Bureau: No.

Mr. Fortier: No?

Mr. Bureau: It was not a matter of competing. It was an area which we did not cover and which we ought to have covered.

Mr. Fortier: Which you needed to?

Mr. Bureau: Exactly, just as we reorganized the economic and financial pages early last fall and increased our team of eight journalists to thirteen. At the moment we produce daily pages of economic and financial news which, I believe, have no counterpart at present in the French newspapers in Quebec. We plan in the very near future to supply our readers with a news sheet, a weekly news sheet on economics and finance, truly tailored to the needs of the French Canadian reader in Quebec. This is what we are in the process of preparing now. It takes many months—first research into readers' habits, then seeking out the talent needed to prepare the weekly sheet, then regular work on it.

Mr. Fortier: This weekly news sheet lends itself much more to a magazine than to a daily newspaper and the question I wish to ask you is this: are we to understand that at La Presse you felt that you had to enter into direct competition with the weekly magazine?

Mr. Bureau: No. What really led us to start this kind of publication was the need which the reader had, to find easily accessible information. In the case of Télé-Pressé there were already television guides in French which were on sale and had attained some success in the Province of Quebec. Our readers found in the pages of La Presse every day, the list of radio and television broadcasts which we published. It was easier, I think, simply to re-group in a small booklet, in a television guide, all this information, than to present them from day to day and to oblige our readers to open a large, awkward newspaper to find, at 7:20 a programme for Channel 12 or Channel 6. It is but a matter of placing at the reader's disposal the form of information which he needs.

When we speak of an economics or financial booklet, it is a different matter, because our economics-financial booklet follows our daily information pages. It is simply a range of more complete pages, so to speak where there will be more space for analyses, interviews or presentation of documents, which we will do once a week, but it will in reality be a follow-up and an extension of our daily pages.

Mr. Fortier: You then continue to publish the La Presse newspaper daily, and once a week you offer your readers a specialized treatment, so to speak?

Mr. Bureau: That's true—in one field.

Mr. Fortier: After having heard you express in such an eloquent manner your former successes and those you have projected for the future, do you believe that a magazine or revue has a future in Quebec?

Mr. Bureau: Well, after having heard Mr. Péladeau this morning, I do not know whether I dare answer; he has much more experience than I have. In any case, I think that it probably depends on the formula. With a formula such as that of Télé-Presse, there was no problem, it could be started very easily, it answered the need for information on the world of theatre and on television programmes. The same with a booklet like Spec; our economics-financial booklet must not be, I believe, connected to the magazine formulas. Really, I do not think that they can be related to such a formula. Our booklet should really be presented as in a daily newspaper. Now, I would not exclude at all the possibility of adding booklets which resemble specialized magazines in the inside of our publications.

I will not unveil all our projects to you because I would not want our competitors to go into the same field as we, at the same time, but we have a whole lot of projects which relate to specialized magazines and which could be inserted in our daily newspaper in order to give, once again, to our readers, all the news, because we are a general information newspaper. Therefore, whether it be in the field of fashions, or in the field of cooking or in sports or in the financial field, a lot of things can be thought of which can be inserted and which could be easily preserved by the reader—easy to consult and which would also, on the marketing level, in the sense of publicity, be more easily saleable in the inside of a daily rather than separate from a daily.

Mr. Fortier: And that is where you at La Presse are headed for, from what you say?

Mr. Bureau: Yes, especially in that direction. It is one of the things which we foresee.

Mr. Fortier: In your brief you think highly of this separation which took place, a year ago, of the editorial service and the information services. Do you mean by this that at La Presse before a year ago these two services were one?

Mr. Bureau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Because we have always understood, besides we were told this here, that most of the editors and newspaper owners which came before the Committee to date have led us to believe that this complete separation always existed. How do you explain that at La Presse this did not exist up to a year ago?

Mr. Bureau: First, historically, I think that we must go a little further back than this to the daily newspapers which existed; the owner had a very large influence, a few years ago, both on the editorial content and on news content.

Mr. Fortier: This, not only in Quebec?

Mr. Bureau: No, but I know a little bit about this sector. Because of this, information and editorial were under his final control for all practical purposes.

When it was a matter of a small newspaper, well, there was no super-structure which divided the different services in such a completely separate manner as a newspaper of the size of La Presse. At La Presse, since it was a family enterprise which was managed as were most of the daily newspapers some years ago, at the head of the editorial service and of the news service there was an editor-in-chief who had authority in both editorial and news departments. Then the owner of the newspaper delegated his authority, in editorial matters and in news matters, to the same individual, who was editor-in-chief, because at that moment there were three large sections in newspapers: advertising and circulation sales, news and editorial. Alongside this, there were the relative administrative services and, of course, production. Today, it is much more divided, specialized, and this is what has brought us to separate, in a very clean-cut manner, the editorial from the news services, so that, from now on, at La Presse, the editorial service is answerable to the president and the news service depends upon my authority.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Dansereau, as for the editorial, do you have daily meetings with the members of your office?

Mr. Dansereau: There are none at present.

Mr. Fortier: There are none?

Mr. Dansereau: No.

Mr. Fortier: Let's take any editorial,—could you explain for us

Mr. Dansereau: Certainly.

Mr. Fortier: How for example is it that Mr. Pellerin writes an editorial, on Monday February 16 entitled "Just cause, dubious means, —"which deals with the postal conflict".

Mr. Dansereau: The Chief editorial writer meets with his editorial writers, each morning. They discuss the news happenings among themselves.

Mr. Fortier: Do these meetings take place at that level?

Mr. Dansereau: At that level.

Mr. Fortier: Fine.

Mr. Dansereau: Among themselves they determine what subjects they will handle on the following day. These subjects are then sent to me, and if I have any comments to make or opinions to give, I meet the chief editorial writer, then, and we discuss them together. This is how it works.

Mr. Fortier: Could you as president, impose the editorial, treatment of a subject on one of your editorial writers?

Mr. Dansereau: I could not impose it because he would not sign it.

Mr. Fortier: You say that he would not sign it. I would like to hear you further on this point. In the French press, editorials are signed, in the English press they are not—why?

Mr. Dansereau: Well, let us say it is perhaps a matter of mentality; the French or Latin mentality, likes to identify persons, while the Anglo-Saxon mentality prefers seeing the thought of an enterprise, of a group. Let us say that Latins have more hero-worship than Anglo-Saxons.

Mr. Fortier: Then, you could not impose a subject, but obviously you could suggest one?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And, does Mr. Bureau ever participate in these discussions?

Mr. Dansereau: No.

Mr. Fortier: In the same way as you, you do not participate in the meetings which could take place.

Mr. Dansereau: No, I do not participate, but I could go any time.

Mr. Fortier: In the news field, for example?

Mr. Dansereau: In the news field?—Yes surely I could participate, but it is Mr. Bureau who has the responsibility, I let him do it; but even if I do not participate, in fact, I could do so.

[Text]

The Chairman: I suggest that we adjourn for five minutes before you proceed, Mr. Fortier. I know that you have several more questions to ask La Presse, and I know that Senator Beaubien has a question to ask. I had hoped that we might complete our session with La Presse before adjourning, but I do not think that is possible, although I do not think we are going to detain you for much longer, Mr. Dansereau.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Dansereau wishes to elaborate on one or two of his points.

[Translation]

Mr. Dansereau: A little while ago, I mentioned that I could participate in the news; this is perhaps a bit too direct an affirmation. By participating in the news, I mean that it is in collaboration with Mr. Bureau, who has the responsibility for news policy. At that level, we have conferences but intervention does not take place in the news sector.

Mr. Fortier: As President could you intervene?

Mr. Dansereau: That's right.

Mr. Fortier: In your brief you mention at page 8 under the heading of guarantee of this freedom and honesty of information—and you reproduce certain classes of your collective labour agreement.—Clause 7.02 sub-paragraph (b) among others reads as follows:

(b) comments, analysis, chronicles and other reports, information copy excluded, must not be hostile to the Employer or his ideological orientation, nor be contrary to good morals and morality;

What do you mean by: 'must not be hostile to the Employer or to his ideological orientation'."

Mr. Bureau: I can perhaps give the beginnings of a reply, as long as Mr. Lafrance comments.

First, we distinguish commentaries, analyses and reports from straight news reports.

Mr. Fortier: Agreed.

Mr. Bureau: That's why, for example, we published, in La Presse, a lot of news even concerning problems which we had for a while with our own newsmen; in December, for example, there were some small problems with our trade-union of newsmen and La Presse published reports concerning news about these things—on this misunderstanding between the employer and his employees. However, it would not have been tolerated that we publish, in La Presse, under the pretext that it would have been commentaries, or a so-called analysis or report—documents which would have really been hostile to La Presse. This is the distinction we make between the two. We publish the news, but we say that it is not tolerated that we publish in La Presse documents made by our employees, and which would be hostile to us.

Mr. Fortier: And what if the trade union gives you a news release?

Mr. Bureau: If the release has news value it will surely be published, and this has been done all along during the troubles between the union and the company. If it were a matter of reports hostile to the employer, we believe that there would be other means, besides publishing them in our paper. If a newsman wishes to publish criticism hostile to La Presse he would be fully justified—there is the strike procedure which exists in our collective agreement.

Mr. Fortier: What happens in the case of a comment which is hostile to the employer?

Mr. Bureau: Concerning the news document, if it is hostile to the newspaper, he would have the right to apply for arbitration.

Mr. Fortier: Do you wish to add something, Mr. Lafrance?

Mr. Lafrance: I think this is complete but let us say in practice, it has never happened. It is a matter of pride for the newsmen; I believe that the newsmen of La Presse are proud of their newspaper. I do not see what interest they would have in their own newspaper if they were to criticize the company—I am thinking on the news level.

But, in practice, I do not remember its having happened at La Presse, or that analyses or commentaries had to be refused for this reason.

Mr. Fortier: For some years, you have had—you made reference to it in your last reply, Mr. Bureau—certain problems with certain unions, have you not? Could you speak to us about the role of trade unions in the treatment of news at La Presse?

Mr. Bureau: The union, in fact, is the newsmen's union.

Mr. Fortier: Trade unionism in general, first, and then, it can become more specific.

Mr. Bureau: When we speak of trade unionism in general, and when other unions of the company are mentioned, of the influence on the others. Obviously, if the shippers went on strike, it would definitely influence our role as informers, nevertheless it would be indirect.

The problems which we could have with newsmen, are the problems which all newspaper enterprises meet. It is a case, at certain times, of redefining standards, to study the projects of structure of all kinds or all plans for changes in a company, which is as old as ours, and carries with it necessarily reactions from certain employees. It is not the same as in a small company, or in a newly formed one, where there is perpetual change. Ours exists for several years and there had been things which had not been changed for a long time. From this fact, when there is a certain change to be made, it can carry certain reactions. What their role is in a newspaper's reorganization—I would prefer to ask the Director of Personnel who could supply you with much information on this subject, and even place before you a complete file on the influence which unionized newsmen because they belong to a union can exercise in the production of news.

Besides this is the meaning of our recommendation, at page 101 paragraph 4, of our brief which says:

"That your Committee should consider the opportunity of studying the role played by unions of journalists in the production of information and the effects of the regrouping of these unions within the large pluralist labour organizations."

What we wish to underline, here, before your Committee, is, first of all, the problem of common management which has been talked about for sometime, particularly in France, and more recently in the United States, and Canada also. The problem of common management is a problem which has already been faced without calling it by this name, in a company like La Presse where professional unionism is very active.

We have already within our framework in the area of news production, a form of cooperation between the unionized newsmen, and the management of news services.

The second thing which we wished to underline in this recommendation, is the potential danger in this arrangement because

I understand that your Committee is examining this area in connection with the present mass media to see what the danger this concentration poses. We hope to be able to inform you of our experience.

However, this is not all. There are perhaps other dangers which we would like you to consider: what would happen if the news-men's unions, affiliated to the large centralized union organizations, exercised more influence than they do, for example, in the news services? What could happen, from the point of view of the quality of news? I believe these two points strengthen our argument.

Now, I would like to ask Mr. Gauthier, Director of Personnel, to comment on how the problem exists at our newspaper and how it exists elsewhere.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier, Director of Personnel and Labour Relations: Mr. Chairman, first of all, the trade union role in the production of information at La Presse has to be defined.

Let us point out first a fact which is important: union certification is obviously given to the union, which obliges the two parties to negotiate a collective work agreement.

Secondly, there is the collective agreement itself, and this basic collective agreement covers journalists, in collective agreements in North America. The provisions we find in them are not those which cover only hours of work, salaries and things we usually find in collective agreements; we can find many other items in them. There are several chapters in the provisions on the advantages covering professional operators. They indicate and establish clearly that the union plays a very big role at all stages of a journalist's professional life, with respect to his career with La Presse. The union is present, at the start, when he is hired; it is present at promotion time; it must participate, to some extent, in the drawing up of posters, subject to holding back the facts given. It participates in a host of other things in the collective agreement, which are mentioned in the document which we are filing, with your permission, Mr. Chairman, to show the role of unions among journalists at La Presse.

It is therefore present at the time of hiring, at promotion time and it is also present when trades are discussed at La Presse. For example, there is a series of clauses, which I am not going to read, which concern details concerning advertising and so on. Let us say that our collective agreement is a rather unique one in this sense.

There is another point that should be mentioned. The provisions concerning the structure within the information service—the new structure which was drawn up scarcely a year ago—had the effect of de-centralizing responsibilities, while still ensuring integrated management. I will explain: we set up divisions, which correspond to areas of interest, from the news standpoint; we also set up sections, for example, on miscellaneous facts, urban affairs, etc., we decentralized the information service but obviously there was integrated management. So, obviously, this structure permits the union to play a very big role, because the cadres are unionized, except for the director of information and his immediate assistants. All division chiefs and section heads, are unionized and, being unionized, can and actually do, perform union duties, and it could happen, that the head of a section, or of a division, is president of the union. As a matter of fact, I notice that we have a division head who is president of the Montreal Union.

The fact that the cadres—some of the members of the cadre—are unionized, and this almost total membership indicates the role that unions can play in the production of information at La Presse.

Another point, the group of journalists at La Presse constitutes a section of a union—a union which includes several other employees, of other Montreal newspapers, for example, Le Devoir, La Patrie, Montréal-Matin, etc. which are unionized. A large part of our journalists are members of professional journalists, unions which also include journalists from other newspapers.

Obviously, the unions exist primarily with a view to establishing their collective bargaining policy, to establish models of collective agreements and to establish bargaining strategy.

The Montreal Journalists' Union is also affiliated with a professional federation which brings people of the same sector together, namely printing. In certain federations, you are going to find not only Montreal journalists but those throughout the Province of Quebec, in all the firms that have been unionized. In the document that we are going to file, you will find a complete list of all the unions that are members of that federation.

The second aspect, the Journalists Union is a member of a professional union which has as its main reason for existence the establishment of policies from the professional standpoint. For example, the collective agreement standpoint, it is to ensure the defence of the professional interests of a group of people who practise the same trade. The Journalists Union is also affiliated with the Central Council of a group whose union is affiliated with the C.N.T.U. whose president is Mr. Michel Chartrand. Therefore, the Journalists Union is affiliated with the Montreal Central Council and we are going to find there not only journalists but also other workers, a group of workers from a number of businesses.

What is the Central Council? It is an association of unions affiliated with the C.N.T.U., but affiliated unions, of very different sectors. It is compulsory for Montreal journalists unions.

When our people are affiliated with unions, all national unions which include some hundred thousand members, or which include some fifteen federations, some twenty central councils, it is a national union movement, and from that moment on, journalists are also members of the C.N.T.U., namely, of the National Confederation of Unions.

If we examine union constitutions, if we first examine the constitution of Montreal journalists unions, that of the Central Council, that of the Printers Federation, that of the Confederation of National Unions, we are going to be able to establish clearly the link between the various organizations. For example, in the Confederation of National Unions, there is a declaration of principles. The Montreal Central Council has certain powers; the Federation also has certain powers. All these organizations are endowed with a certain number of powers in the union field, therefore, in their policy, with certain nuances with respect to each organization. But from that moment on, our journalists are members of all those organizations.

Therefore, I think that, consequently, there are two very definite roles: the unionized journalists, through the collective agreement, and their union apparatus at La Presse play a role in the production of information because the unionized bodies, the Montreal section of the Journalists Union suggests to its members. The union is going to say: "It is your obligation to be a member of the Journalists Union". Other members of the unions would be subject to the constitution. There is a conditional matter—they must obey the directives from the union. Such clauses could be set up, which would establish that link.

Therefore, there is the union apparatus in La Presse; there is the union apparatus generally which includes all workers and journalists obviously participate, through their union apparatus, in the production of information at La Presse.

Now, we know all that in any union environment, like among us for instance—at the management level, we question the nature, the form that that is going to take in the future. Are we headed towards a new type of professional organization? We are asking ourselves questions, also, at the management level, as at the union level. There are questions, there is uncertainty on that side.

A collective agreement guarantees, through its provisions, freedom of information. But to what point can we count on going in that respect? Must the collective agreement be the document which will always solve these problems, or is there not a joint effort, which should be undertaken in order to rethink the professional organization?

It is certain that the owners and their representatives have responsibilities. It is certain that journalists also have responsibilities. I understand that there is a community of interests, and both parties must, in the collective agreement that we are attempting to develop, take into account the rights and obligations of both. There are some dangers that are apparent to everyone, some dangers which your Committee ought perhaps to examine from the standpoint of the trade union constitutions.

The fact still remains that the purpose of our conventions is to invite participation and, in La Presse, on account of the machinery we have, the role of the journalists and the affiliation, there are grounds for forging ahead with the study and seeing how the journalists will be called upon to relearn their parts in the future.

Mr. Fortier: You have filed a copy of the document, your collective agreement?

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, and of the union conditions and a mass of other relevant documents.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent has this new policy, which has just been described by Mr. Gauthier, been imposed on you by the journalists, and to what extent is it the outcome of a formula conceived by you and your colleagues?

Mr. Bureau: Considering that it is my responsibility in a rather indirect way, I shall answer your question, if you like.

The aspects Mr. Gauthier has just explained to you has been the contribution of the journalists to the making of the newspaper. But how are they going to fit in with the norms of a collective agreement—that is to say, what goes on the management side and what goes on the trade union side? It is always difficult to recall the originator of such and such a word or such and such a sentence, or of a particular paragraph. It is, therefore, the outcome of a general agreement. However, what we want to emphasize is—not that we consider the newspapers generally to be controlled by syndicates of journalists and union combines to contradict those who shall have authority over the journalists themselves—to what extent can these combines impose directives on newspaper employees, which we would be obliged to respect as part of certain collective agreements, and to what extent can that affect the public—some honest and objective information which is going to tell how the problem stood, in La Presse, and we invite you to reflect further with respect to the structures with other newspapers.

Mr. Fortier: The problem of jurisdiction regarding these numerous employees engaged in the trades, as you were saying, Mr. Dansereau, is being changed by the technological developments. Is that creating a problem for you?

Mr. Bureau: That is creating an overall problem for us.

Mr. Fortier: How are you tackling it?

Mr. Bureau: Over the past 10 years, there have been considerable technological changes in the production of a daily newspaper and in the production of printed matter, and the syndical structures of the large trade unions are absolutely sealed off, each by itself, and in certain instances. There has even been a splitting up of these large union combines so as to make certain areas more sensitive—areas which give rise to the following problem: when a new machine arrives, since the same machine can be used by the photo-engravers, the employees in typography and the employees in the type-setting workshops, who would have jurisdiction over that apparatus? We have reached a point where we are wondering whether we should acquire this equipment and, in the last bargaining session, we had to agree that if we wanted those machines—we didn't have any but we knew they existed—and if we did buy them, a request would be made for them to be altered, especially for us, so that a particular category of employees could work on them, and no other. When this point has been reached, it is as well to stop there. In conclusion, we suggest that your Committee study this problem more thoroughly. We have produced a file in which the experience of La Presse is recounted for you and which we shall place at your disposal.

Mr. Fortier: It isn't the same one?

Mr. Bureau: It is another file.

Mr. Fortier: It would be of interest to the members of the Committee.

Mr. Bureau: It examines the typography employees, the typesetting services, the photo-engravers, the pressmen, the computers—you are going to see, when we buy a new machine, just how difficult a problem we have to know where we are going to set it up.

In addition to that, we are thinking of installing some computers in our firm, so each branch of the union—and there are 11 of them in our firm—and each of the branches wants to have jurisdiction over the part of the work to be done by the computer and which that branch used to do before, and when you do a job, and face the risks of 11 full-time union representatives, in the aspect consigned to our computer, for what is a task which may perhaps last only a quarter of an hour or half an hour—well, up to today, we have managed to find compromise formulas. But we regard the approach of the forthcoming negotiations with some degree of apprehension, because we are wondering whether the international organizations are going to be capable of envisaging the necessary technological changes.

Mr. Bureau: We're wondering whether we want to survive or progress, and whether they are going to make the efforts that we ourselves are making at the investment level and at the research level, whether they, for their part, are going to make those efforts so as to render their jurisdiction more flexible, and perhaps even so as to consider an alliance of large trade associations—between the typographers and perhaps the photo-engravers, or between the photo-engravers and other groups—so that really we will not be obliged to have two individuals to do the same work. Just one of the two, say, would be enough—the one with the most ability.

Mr. Fortier: The International Typographical Union presented us with a brief last week, which you have perhaps read, telling us that, in Colorado Springs, they were, as a matter of fact, attempting to train not only the Union members, but also the newspaper proprietors.

Mr. Bureau: They are doing so, and we have to give them credit in that respect. The large international unions, in particular, are doing excellent work in training the personnel of our companies at the present time, and are helping us considerably from that standpoint. We ourselves are doing a fairly substantial amount of training work. For instance, last year, four hundred out of our twelve hundred employees followed training courses. That is quite a significant achievement by way of retraining. All the same, the fact remains that, outside of that work, what they are doing in Colorado Springs is training people who are going to practise the trade of typographer, whereas perhaps it should be the photo-engravers that are invited to those things, and the typographers themselves should allow the photo-engravers to do a part of their work—and that is where the problem arises, and that is why we have prepared a file which we mean to hand over to you so that you may study it.

Mr. Fortier: We are going to leave the unions, and we are going to drop the subject of trade unions for the time being.

I have just two or three more questions. On page 5 of your brief, in the righthand column, under the heading "The Respect of the Community's Conscience," you say: "La Presse respects its readers, individually and collectively. This respect, it expresses through the implementation of professional standards of journalism, by mentioning the sources of its information..." That is one of the policies of "La Presse", is it not, to indicate the source of your news material?

Mr. Bureau: Perhaps Mr. Lafrance could give a more complete answer.

Mr. Lafrance: Yes. That means, for instance, that the despatches with originate with our press services are presented as such. The press releases are presented as such. We say, for example, that a particular press release comes to us from a particular organization; I think it is a way of informing the reader so he knows what the position is. For example, the reader can form an opinion by seeing that it is not a news item that comes directly from one of our reporters, for instance.

Mr. Fortier: If it is a news item or article that comes to you directly from one of your reporters, do you give his name?

Mr. Lafrance: If the information comes to us from one of our reporters, yes. As a general rule, news articles written by our reporters are signed, provided, of course, that the material shows some trace of originality. That is to say, for instance, if a journalist does nothing more than report someone's comments, and if he makes no personal contribution to the article, then, it is not necessary for him to put his signature to it. It is evident that it is work done by a journalist and that it is not, for example, a press release or a despatch from a press agency.

Mr. Fortier: I have here—taken from "La Presse" for Monday, February 16, at a time when André Bureau was on leave, as he said just now—an article headed by a full-page headline to the effect that the letters written to Ross GilPatrick had destroyed Jackie's image.

It is an article which commences on the front page and is afterwards continued on page 6, and I confess to you that no English-language newspaper contained such a wealth of information as I read in that article. It was a real scoop, in my opinion, and I have been looking since the 16th, but I have not come across it again in any other newspaper, either in French or in English.

Mr. Bureau: That was not a surprise to you, coming from "La Presse".

Mr. Fortier: That story was a scoop—no. But to see that the article was not ascribed to anyone that, did surprise me.

Mr. Lafrance: That is the early edition, and unfortunately the author's signature has been left out.

Mr. Fortier: Is it a mistake?

Mr. Lafrance: Somewhere along the way, we did ascribe that story to the author. It is an article by Louis Winitzer, our New York correspondent.

Mr. Fortier: Is it an original article by your New York correspondent?

Mr. Lafrance: Yes, and has not been refuted until now.

Mr. Fortier: No, no.

Mr. Bureau: If I may say something strictly on the technical side: the titles are usually done on one linotype machine and the body on another. It can even happen that the signature is done on a third machine, which explains why we are sometimes forced to make corrections.

Mr. Fortier: I find that very curious because, as I told you, at first, it's an article that caught my attention.

[Text]

The Chairman: I wanted to ask a somewhat similar question and I shall put it to Mr. Lafrance. Did you see the column which Ron Haggart wrote in The Telegram last Friday? I would like to draw it to your attention and have you comment on it. The column is entitled "When Peanuts goes bicultural". It says:

In Montreal, the comic strip Peanuts runs in The Gazette and also in La Presse, which undertakes to do the French translation itself, often with interesting results. Earlier this month, for example, Gazette readers (as well as Telegram readers in Toronto) were offered this little joke about Lincoln's birthday:

There is an English version of Peanuts and you can look at it with me. "Do you want to hear my report on Abraham Lincoln?" The French version is: "Veux-tu écouter ma composition sur Maurice Duplessis?"

Similarly, on another panel, which is I gather within the last year and it starts off: "You've been telling everyone that I lied to my teacher haven't you? Don't you know that psychologists say children don't always know that they're lying? To an innocent child like me, if the lie works, it isn't a lie! What do you think of that?" He screams out, "George Washington!!" In the version of La Presse he screams out, "Mackenzie King!"

Mr. Bureau: I think we should always leave it in French myself.

Mr. Lafrance: It is a matter of adaptation and translation. It is a problem that the translator thought that the joke would be better with Duplessis and that it would ring a bell.

The Chairman: Are those translations checked with the cartoonist in question?

Mr. Lafrance: No.

The Chairman: Not at all? Do you translate all comic strips you get, or many of them?

Mr. Lafrance: About half of our comic strips are...

The Chairman: French? Half are English translated?

Mr. Lafrance: Yes.

The Chairman: I wonder if I could subscribe to La Presse and start to read them.

Mr. Bureau: You will have to pay a very high sum because of postal rates.

Senator Prowse: I think I have laughed harder at Peanuts today than I ever have.

Mr. Fortier: Whose name shall the Montreal Gazette substitute?

The Chairman: I told one of the Senators at noon, who shall remain nameless, that I was going to ask this question. He thought it was a pretty good idea and that the English papers should do the same thing. It is an interesting question.

Could I just put one other question to Mr. Dansereau since, I think, you are in a position to know. You are a director of CP, are you not?

Mr. Dansereau: I am one now.

The Chairman: The question that I wish to ask you is: Did you hear Mr. Pélodeau's contention today?

Mr. Dansereau: I heard about it.

The Chairman: Would that be true—that it would have cost $136,000 in 1964?

Mr. Dansereau: It could be true, yes, but this is abolished now.

The Chairman: He made that clear. There is no entry now at all?

Mr. Dansereau: No.

The Chairman: Anybody could start a newspaper and get the service anywhere?

Mr. Fortier: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman. Was it abolished?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Was it abolished because of the incident at Le Journal de Montréal or...

Mr. Dansereau: No, I don't think so.

Mr. Fortier: To your knowledge, Mr. Dansereau?

Mr. Dansereau: It's mainly to promote the admission of others, because of the increase.

Mr. Fortier: To your knowledge, have similar problems been encountered by any English newspapers?

Mr. Dansereau: Yes, in the West, in British Columbia; I don't know which one.

Mr. Fortier: You're not talking about the "Vancouver Times", because...

Mr. Dansereau: No, in Nelson, in that area.

Mr. Bureau: It would perhaps, however, be interesting to note that the by-laws of the Canadian Press don't provide for entrance fees for some papers that there were at the beginning; they are small papers. They do provide, however, for a surtax to be paid by the bigger ones, so that small papers in the same city can get Canadian Press, and that's how it is that we pay so that "Le Devoir" can get Canadian Press and Le Soleil pays so that "L'Action" can receive the Canadian Press.

[Text]

The Chairman: Mr. Dansereau, would you comment on your own personal opinion of the way in which Quebec events are covered by the press and the rest of Canada? I am sure that you are familiar with the dailies in the rest of the country.

Mr. Dansereau: I think that Mr. Lafrance might be able to answer that better than I could.

Mr. Lafrance: I think that La Presse gives a pretty good coverage.

The Chairman: I am asking you to comment on the coverage in the rest of the country and of what is happening in Quebec.

Mr. Lafrance: Well, for me it is a question that I do not like to answer precisely, because I know many of the correspondents of the Canadian papers from other provinces, as well as in Montreal and Quebec City. I would say that the largest ones are trying, especially during the last few years, to give better coverage than they did before, but I think that sometimes they are more interested in coverage of the explosion of violence than covering what we do in Quebec and about which they could inform their readers.

The Chairman: Let me put the question which you began to answer. La Presse has how many correspondents in Ottawa in the Press Gallery?

Mr. Lafrance: Three, but on major events we reinforce our staff in Ottawa. We send correspondents from our Quebec office or from our Montreal news room.

The Chairman: How many correspondents do you have in the rest of Canada, that is, outside of Quebec and Ottawa?

Mr. Lafrance: We do not have correspondents outside our Ottawa bureau, but we cover through CP and through roving reporters when there are events that we think we should cover more than through CP service.

The Chairman: For example, this afternoon I believe is the opening of the Legislature in Toronto. Would you have anyone covering that or just CP?

Mr. Lafrance: Just CP.

Mr. Fortier: They are opening the Legislature in Quebec City as well.

The Chairman: I was going to come to that. I think it is likely that the three Toronto newspapers will have correspondents covering the opening of the Legislature in Quebec. I think we could be almost certain from the comments which have been made here at our hearings from the publishers of those newspapers. Do you not think that you could provide a better service to your readers if, for example, you had someone covering the opening of the Legislature in Toronto? Let's put the question another way, are you perfectly satisfied that CP is filling your needs?

Mr. Lafrance: Let's say that we hope that in a few years we will have correspondents across Canada. We are studying now the possibility of opening an office in Toronto. If there would be an important debate at Queen's Park we would send somebody, but this year we are precisely studying what we can do to better our Canadian coverage and, as I said, this idea of opening a bureau in Toronto is considered.

The Chairman: I only have one other question. I will ask it and then turn to the Senators. Mr. Dansereau, the first point in your brief is that you say that La Presse is dedicated, among other things, to "moral progress". What is moral progress? If you said moral and economic progress I could understand that, but what exactly is moral progress in the Montreal area?

Mr. Bureau: We have had in La Presse for 80 years some people saying that our founder, Mr. Berthiaume, was saying that La Presse was made up of Catholic groups. We feel that we have a broader view about these subjects, such as religion and the like. We felt that "moral" was more adequate right now than "Catholic".

[Translation]

Mr. Dansereau: If I may continue in French...

[Text]

The Chairman: Yes, go ahead.

[Translation]

Mr. Dansereau: Because I think that it takes a bit of religious subtlety. When they say that we have devoted ourselves to moral development or the development of society in the Metropolitan region of Montreal, we consider that one of the factors in the normal development of a society is the moral conditions prevailing in it. That's why we are interested in the moral aspect of what happens in our society and why we think that we are devoted to this moral development.

[Text]

The Chairman: Yes. But how do you relate that to the so-called permissive morality that is becoming more in vogue in Toronto, Montreal and elsewhere?

[Translation]

Mr. Dansereau: I would say that we are trying to live in our century, to make a contribution to our readers that is morally enriching, just as it can be enriching from the points of view of economic and financial information. We do not side with the Catholic Church against the atheists or anything like that. We respect the beliefs of our readers in the Montreal metropolitan region and we try to give them information from that point of view.

[Text]

The Chairman: Do you take an attitude towards drugs, for example?

Mr. Bureau: Personally?

The Chairman: Does La Presse?

[Translation]

Mr. Dansereau: La Presse has not had to speak out at this time as did some Toronto papers after analyses or studies, recently by their journalists from the point of view of information.

I don't think we have had a chance to do that until today, from that point of view. Now, we have informed our readers about what might be experienced in that area, the dangers that were involved, and the effects it involved for society—and all this without any crusade against the use of drugs or anything like that. We limited ourselves to adequately informing our readers of the possible dangers. Is that right, Mr. Lafrance?

Mr. Lafrance: Yes. I would quite simply add that besides current information, we made an investigation, about a year ago, of the drug problem in Montreal. We did a series on the drug problem in the schools.

[Text]

The Chairman: Senator Beaubien had a question.

[Translation]

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Dansereau, you mentioned the increases we've recently had in postal rates, here and in the United States. Are you able to compare the two? Are the rates higher here than in the United States?

Mr. Bureau: Oh, yes! for second class mail.

Senator Beaubien: A lot?

Mr. Bureau: A lot higher.

Senator Beaubien: It seems to me that would be worth while having.

Mr. Bureau: I can send you a copy. When the Postmaster General announced his plan to raise postal rates for second class mail, the company that has most of the dailies in Quebec, as a matter of fact 11 of the 14 dailies in Quebec, appeared before him and put forward a number of arguments, and we mentioned to him, among other things, that in the United States, in the period, I think, of a year, they raised the postal rate for second class mail by a cent a pound.

Senator Beaubien: You say it's an increase; What was it?

Mr. Bureau: They went from three to five cents in three years. We went to five cents the first year and then there were two more increases after that. So that at the present time (I wouldn't want to quote figures but we've had two successive increase in the space of fourteen months and since that time) it puts us well ahead of the United States from that point of view.

Senator Beaubien: Now, newspapers are second class in the United States, and here?

Mr. Bureau: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: Which compares with...

Mr. Bureau: Yes, now what we'd like to point out is not that we don't want to pay our part of the transportation costs, but that we dailies pay 81 per cent of what the Postmaster General has estimated to be the cost of transporting newspapers, while the Reader's Digest, Time and other magazines of that kind pay 28, 29 and 30 per cent and we do not consider that to be justified. We think it's truly discriminatory. It even discriminates against other Canadian magazines, which also pay 39 per cent, while we pay 81 per cent. So we say, if the postal service considers that it should treat everybody equitably, well then, let us pay our share of the costs like everybody else. But it should be considered that we dailies provide continuous work; not on peak days, once a week or once a month, but continuous work. In commercial business, you know what it means to have a cushion production; it makes it possible to spread costs. When the Post Office Department says that it gives the dailies very large subsidies, we would be very interested in being able to examine such figures so as to see just how much we get out of the subsidies he mentions.

[Text]

The Chairman: Supplementary, Mr. Fortier?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: If we accept your figures, Mr. Bureau, we can understand that the government is subsidizing up to 19 per cent of that portion of your paper that is distributed by mail. Is that right?

Mr. Bureau: Yes, if you take the Department's figures.

Mr. Fortier: 81 per cent compared to 31 per cent?

Mr. Bureau: That's right, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Do you recommend that periodicals and magazines as well as dailies should themselves pay the actual cost of their mailings? Should the government continue to subsidize mailings equally?

Mr. Bureau: The Quebec dailies have studied the document prepared by a Toronto research company for the Post Office Department on reorganization of the Post Office Department, and we saw what the plans of the Department were concerning the distribution of the costs of second class mail. It's a fairly fantastic rate hike to look forward to. We were surprised just the same to see that in the Post Office Department's plans there was no change in this distribution between daily papers and magazines or periodicals. Nowhere in that document do we see any justification for maintaining that division, absolutely different and out of proportion, of costs between the two groups of publications. For our part, at La Presse, we are not terribly affected because our business is big enough for us to be able to provide home delivery service in several parts of the province.

Mr. Fortier: How many subscribers have you lost?

Mr. Bureau: We have the figures here; I can give them to you—we have lost four thousand mail subscribers.

Mr. Fortier: Out of how many?

Mr. Bureau: Out of six thousand five hundred.

Mr. Fortier: You have lost two thirds of your subscribers?

Mr. Bureau: Yes. Of course, that's not many, compared to our considerable circulation, but if we look at some other newspapers, it's much more dangerous. You have papers that have lost percentages of 32 and 33 per cent like us, and you have others that have lost from 50 to 60 per cent of their mail circulation. When we mention smaller papers, it can be much more dangerous. For example, Le Soleil has lost 75.3 per cent of its mail circulation and they had a mail circulation of 30,000. It's the beginning of a pretty big hole in the circulation when such a large number of readers are deprived of their newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Excuse me, I must interrupt. I'm returning to my question: should the government subsidize the mailing of dailies and periodicals?

Mr. Bureau: I don't think that's the formula. The postal service is a national service and I don't think we can go back on that; we should consider that all the people in every corner of the country should be given the chance to communicate and that is probably one of the responsibilities of the central government. There's no doubt about it. But at what price? That's when the bargaining starts; whether we should carry 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the costs. You know we'd be quite ready to pay a hundred per cent if the government had a more liberal attitude with respect to some of its advertising expenditures and some newspapers. I'm not talking about La Presse, where we're not so hard hit by the hike in postal rates; I'm talking about smaller papers, and since I'm the secretary of the Association of Quebec dailies, I know of a lot of problems like that. I'm thinking of some newspapers that don't get any government advertising, and I think that we ourselves aren't getting the share we should get, when you consider the millions spent with the CBC for advertising by enterprises connected with the federal government. If we had those millions distributed among all the newspapers, we might perhaps be able to pay the whole tab for postal service. That's the time perhaps when we should have the negotiations we'd like to have with the Post Office Department—with the federal government.

Mr. Fortier: Could you comment on your answer, i.e. whether you think this competition you're getting from the CBC in terms of government advertising is unfair?

Mr. Bureau: Well, I prefer the term used by my president a little while ago, an imbalance among the different media. I really think a recommendation should seriously be made to the government and that that would help quite a bit in avoiding problems like the ones we're having with finances; in any case it's the people who end up paying.

Mr. Fortier: If the CBC...

[Text]

The Chairman: I do not want to interrupt this interesting discussion, but I think the point has been made earlier, in the brief. It is ten minutes to five and we have another brief to receive. I know that Senator Prowse has some questions for this witness, so I will ask him to proceed.

Senator Prowse: The first question I would like to ask is in connection with this statement:

In July 1967, Trans-Canada Corporation Fund bought all the shares of La Presse with the assent of the Quebec Legislature.

What is the significance of that statement?

[Translation]

Mr. Bureau: With your permission I'll speak in French. .

The Chairman: Yes, of course.

Mr. Bureau: La Presse had to get approval of the sale of its shares through action by the provincial government in order to settle a problem that arose from the wills of the former owners of La Presse which made it impossible to sell La Presse without government approval. It's because of the wills of the former owners of La Presse that the new owners had to ask for governmental approval to buy La Presse. Does that answer your question?

[Text]

Senator Prowse: That is what I wondered, and that also answers my second question. When that was done all subsequent sales were not of any concern...

Mr. Bureau: They have to approve.

Senator Prowse: This was just to set aside the provisions of a will?

Mr. Bureau: No, we still have to ask permission of the Government.

Senator Prowse: On reading this through, and not knowing what it was, I thought there was some reason why you had to get consent to sell, and then I saw that, paragraph 5 on page 2, of the Gelco Enterprises Ltd. brief states:

In February 1968, Gelco and Gesca Limitée, its wholly-owned subsidiary, purchased from Trans-Canada Corporation Fund all the preferred shares and common shares respectively of Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée and La Presse held by Trans-Canada Corporation Fund.

Mr. Desmarais: May Mr. Deschênes answer that, Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. Deschênes: It so happens that I have with me here the text of the act which was approved in 1967. There are two sections of that act that are of concern in respect of this matter. Section 2 is the one that provides for the approval of the transaction in 1967 when Trans-Canada Corporation Fund actually bought the shares from the estate. It was provided at the time—and I am quoting from section 2:

Notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 of the act 9-10 Elizabeth II, Chapter 175, the trustees of the will and of the fiduciary gift are authorized to sell to Trans-Canada Corporation Fund all the common and preferred shares of the company, provided that the effective control...

Those words "effective control" are the important words.

...of Trans-Canada Corporation Fund has not changed between the first of May 1967 and the date on which the said sale is completed.

Then we move over to the next section, which is the one that concerns your question, Senator Prowse. Section 3 provides:

After the sale authorized by the above section 2, no sale, assignment, transfer or pledge:

(a) of rights or of any number of shares of any company, the object or result of which would be to change the control of La Compagnie de Publication de La Presse, Limitée; or

(b) of a substantial part of the assets of the company, except radio station C.K.A.C. and the newspaper La Patrie, may be validly made or agreed to, except with the authorization of the Legislature.

So, the important point in these two sections is that at first the Legislature said it wanted to be sure that when this transaction to Trans-Canada Corporation Fund was completed, the effective control—to use the words of the act—of Trans-Canada Corporation Fund would be the same as it was then. The Legislature then said that any further sale has to be approved if it has the result of changing the control of La Compagnie de Publication de La Presse, Limitée.

What actually happened, in fact, is that in 1968, Trans-Canada Corporation Fund, which was controlled at the time of the first sale by Mr. Paul Desmarais—and that evidence was adduced and made before the committee of the Legislature—sold the shares of La Presse to Gelco and Gesca, Gesca being a wholly-owned subsidiary of Gelco. Gelco bought the preferred shares, and Gesca bought the common shares. Those two companies were completely under the effective control of Mr. Desmarais. So, effective control did not change during the transaction. The corporate facade was changed, but the effective control was not changed.

Perhaps I might be allowed to say one word on this. The whole matter was examined at the time of the transaction, and a legal opinion was obtained—not from me, incidentally—which was to the effect that the transaction fell within all four corners of the provisions of the Act. When this question was raised before a committee of the provincial Legislature about six or seven months ago, we were appearing at the time before those members who had actually voted for this very act in 1967. Perhaps I might be allowed to quote four or five lines from the debates which contain an opinion which was put forward at that time by no one else but the Honourable Jean Lesage. I am quoting from the debates of June 11, 1969, page 2887, where Mr. Lesage confirms what I am telling this Committee in these words—he was addressing himself to me, and he said:

[Translation]

(Mr. Deschênes): "The explanation you have just given us proves, as you said, that the letter and spirit of section 3 were observed. I took part in the debate at the time of the study of this bill which permitted the sale of La Presse to Mr. Desmarais's interests. The intention was that Mr. Desmarais cannot give up control, particularly of the newspaper La Presse, without coming before the Legislature again. It's clear that he has such control. In whatever way he has it, the intention of the law was that he cannot give up control. He has kept it and still has it."

[Text]

So, the Legislature was satisfied that the Act had been complied with.

Senator Prowse: So the situation is that the actual sales here were considered as house-keeping arrangements by Mr. Desmarais?

Mr. Deschênes: Yes, indeed, sir.

Senator Prowse: If Gelco now decides to sell the shares to someone else, you would have to go back to the Legislature for approval?

Mr. Deschênes: Yes.

Senator Prowse: In other words, the effective ownership, or the beneficial ownership, of La Presse cannot be changed without the consent of the Legislature?

Mr. Deschênes: That is right.

Senator Prowse: Thank you very much. The next question I want to ask was asked earlier, and Mr. Desmarais felt that it should be answered by someone else, and perhaps it should be answered by you. What particular changes resulted in the management and operation of La Presse as a result of the acquisition of its beneficial ownership by Mr. Desmarais, or the various companies with which he is associated?

[Translation]

Mr. Bureau: This transaction had several effects and they should be described. I'm going to try to do so briefly. I was not familiar with the situation as it existed before, but the one they brought about is the one that exists now. Until Mr. Desmarais became president of La Presse, there was a president who was not a full-time president; Mr. Chartré, who is now Chairman of the Board of Directors, had other duties, and also looked after La Presse. To assist him there was a Vice-President who looked after advertising sales, newspaper sales and promotion, and besides him there was the Editor-in-chief. They were, in turn, Mr. Jean-Louis Gagnon and Mr. Gérard Pelletier. The years rolled by after that, from 1960 to 1967; there were some strikes at La Presse with some pretty big and resounding work stoppages. When La Presse was bought, there was a complete change in the management of La Presse, and in the structures and personalities. We now have a truly full-time president, Mr. Dansereau, who is with us, and who has experience, as you have seen, in ownership, as the owner of a daily in Three Rivers. We have the position of executive vice-president, occupied by Mr. Parisien (which was held by myself until he came to La Presse), and there is a division of responsibilities between those two positions. So there is an almost complete reorganization of structures.

On page 4 of our brief, you have the different divisions coming under the president, editorial, advisory and public communications. The other divisions come under my position. We have a better structural organization.

There were also some substantial changes in the management of those divisions. At the present time, all the division managers, except one, are new managers since the purchase of the newspaper by Mr. Parisien and Mr. Desmarais.

In each of these divisions, a study was made of its operation, the incumbent staff, the number of persons there should be, and then of the objectives to be attained. We reorganized most of the divisions; we haven't finished the job, but we have reorganized most of the divisions, so as to attain our objectives, which were pretty vague, before. There wasn't even a budget before, at La Presse. There was the year-end balance sheet, and that is what we went by for the following year.

We had to make an administrative reorganization from that point of view. There was no adequate personnel policy, or editorial policy, or information policy so we had to make one, to enact one, to draw one up. Until then, decisions were made at the level of the president or vice-president. Today, decisions are made, of course, at that level, but most decisions concerning management are made collectively, with all the division managers sitting together with the president, vice-president and executive vice-president. Such was the internal reorganization.

As for financing, we now have means of financing that we didn't have before, that La Presse didn't have—and at one time we even contemplated selling the paper, because there was a lack of funds.

Today, we have the advantage of easier financing, and I think that's essential to the survival of a business.

I'm stressing personnel a bit because I was present at one of the first meetings of your Committee, and this remark was made by another editor of a Montreal daily, about the treatment to which La Presse was subjecting its staff. I must point out that the La Presse firm, as soon as it was bought by Mr. Parisien and Mr. Desmarais, went about setting up a group program for its employees with life insurance and a pension fund, which had never before existed at La Presse, I think that in personnel, organization and financing, we have advantages that even those who were there at that time didn't have and that we have now, thanks to that transaction. Conditions were perhaps such, previously, that they couldn't have them with the former owners. I don't want to discredit them in any way because I don't know what situation they were in. However, we have conditions that didn't exist at that time.

The personnel manager may perhaps have some things to add on that subject.

Mr. Gauthier: I could add one important thing about the staff. I knew the staff of La Presse well before I became personnel manager.

Before, under the former administration, there was deep anxiety among the employees of La Presse about their job security, their future, because they felt that they were in an enterprise that required a rejuvenation of staff, equipment, and so on. So there was plenty of anxiety. With the arrival of a new administration, there was a period of adjustment. However, this period of adjustment quickly passed. A collective agreement was signed, without a strike. A whole group welfare program was set up, that I'd like to table, with the Chairman's permission, that we are submitting in its entirety, and which has the effect of stabilizing all the basic fringe benefits. I don't want to enter into the details, of the pension fund, which has enabled us to settle a very big problem. There was a labor surplus at La Presse, because of poor organization on several levels, and poor equipment because of technical and technological change. Therefore, there was a labour surplus, and we were able to settle this problem in a unique way, by early retirement, and some persons 55 years and over received eight times as much as they would have received under the former pension plan, if they had remained with La Presse until the age of 65. So that shows the scope of the pension fund.

With the co-operation of both governments, there were training and refresher programs for the staff. These programs had the effect of bringing greater job security.

Today, the employees of La Presse are happier that they work in that kind of climate, because they are dealing with a firm that has dynamic management, which we think necessary to cope with the new technical and technological challenges. That's the kind of contribution the firm wants to make in personnel matters.

Senator Prowse: Was there any injection of new capital, or was it just that there was now the access to credit which you did not have before?

[Translation]

Mr. Bureau: There was, in fact, been a very substantial injection of capital for some years. I don't have the figures here to show the large transfers dealing with equipment, which has expanded, and for three years we have had projects in which everyone is helping, and we are counting on the present owners for their financing.

The Chairman: Thank you Mr. Bureau. I would like to turn now to the next group of witnesses. The final brief we are going to receive this afternoon is from Les Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée. The President of the organization is sitting on my immediate right, Mr. Jacques Francœur. Perhaps it would be appropriate if Mr. Francœur were himself to introduce the gentlemen who are with him.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Francœur. In compliance with our request, Mr. Francœur, you forwarded us a brief according to the guidelines we sent to you. That brief has been circulated, read and studied, and we should like you to make an oral statement following which we will ask you questions on your brief, on the statement itself and on any other matters which may be of interest to us.

[Translation]

Mr. Francœur: We have tried to present in our brief all the aspects of the Les Journaux Trans-Canada Ltée. likely to interest and enlighten your Committee.

There is certainly room for improvement, and we certainly want to co-operate with the Committee in your work which could result in a better written and audio-visual press.

We are nonetheless convinced that most people have confidence in their newspapers. We of the Les Journaux Trans-Canada are always interested in doing all we can to tighten still more that confidence without which a newspaper cannot live.

I think that, after the statements by the spokesmen for Gelco Enterprises Ltd., and La Presse, it would be superfluous for me to drag out this introduction. I think that it would be more useful for everyone if I invited you to ask questions that can clarify our operations still further.

[Text]

The Chairman: Thank you very much. We will now put our questions to you, and, if you wish to field them yourself or prefer to refer them to one of your associates, please do.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: It is mentioned, Mr. Francœur, that at the age of 16, you made your beginning in journalism, isn't that right?

Mr. Francœur: Yes, sir.

Mr. Fortier: A regular correspondent at La Patrie and Petit Journal; it must give you some satisfaction today to be one of the owners of those papers?

Mr. Francœur: Satisfaction, well, yes and no. In any case I think they are responsibilities.

Mr. Fortier: It's the story of the newsboy who becomes the owner of a newspaper?

Mr. Francœur: I might not have had the courage to be a newsboy, on some winter days in any case.

Mr. Fortier: What the Committee would like to hear from a professional who has gone through La Patrie, the Montreal Star, the Ottawa Journal, and the Montreal Gazette, is a summary, a survey of the written press in Quebec—what it has been, what it is today, and what it should be.

Mr. Francœur: That's a big order. First, a survey...

Mr. Fortier: I know your talents.

Mr. Francœur: Well, as for making a survey, at the time I belonged to the editorial staffs of the papers you mentioned; that was a good 20 or 25 years ago, and the situation as I knew it then in those papers is far from being what it is today. If you ask me about the situation at the Ottawa Journal today, well, then I haven't been in that building for 25 years. However it's obvious that newspapers and newspapermen have changed for the better.

I think that newspapers cover (I don't know whether I may use that expression) devote much more to the current scene than they did 25 years ago, despite all their good will, and it is obvious that with all the facilities of every kind in all areas, newspapers have improved.

The quality of newspapermen has also improved enormously along with wages, so that today, whereas 25 years ago (before that, it was often said that journalism was a haven for lawyers who had not been admitted to the Bar), today, the wages that are being paid, the working conditions and protection of all kinds that journalists have, lead to a quality choice. Newspapers today really have, and I come back to the word "choice", really have a complete choice. That's because in all the newspapers, we have almost daily demands for persons who, say, have the education and live in a circle that make excellent journalists. It's probably that newspapers can't afford to have any more, or don't need any more, because journalists, today, are more skilful. They are also, perhaps, more demanding than 25 years ago, definitely.

Mr. Fortier: What are the ingredients of a good newspaperman today, in 1970, in Quebec?

Mr. Francœur: The ingredients of a good newspaperman—there's an old saying that I believe in; it's that newspapermen are born newspapermen. The person still has to have the best possible education, and have the curiosity that goes with the newspaperman's profession. He must also be ready to work almost non-stop in order to cut out a niche for himself. However, I think that right down at the bottom, he has to have it. You either have it or you don't—to repeat another saying. I don't think you can pick it up; somebody can have studied everything, and taken all the courses in journalism, and if he doesn't have it in him, I don't think he'll make a good journalist.

Mr. Fortier: Do you have in your organization journalists who were trained in one or another of the schools of journalism we have in Quebec, or even outside Quebec?

Mr. Francœur: There must be some—yes there are some in our papers, "Les Journaux Trans-Canada". But you will remember that schools of journalism are just beginning to operate. The faculty, the school of journalism at Laval University really began to produce fairly complete journalists only a couple of years ago. Courses in information are given in some CEGEPs, but I don't call those preparation courses for journalism. They aren't that kind of course. Besides, the Association of Dailies had to intervene with the Department of Education to put an end to them, because it completely misled young people and to make them take certain courses given by the CEGEPs this year.

Mr. Fortier: Your first success as a proprietor was with Dimanche-Matin, was it not?

Mr. Francoeur: Well, let's say, the first big success; there were a couple of papers before that, though with suburban weeklies, you could call them.

Mr. Fortier: Could you explain to us, firstly, why there are so few dailies in Quebec, and secondly, why there are so many weeklies, that is, weeklies that circulate throughout the province or only in a particular area?

Mr. Francoeur: Well, I shall give you an answer, and then I shall ask Mr. D'Amour who, before he became the president of the daily Le Nouvelliste on January 1, was on two separate occasions president or director of the smallest daily in Quebec La Voix de l'Est, which is presently enjoying the largest circulation in its history, possibly 12,000 or 12,500 copies.

First of all, the production costs of a small provincial daily in Quebec are very much higher than those of a daily in an English-speaking city.

Mr. Fortier: You say that in your brief. What is the reason?

Mr. Francoeur: There are a number of factors, but the two main ones are that, in general, small-town dailies in the other provinces make the maximum use of Canadian Press service. There is a very high percentage of what is called "wire copy" today, and it requires no handling at all. You receive a tape, which you feed into your linotype machine; it is not expensive, and the English wire is definitely much more comprehensive than the French one. In the case of a daily in a small or average-size city in Quebec, there is first of all the fact that Canadian press wire is not complete in French, so right away you need additional staff to get it from the English wire.

But there is also the matter of mental attitude. The thinking of a resident of small town or city in Quebec is centred much more on his own region, generally speaking, than that of the citizen of an English-speaking town in another province. In other words, if you took over La Voix de l'Est, La Tribune or Le Nouvelliste and gave them the same breakdown of news as there is in equivalent papers in other provinces, the paper would not last six months. The people in small towns in Quebec want local and regional news, and that means a much more elaborate news room than they have in towns in English-speaking provinces, where a good part of the paper comes from the wire or from the American feature services, which we still have to translate. For example, someone mentioned the comic strips just now, many science items, many women's features and financial matters come in English, and this makes the writing job much more demanding.

Mr. D'Amour could tell you more, because he has a number of years of experience of the problems of a small provincial daily.

Mr. Charles D'Amour, President, Le Nouvelliste: I have also looked into the matter with a great deal of interest, because I also spent seven years as managing director of L'Évangéline in Moncton. It has great difficulty in surviving, since it is a French-language paper in a city, and a province, with an English-speaking majority. I have examined this very question of newspapers in Quebec and Ontario, and I note that almost all Ontario cities with a population of 25,000 or more have their own daily paper, while in Quebec, apart from Montreal and Quebec City, there is only Trois-Rivières and Sherbrooke—Granby is an exception. Chicoutimi used to have a daily, but it disappeared in time.

I would say that the reason there are not more small dailies in Quebec is the availability of advertising. It is a custom, perhaps a bad habit, that Quebecers have adopted, but in all cities like St-Hyacinthe, St-Jean, Chicoutimi and elsewhere you will find many small stores, but a few large ones, and a daily needs big advertisers in order to survive. Confronted by these facts, few financiers would risk capital on the establishment of a daily in a small town in Quebec.

Mr. Fortier: With your experience, would you risk any on the founding of a daily in Rimouski or Chicoutimi, today?

Mr. D'Amour: No.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Francoeur?

Mr. Francoeur: Before dealing with your question, I might add another point. La Voix de l'Est would probably not have survived had it not been closely associated with a radio station in Granby, CHEF, which happens to be the only radio station in Les Journaux Trans-Canada. If I am to believe what I am told, and what I have observed, the 25 years or so that La Voix de l'Est has been with us have seen a regular switching back and forth; one year the radio station would absorb the paper's deficit, the next year it would be the other way around, depending on market conditions, as Mr. Desmarais has said; one year, La Voix de l'Est supported CHEF, and the following year, CHEF supported La Voix de l'Est. If they had broken up, there probably would have been neither a radio station nor a daily paper in Granby.

Mr. Fortier: Could you not give many similar examples, or even suggest that this method of communicating news be implemented in smaller centres like Granby, Rimouski, etc.?

Mr. Francoeur: I believe that if we want to develop daily papers in average-size cities in Quebec, it will be virtually essential that one of the radio stations—there is generally more than one—be prepared to associate with the new paper, for the same reasons.

Mr. Péladeau stressed it this morning. I fully agree with him, but perhaps not with respect to a television station, though it is not an impossibility, but certainly a radio station is almost a necessity if someone, for example, were to launch a daily tomorrow morning in Rouyn-Noranda, a heavily populated area that is remote from the others, it is almost essential that there be a connection. I will say at once that there is no danger of a monopoly in a small town like that, because in Granby, if memory serves, you can get 20 small radio stations, 19 of them in towns in the area, including all the Montreal and Sherbrooke stations, and from the newspaper point of view, of course, in addition to La Voix de l'Est, all the Montreal dailies are sold in Granby. So the fact that the radio station and the paper both belong to us poses absolutely no danger, even pursued to the logical limit.

Mr. Fortier: But in Sherbrooke, if I remember correctly, there was a radio station included in the package you bought in 1967?

Mr. Francoeur: Pardon me, no, I only bought one paper in 1967, not a package.

Mr. Fortier: Nevertheless, I will put it another way: the radio station was available at that time?

Mr. Francoeur: No, when I went after La Tribune, and got Mr. Desmarais and Mr. Parisien interested, we were offered only the newspaper. Other people had bought the radio and television stations and the commercial printing works.

Mr. Fortier: These other people, it was Mr. Desmarais and Mr. . . .

Mr. Francoeur: No, Mr. Desmarais—it was the Power Corporation, but at that time. . .

Mr. Fortier: Excuse me.

Mr. Francoeur: . . .neither Mr. Desmarais nor Mr. Parisien had anything at all to do with the Power Corporation.

Mr. Fortier: Pardon me, that is right. At that time, the radio and television stations had been bought by the Power Corporation?

Mr. Francoeur: And the newspaper too, but actually, right after that, the Power Corporation decided to get rid of it.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. To return to my earlier question, would you personally take the risk of launching small daily newspapers?

Mr. Francoeur: Let us say that part of our plans at the moment is to make a great effort to expand La Voix de l'Est even more in the immediate future. We shall incur expenses to find out whether there is really a way to take a daily such as La Voix de l'Est which, moreover, at the present time is somewhat profitable, and give it a wide scope in all fields. We shall attempt that between now and the end of 1970. If the trial proves to be a success, it is possible that we shall be prepared to risk what no one else to date has dared to risk elsewhere.

Mr. Fortier: Respecting Granby, radio station CHEF is not for sale?

Mr. Francoeur: No. At present we have an application before the CRTC, which is to be heard in March, for the transfer of the radio station licence because we purchased it at the same time as the daily. It was part of La Voix de l'Est Limitée. Therefore it is as much a part as the newspaper. It is not a very powerful station either. Proportionally, it is no more powerful than the La Voix de l'Est newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Francoeur, as president of Les Journaux Trans-Canada Limitée, what control do you exercise over the editorial policies of your three dailies?

Mr. Francoeur: Absolutely no control.

Mr. Fortier: I notice that in your brief you mention that never was an editorial, which appeared for example in La Tribune, ever repeated in Le Nouvelliste. Is that true?

Mr. Francoeur: That is to say that it may have been repeated in the excerpts from the editorials of the other newspapers on the whole because we do as most Canadian dailies do. On certain days we publish excerpts from the best editorials of different newspapers. I do not say that it was not published as an excerpt, as a comment of others, but, as a newspaper editorial, it was never published as the editorial of another newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: Is the editorial policy of each newspaper completely its own?

Mr. Francoeur: You have before you the three presidents to whom all aspects of the newspaper management is entrusted.

Mr. Fortier: What control, if control there be, do you exercise over the production of your newspapers?

Mr. Francoeur: Do you mean technical production?

Mr. Fortier: No. I mean the day-to-day production.

Mr. Francoeur: None, I read them, often one week late, especially since Mr. Kierans' reforms because you know that it takes up to 10 days to receive La Voix de l'Est in Montreal, a distance of 38 miles. So, if our other mail subscribers are as well served, the situation is far from brilliant.

Mr. Fortier: How was, or how is, the publisher's editorial policy barometer, which was discussed earlier this afternoon, actually made known to your various newspapers?

Mr. Francoeur: I do not think that it was ever made known in the sense of walking in and saying we want this or we want that. There was never any question of that. I believe that we delegated powers to the presidents and that to date it has been proved to us that they have exercised sound judgment in editing the newspaper. Furthermore, to the best of my knowledge, to date I have never issued any directives about the editorials in any of the three dailies.

Mr. Fortier: Do you imagine that one day an editorial which was not in keeping with the policies or the philosophy of the owners, could be published?

Mr. Francoeur: Listen, out of 900 or perhaps 1500 editorials per year, there will always be a few which will not satisfy me 100 per cent. To ask for more than that would be asking a lot. All the editorials probably do not please Mr. Desmarais, Mr. Parisien or Mr. Dansereau, another shareholder, either. However, to date there has never been an editorial which made me pick up the telephone to say that the person who wrote it is a fool. I never went that far. I do not say that I always agree with the editorials because that would be asking the impossible.

[Text]

The Chairman: Have there been some which displeased you?

[Translation]

Mr. Francoeur: I would say that there are a few which, if I had written the editorial, I would perhaps have not said the same thing in the same way but there has never been any question of telephoning the president and raising the matter.

[Text]

The Chairman: But there have been some with which you have been unhappy?

[Translation]

Mr. Francoeur: I would not say "unhappy". Let us say there are some with whom it is normal. I perhaps did not see the problem quite from the same angle but it was not a fundamental question. I think that there has never been an editorial which was in opposition to the publisher's ideas. I consider the editor as representing all the shareholders, in this case the four shareholders. I do not think that there has even been an editorial in our newspapers which was not in keeping with the publisher's philosophy, in the broadest sense of the word.

Mr. Fortier: What, in your opinion, is the reason for the rather phenomenal success of Dimanche-Matin?

Mr. Francoeur: Well it is rather hard for me to answer that. Let us say first of all that French Canadians have always been used to having a Sunday newspaper, that is since 1924 or '25 when there were Sunday newspapers in Montreal. For a while there were two, La Patrie and Le Petit Journal. Through force of circumstances or actually for reasons which concerned the directors of those newspapers at that time, about 1951-52 it happened that presstime for those newspapers was advanced gradually from Saturday evening, to Saturday noon, to Friday evening, to Friday noon and today it is Wednesday evening. However to get back to 1951-52, I had collaborated directly on Le Petit Journal and in 1953 the gap existed. There was a printing-plant for sale in Granby for financial reasons together with an English weekly in Granby. At that time, Le Canada closed up shop. I had what is known as a suburban newspaper which was printed by the same company. There were other people who also had such newspapers and overnight we found ourselves with hardly any choice in having our suburban newspapers printed. At that time, I went into partnership with Mr. Robert Allard and in July, 1953 we purchased the printing plant in Granby. We immediately started the wheels turning to release a Sunday newspaper in January of 1954. The first week we sold 12,996 copies by concentrating sensibly at the beginning on the same ideas which Mr. Péladeau explained to you this morning: news and sports. Obviously we gradually expanded the field of endeavour, the women's section, et cetera. Now, we still concentrate on what can be called a Sunday daily, basing ourselves on that fact that by Sunday people have read the large weeklies which are ever so popular in Quebec, in their half-magazine, half-newspaper from, and have also read the newspaper's serious pages, if it can be put that way, actually the information pages of La Presse and Le Devoir. In fact we have always found that by Sunday morning people are no longer interested in such serious reporting and are ready for news and sports of the day reported in a vivid way. That is the policy which we have always tried to follow and which has been...

Mr. Fortier: Have you never attempted to present a synopsis of the week's events?

Mr. Francoeur: Listen, if you take a look at the synopses presented by Le Devoir and La Presse in addition to the large weeklies at the end of the week, there is nothing left for Sunday which could qualify without being a repetition.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Francoeur, if you will permit it, I should like to ask Mr. Dubé and Mr. D'Amour who, if I am not mistaken, have both worked under a sole owner, a question. Mr. Dubé, could you tell us how it is different to work for Les Journaux Trans-Canada compared to what it was before when you worked for only one man?

Mr. Yvon Dubé, Président, La Tribune: Mr. Chairman, I feel that Mr. Fortier is putting me in a rather uncomfortable position. Nevertheless, I will say that I used to see the former owner, who is now one of your colleagues, Honourable Senators, everyday whereas up until this morning I had not seen the present owner for two years and I do not think he recognized me. That then makes for all the difference. A man whom you run into everyday is inclined to give you directives everyday—more especially, when the owner is a local resident; he has contacts and pressures are exerted. That is common practice and such pressures are passed on in turn to the editors. I must say that not only have I not been under any pressure from Les Journaux Trans-Canada but there has not been any pressure from the public either because the public feels that I am not important to bother with.

Mr. Fortier: It has often been put forward to this Committee that the owner of the newspaper owed it to himself to be a local resident, to be from the region. In short, if something was going wrong, a citizen or reader could telephone him or could even pay him a visit.

Mr. Dubé: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You seem to be saying that as far as you are concerned it is preferable that the owner not be a local resident.

Mr. Dubé: Let us say that you have an owner who is a local resident. Automatically I think that that implies that he has certain values, that he may have other interests in the community. In all likelihood he spent the evening with other people and it is quite normal for those persons to be able to telephone and try to obtain favours or to have editorials written or not written. There is nothing unusual in that.

Mr. Fortier: Is it easier in that instance to exert pressures?

Mr. Dubé: Yes, obviously because of friendship or economic and business relations.

Mr. Fortier: Assuming of course that pressures are exerted on you, if such pressures were to be exerted on you today, in view of all the humility you have just shown, how could the owner learn that such pressures were exerted in view of his absence from the scene?

Mr. Dubé: I do not think that it is up to me to inform him unless of course I have something extraordinary in hand which I think could have an economic effect on the business. However, as I said, over the past three years in Sherbrooke I have never been subjected to such pressures.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I shall ask Mr. Francoeur the question. You are with La Tribune. I imagine that Mr. Dubé in Sherbrooke is subjected to pressure. Let us say he agrees to suppress a news story or agrees to publish it in a non-objective way. This is a hypothetical case of course but, Mr. Francoeur, in view of the fact that you are from Montreal, I should like you to answer. It is hardly likely that such pressure or pressures will be brought to your attention in good time. Therefore, could some problem not arise in such a case?

Mr. Francoeur: In theory probably in the hypothetical case which you raised. However, in practice, with the telephone available today, I swear that if that happened a couple of times or if someone in Sherbrooke saw what was going on, it would not be long before I, Mr. Parisien, Mr. Desmarais or others would hear of it. However, to support Mr. Dubé's thesis, I believe that in a small city the owner of the newspaper is really the publisher. If the editor of the newspaper, the owner in fact of the newspaper—say the position which Mr. Dubé holds—is a journalist and the owner really does the work, then the solution is excellent. However, if the owner does not do the work, it is better to have an owner from outside, as in our case. Am I being clear?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I follow you.

Mr. Francoeur: What I mean to say is that in a case such as that of Mr. Bassett, it is obvious. Mr. Bassett, who is really the owner and publisher, accepts his responsibilities. However, if for economic or historical reasons, the newspaper must be run by a person who is not the owner, I prefer straight off that the owner not be from the municipality.

Mr. Fortier: On the other hand, I would suggest that it is chiefly in a small municipality that such pressures can be exerted rather than in Toronto or Montreal.

Mr. Francoeur: Mr. Fortier, I do believe that Mr. Dansereau, Mr. Bureau, Mr. Desmarais or Mr. Parisien will tell you that there are pressures in a large city like Montreal.

Mr. Fortier: Could Mr. Dubé tell me whether there are also pressures in a small city like Sherbrooke?

Mr. Francoeur: That is to say that it is perhaps worse in a case where the owner of the newspaper is not its editor and also has many interests in a small city.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Fortier, you have to understand that my office door is never closed and I never refuse to see anyone. When I speak of pressure, I mean undue pressure, repeated pressure, such that I, for example, would feel, because of my position, that the shareholders would want to dismiss me.

Mr. Fortier: Agreed. If someone is not pleased or is even unhappy with the publication of an article or an editorial's content, obviously he can always take pen and paper and write you a letter, can he not?

Mr. Dubé: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: I was putting the question to you. Do you publish all the letters you receive, the letters to the editor?

Mr. Dubé: I think that we are very liberal in that regard. I notice that at present some newspapers do not publish letters which are not signed. Provided the veracity of the letter can be verified, we still accept letters written under a pseudonym in order to allow certain persons, working for the government or other public agencies, to express themselves freely.

Mr. Fortier: Do you edit those letters?

Mr. Dubé: We leave them as they are.

Mr. Fortier: Do you publish them?

Mr. Dubé: Of course. If someone sends me a novel, I put it with the classified ads.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. So you make no selection at all?

Mr. Dubé: There is no selection. However, if someone were advocating war or preaching anarchy, I would certainly not publish them. Naturally, I think that if you read the newspapers, you find that a certain type of person writes more often. To put a name on that type, let us say that at the present time Separatist tendencies take up full columns while persons with other learnings do not bother to answer. That is not the newspapers' fault.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. D'Amour, Mr. Ferrat, what is the policy of your newspapers with respect to dissident opinions?

Mr. D'Amour: In Trois Rivières the present team wants the newspaper to serve the eco-conomic promotion, the development of the area. That has always been its policy. A project, such as the bridge striding the St. Lawrence, is no stranger to the work of Le Nouvelliste as an information media. The newspaper plays the role of promotor in all aspects.

Mr. Fortier: The last question which I put to Mr. Dube—do you publish in their entirety letters to the editor which respect the libel laws?

Mr. D'Amour: We do even more than that, Mr. Fortier. We headlined a story of a speaker who indirectly attacked the corporation of les Journaux Trans-Canada.

Mr. Ferrat: Respecting La Voix de l'Est, for my taste there are not enough readers published for the simple reason that we receive few letters. If I am not mistaken and have fully understood, one of the reasons why we receive few letters is that in the past it was discouraged and it must be understood that La Voix de l'Est is the baby of the company. We have only been running it for about a year and it is the type of thing which requires a great deal of time to develop. Our chief editorial writer, who is an excellent man and who controls that field, is a man of long-standing and he has many philosophies to develop but we expect to publish finally almost all letters which merit publication. Respecting meriting publication, we receive letters which are of no interest to anyone except perhaps the individual and his family. Therefore at a given time, a certain selection must be made.

Mr. Fortier: A selection which you obviously make yourself?

Mr. Ferrat: No, not I personally. The editorial writer must decide which letter is of interest to the readers.

The Chairman: Is your question a supplementary or a separate question, Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: It is a separate question.

Mr. Fortier: I was leaving the subject also.

The Chairman: Then would you ask your question, Senator Prowse.

Senator Prowse: In the brief we received from Gelco Enterprises, on page 9, there is a suggestion that they will support the establishment of a press council on these conditions:

(a) that such a press council be formed on a regional basis;

(b) that such a press council be a voluntary body, free of any governmental influence;

(c) that such a press council be set up following an agreement reached between all interested parties;

(d) that the public be represented in a majority proportion on such a press council.

What is your feeling on that proposal?

[Translation]

Mr. Francoeur: I fully approve of it. Furthermore I believe that you will soon receive a brief from the Association, Quebec Dailies Inc. which will give you all the details of the press council project, which is fairly advanced in Quebec. That project has been under study for three years now. Many formulas were under consideration and many discussions were held with the journalists' union, La Fédération des Journalistes. I believe that that is the only practical solution because a national press council is only a dream. It is highly improbable. I cannot conceive of a press council which would handle a problem in Granby and then deal with another problem in Victoria, British Columbia. It would be most difficult to control and operation would be very cumbersome. I cannot envisage a national press council. I do see regional or provincial press councils. I can see the Maritimes for example with a press council for the Maritimes. Indeed it would be up to the newspapers and journalists in the Maritimes to determine whether the press council would serve the four provinces or whether there should be one press council. I do not know but I do know that I cannot conceive of a national press council for us in Quebec.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: How small a press council do you think could be effective without getting ridiculously small?

[Translation]

Mr. Francoeur: I say provincial—for the Province of Quebec—English and French newspapers, English and French radio and television, weeklies, et cetera. However, I believe that that would involve fourteen dailies, two hundred weeklies and seventy-five radio stations although it is the federal government which controls all radio stations as such but I am speaking from the point of view of information—and you also have television stations. However, with regard to further details about the press council, I would prefer that you await the brief to be presented by the Association des Quotidiens du Québec because it will give you all the relevant information.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: I respect your suggestion. We are looking forward to that brief as a matter of fact. Can you tell us at this stage how the public representatives would be selected and appointed?

[Translation]

Mr. Francoeur: Although I do not have the figures on hand, in l'Association du Québec's project, there is representation first of all for the dailies and weeklies and then the radio and television stations on the management side. Then there are the journalists, also divided according to a formula. The third group would be other agencies which cannot include persons who have something to do with newspapers.

In other words, in view of the fact that unions as such are involved with newspapers, they could not form part of the public's representation in addition to being represented in the employees' group. However I am not aware of all the details of that formula because it is rather involved. Mr. Bureau here is one of the experts on that matter. In fact he represented l'Association des Quotidiens and, if you care to ask him, he can explain the operation planned by the Quebec press council.

Mr. Fortier: In any case, he is to return.

Mr. Francoeur: Yes, but if you want him today, he is here.

[Text]

Senator Prowse: Would Mr. Bureau like to answer that part of the question? What I am particularly interested in is how the public gets representation on the press council that they feel is their own.

[Translation]

Mr. Bureau: The press council would be made up of eighteen members—six would represent publishers and owners of radio and television stations, six others would represent the journalists and the last six would represent the public.

[Text]

Six of them would represent the public.

[Translation]

There would be eighteen members of the press council; six would represent the owners of newspapers, radio and television stations and magazines; six would represent the journalists; the six others would represent the public and would be chosen jointly by the first two groups at the suggestion of the Chairman who himself would be chosen unanimously by the two groups. The person acting as Chairman would not be attached to any radio or television station and would have nothing to do with mass media. It is he who will suggest a list of twelve names from which six would have to be chosen jointly by the employer and journalist groups. Those six persons and the Chairman would form the majority with respect to the other two groups and could be replaced every two years using the same procedure at the Chairman's suggestion and with the support of the two interested groups.

[Text]

The Chairman: May I interrupt just long enough to say, Mr. Bureau and Mr. Francoeur, that there have been several references to a brief we are receiving from the Association of Quebec Dailies. I do not know about that brief and I have asked some of our staff people by way of notes, but they do not know about that brief either. Perhaps either Mr. Francoeur or Mr. Bureau could expedite it.

Mr. Francoeur: You have the secretary of the association over there.

The Chairman: Mr. Secretary, if you would like to move it along for us, we would like to get it.

[Translation]

Mr. Bureau: I think that our chairman, Mr. A. F. Mercier, who is president of Le Soleil and of the Association of Quebec Dailies, must have been in touch with your Committee to say that he would forward that file. If he has not done so, it will be done shortly.

[Text]

Miss Barrie: He has communicated with us, but we have not received it yet.

The Chairman: It is coming?

Mr. Mercier: Yes, I am preparing it.

The Chairman: When can we expect to receive it?

Mr. Mercier: I have promised that you would receive it before the end of the month.

The Chairman: Excellent.
Senator Prowse?

Senator Prowse: Those are all the questions I have to ask.

The Chairman: Are there any other questions? Mr. Fortier?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Your large weeklies are obviously competing with...

Mr. Francoeur: Of course they compete just as Pontiac competes with Chevrolet, Dodge or Plymouth. Those weeklies are more and more different although when they belonged to different owners, they tended to resemble one another, one wanting to capitalize on the other's success. Now that we have those three, I mean La Patrie, Le Petit Journal and Le Photo-Journal, last year one of them surpassed two hundred thousand copies, another sold one hundred and thirty thousand copies and the third showed sales of twenty-five thousand copies. We carried out a good deal of research and we gave each of them increasingly dissimilar formats over the past few months. The results of that diversification are very, very promising.

Mr. Fortier: Will you continue to diversify them rather than combining them into one or...

Mr. Francoeur: Yes, they are still diversified, from the point of view of editing, from all points of view but there we tried to transform them respecting content with a more marked separation between all three editorships.

Mr. Fortier: Take for example another field, the weekly perhaps, Dernière-Heure and Dimanche-Matin. In view of the fact that those newspapers are part of the same parcel, do you not feel that one day they will form only one?

Mr. Francoeur: I hope not because first of all there is a market for them. The market exists already. We should like to give them increasingly different trends on the practical side. Do you think that if Dodge were to shut down Plymouth tomorrow, the Plymouth team would go over to Dodge? I do not think so. In our case the same phenomenon takes place. On the one hand there is Dernière-Heure which sells between fifty and sixty thousand copies and on the other, we sell more copies of Dimanche-Matin today than we did the week before Dernière-Heure was founded. That is somewhat like the phenomenon pointed out by Mr. Péladeau this morning with respect to Montreal-Matin. So, I am convinced that if Dernière-Heure were to close up shop tomorrow, in the weeks thereafter sales of Dimanche-Matin would not increase in the order of sixty thousand sales. The only practical thing to do is to make the newspapers different.

Mr. Fortier: What specific advantages are gained today by the three dailies which are part of the Trans-Canada chain?

Mr. Francoeur: I think that Mr. Desmarais gave you an outline of those three newspapers this morning.

Mr. Fortier: I directed the question at you. I would like to hear from the three presidents who experienced the changeover.

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Chairman, I think that in the case of La Tribune, it is very clear. Without any reflection on anyone, La Tribune was in the red but let us say the methods of the previous owner—in the composing room for example where I knew nothing, indeed I was a journalist. I was in charge of editing—I can tell you that today with increased production, people who are happier in their work, and better salaries, we employ 13 fewer people. So someone who knew the business was needed to tell us: this is how things are done. In time, with the technical assistance of Mr. Ferrat and Mr. Francoeur, I think we found a solution to the problem and we succeeded in resolving the matter. It is along those lines and that was not done before. Why was it not done? Obviously it is not up to me to judge the persons who went before me but the fact remains and cannot be denied.

Mr. Fortier: Are there any others apart from that?

Mr. Dubé: From the point of view of advertising, a newspaper of our size could not allow itself the luxury of a representative in Montreal or Toronto. So, someone has just been appointed in Montreal to represent the three dailies and I think that will be to the advantage of the three.

Mr. Fortier: Is La Tribune...

Mr. Dubé: Mr. Chairman, an exchange of information can take place between the presidents. Just this morning I was coming up with Mr. D'Amour and we plugged each other into many pipelines. I think that will be to both our advantages. Previously the boss would have said: don't breathe a word of that to the boys at La Tribune. However now we permit such exchanges.

Mr. Fortier: Is there no competition between La Tribune...

Mr. Dubé: As for competition, if I can beat Le Nouvelliste, I will do so. There is great rivalry.

Mr. Fortier: For the readers?

Mr. Francoeur: Yes, Sir. In Drummondville and Victoriaville you have a mutual region where there has always been friction between the two and the battle is being waged stronger than ever.

Mr. Dubé: No agreement, Sir.

Mr. Fortier: For advertising, obviously?

Mr. Dubé: For national advertising yes but not at the local level. I would even say that Le Nouvelliste came into an area and sells for five cents less than we—something which I do not allow. If there were no competition, we would arrive at an understanding.

[Text]

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Francoeur and Mr. Fortier, I am terribly embarrassed, but we have run out of time. I am sorry because there are other questions you have, and we have not even got to the questions I have. However, I have made a commitment to some people who must get away and, therefore, I have no choice in the matter and am very sorry to terminate the session. I feel badly because there are other questions we have for you. I do not feel quite so badly because—I am not sure whether you yourself are—but some of your people are returning for discussions we have with the weekly newspapers the week after next.

Mr. Francoeur: No, we do not fit in with that.

The Chairman: In any event, that makes me doubly sorry.

We are particularly happy to have you here. Perhaps I should broaden my comment to include Mr. Desmarais and Mr. Parisien from Gelco, and certainly Mr. Dansereau and the people from La Presse, and you, of course, Mr. Francoeur. Your opinions have been most welcome. Today's session completes the hearings that we have scheduled with the daily newspapers. Our interest, of course, is much broader than simply the dailies. We are interested in studying the full media spectrum; and in that full media spectrum and in our studies in general, I think the views of the people to whom we have been listening today are of vital importance. We are also grateful for the several items of material that have been tabled.

I am sorry that we have not a longer time in which to meet with you, but it may be that we can arrange to ask you back to talk further, or we may want to talk to you privately. If any of the people from Gelco, from Les Journaux Trans-Canada, or La Presse, after having sat through this session today, have other thoughts or ideas or viewpoints then we shall be delighted to receive them.

For the benefit of the members of the committee and the members of the press and all others interested, the next meeting of the committee will be held on next Tuesday morning, when we shall be hearing from Weekend and Perspectives. There will be an in camera meeting of the committee next Monday at 2.30 p.m. at 140 Wellington Street.

The committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Tuesday, March 3, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the session to order. I have an announcement to make before we begin this morning's session which will perhaps take approximately five minutes to deal with.

Pursuant to the testimony of Messrs. Brander and McEachern for Maclean-Hunter Limited, I am in receipt of a letter from Mr. Mario Cardinal, the former editor-in-chief of Le Magazine Maclean. Mr. Cardinal has requested that his communication be read into the record and after consideration we have decided that in fact it probably should be on the record.

That being so, and my ability in French being what it is, I will ask Mr. Fortier to read this. There are copies here in French available for the press and the translation will be available as Mr. Fortier reads this letter.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: This letter, dated February 25, 1970, was addressed to the Chairman, Senator Keith Davey:

Dear Mr. Chairman:

I am making the following facts about Le Magazine Maclean known to you because I believe that the Committee of which you are Chairman has been misled. For the same reason I am today making public the contents of a personal and confidential directive that I received August 26, 1969, at which time I was Editor-in-Chief of Le Magazine Maclean. This directive (a copy is attached hereto), sent to me by the General Manager of Le Magazine Maclean, Gerald Brander, shows fully and clearly what the future of Le Magazine Maclean was to be.

Mr. Chairman, I thought it fitting that I should provide you with additional information, in parentheses, on each of the matters dealt with in that directive.

[Text]

1. "The editorial budget for Le Magazine Maclean starting November 1969 (issue dated December) becomes $8,000 a month. This is a great deal of money in relation to the volume of material to be produced and is to be regarded as a transitional figure until we can appraise the problem better".

[Translation]

(Le Magazine Maclean operated on a monthly budget of $19,360. This budget had been worked out in December 1968 with my predecessor Paul-Marie Lapointe and had been approved by the management of Maclean-Hunter. Putting forward the possibilities of an operating budget of this kind, Gerald Brander and Ronald McEachern offered me the position of Editor-in-Chief in November, 1968. This budget, which I stuck to very closely for the first nine months of the year, was to remain in force till the end of December, 1969. Up to September 30, 1969, I had spent $173,855 of the $174,240 that the budget provided for the nine month period.)

(The directive said that the operating budget of $8,000 monthly was adequate because the major part of the magazine content was to be produced in Toronto from then on. Moreover, the cut was only temporary; the directive was very clear on this point. A second cut (Phase 2) was to follow. I was informed of it not by Gerald Brander but by Charles Templeton, the Editor-in-Chief of Maclean's Magazine at the time. He was the only one of the Maclean-Hunter officials who was honest with me.)

[Text]

2. "The December issues of both French and English should fully reflect the agreements we have made".

3. "Staff reductions will be required. You are going to advise the editorial staff early next week and take the necessary action. We will arrange severance pay as discussed at your discretion".

[Translation]

(In February 1969 the management of Maclean-Hunter allowed me to dismiss Massue Belleau, a professional translator, for the very reason that there was to be little or no translation in Le Magazine Maclean. With Gerald Brander's approval I then hired Gilles Gariepy, a professional writer, who became Sub-Editor. In March 1969 the management of Maclean-Hunter authorized the hiring of a sixth permanent journalist on condition that I stay within the budget. In hiring Jean-V. Dufresne I reduced the "correspondents" part of the budget considerably. This explains why in Appendix II the "salaries" budget to September 30 was $2,014 higher than it should have been while the "correspondents" budget was $4,905 below the amount provided.)

(When I informed the journalists of the contents of the directive they were furious. Some of them talked of holding a press conference. I told Gerald Brander of this. This was his reply:

[Text]

"If there is a showdown, we will fire everybody on a two-week notice".

[Translation]

After that I had to let the management of Maclean-Hunter think that I would remain in my position to experiment with the new formula. I did this because if I had resigned at the same time as the journalists, they would have received only two weeks' severance pay and two of them were in the employ of the magazine for between four and four and a half years. I worked all the more determinedly to get them decent severance bonuses because I had little to lose myself. I had been working for Le Magazine Maclean for only eight months. For each of the journalists I obtained a week's pay for every six months service with the magazine. I resigned the same day that I received written confirmation of these arrangements from Gerald Brander. Mr. Chairman, I played both sides of the fence and in all fairness to the journalists (two of whom I had hired a few months previously) I believe I was right in doing so. Perhaps this is the attitude that Gerald Brander did not understand when he used the words "regret" and "retraction" before your Committee on February 18.)

[Text]

4. "We tentatively agreed that production and art assistance would be required to produce Le M. M. (Magazine Maclean) in Montreal office. This means retaining Miss Larose and Miss Bergevin. You will decide on reduced art assistance. It would appear that the part time services of Desrosiers should continue".

[Translation]

(Miss Larose was the production head, that is to say she looked after dealings of a technical nature with the Toronto workshop. Miss Bergevin was the secretary and Mr. Desrosiers was the art director.)

(The word "tentatively" indicated that as part of Phase 2, the Production and Art Departments would be integrated with those of the English magazine. Also, Miss Larose will confirm that at that time, Gerald Brander mentioned the possibility of her being transferred to Toronto.)

[Text]

5. "One staff writer should be retained. We agreed on Dufresne."

[Translation]

(The editorial staff was reduced from six to two, including the Editor-in-Chief. Brander decided to keep Dufresne without even consulting him. Naturally Dufresne refused to stay.)

[Text]

6. "Translation services should be arranged in Toronto".

[Translation]

(From then on the Editor-in-Chief of the French magazine didn't even have control over the translators.)

[Text]

7. "The essential monthly editorial responsibility of the Montreal staff will be to create suitable copy for those particular departments which cover material for the French magazine only—television, films, books, show business are examples. Montreal should generate story ideas and it will get assignments from Mr. Templeton”.

[Translation]

(Mr. Chairman, I have enclosed a copy of an issue of Le Magazine Maclean before the application of the directive. You will notice that articles left to the French editorial staff (television, films, books, entertainment, etc.) are but small articles published in the yellow pages. All articles for the white pages of the French magazine were to be edited by the English group in Toronto and also translated in Toronto.)

(The Toronto group, apparently unaware of what was going on in Quebec, was to rely on the French magazine group for views on Quebec coverage. The Editor-in-Chief at Toronto was to judge the value of these ideas and decide how they were to be handled. Take note that the Editor-in-Chief of the English magazine would be handing out assignments to the French magazine journalists.)

[Text]

8. “Final decision on the content of both French and English magazines will be made by Mr. Templeton”.

[Translation]

(In the eyes of the public the Editor-in-Chief of the French magazine was still fully responsible for the publication. Yet he had no authority over what went into it.)

[Text]

9. “Both French and English Maclean's will usually have the same cover illustration. French Maclean's masthead will carry the name of Mr. Cardinal only”.

[Translation]

(The English magazine is on the newsstands ten days ahead of the French magazine. What would become of the French magazine when its cover, which was designed to attract the buyer, had been on display for ten days on another magazine? I can't think of a better way of destroying a publication.)

(Mr. Chairman, in all propriety it was an insult to expect me to put my name on such a publication and to think me capable of such unworthiness even for the $2,000 salary increase that Gerald Brander offered me. In my opinion, the law should provide penalties for people who try to buy professional conscience with money...)

[Text]

10. “Nearly all illustrations and film will be originated by English Maclean's. Where special illustrations and film is required for the French edition only the charge will be made to French Maclean's.”

[Translation]

(This proves that the French magazine did become a translation. How could the pictures and films required for photographic process printing come from Toronto if they had not been conceived for the English magazine in the first place? And Gerald Brander, assuming that there would occasionally be pictures and films “for the French edition only”, confirmed that all the others were to be published in the English magazine as well.)

Mr. Chairman, I believe that the management of Maclean-Hunter acted in bad faith all during the period prior to my resignation on October 1. Dishonesty was added to this show of bad faith when Gerald Brander appeared before your Committee.

It is true that Gerald Brander didn't announce publicly that Le Magazine Maclean would become a translation of the English magazine. But can he deny the directive of August 26, 1969? With the Manager of a firm like Maclean-Hunter, directives of this kind are “private and personal”.

Mr. Chairman, how could he say to you that

[Text]

“that was a misconception and (I) was misquoted by the former editor in the general press of Quebec”? (Globe and Mail, Feb. 19, 1970).

[Translation]

How could he say to you that

[Text]

“he had suggested to the former editor that some stories and research might be adapted by Le Magazine Maclean's”? (G. & M. id.)

[Translation]

In the middle of August it was I and not Gerald Brander who suggested that we use certain articles from the English magazine in order to cut the cost of illustrations and films. (Charles Templeton can back me up on this.) However, I had specified that these be articles of general interest to readers of the French magazine (such as fashions or sports) with no political or social slant.

When he was before your Committee how could he state

[Text]

"the (former) editor later regretted and retracted his actions in the incident"? (G & M. id.)

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, I would ask you to read the last issue of Le Magazine Maclean (February 1970) a copy of which I have enclosed. Of the eight features in the white pages six are written by French-speaking journalists and the cover is different from the cover of the English magazine.

Gerald Brander will say that this issue proves that it has never been his wish to make the French magazine a translation of the English magazine. I see in this the proof that Gerald Brander, rather than myself, "is sorry for what he did and has recanted". In the meantime there will have been thousands of cancelled subscriptions and a complete team of writers will have been sacrificed so that Le Magazine Maclean could maintain a semblance of originality.

Mr. Chairman, these are a few facts that I wished to bring to your attention following the appearance of the Maclean-Hunter officials before your Committee. If the Committee would like further information, I am at your disposal and I would be honoured to appear before you with or without Gerald Brander and Ronald McEachern present.

Respectfully submitted,

Cordially yours,

(signed) Mario Cardinal, Journalist.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Fortier.

Well, Senators, this morning we turn to a discussion of weekend newspaper magazines. We have two briefs we are going to receive; later this morning we will have one from the Southstar Publishers Ltd., the publishers of The Canadian and The Star Weekly.

The first brief is from the Montreal Standard Publishing Co. Ltd., the publishers of Weekend and Perspectives. On my immediate right is Mr. William Goodson, the President of the Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited. On Mr. Goodson's right is Lewis Louthood, Vice President, Newspaper Relations, The Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited, and on my left is the Editor of Weekend Magazine, Mr. Frank Lowe.

Mr. Goodson, in compliance with the guidelines we mailed to you some number of weeks ago, you were good enough to send us a brief—well in advance I must say, and we were grateful. It has been circulated to the senators and presumably studied by them. We now would like to put some time at your disposal to make an oral statement in which you can explain the brief, amplify, add to it, subtract from it, or say other things. Following that, we would like to question you on the contents of your brief and on your oral statement and perhaps on other matters as well. If you wish to perhaps farm out—if that is the right verb—any of the questions to any of your colleagues, by all means do so.

Mr. W. A. Goodson, President, The Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited: Mr. Chairman, honourable Senators. I think the first statement that I will have to make will be a subtraction from your opening statement inasmuch as The Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited does not publish Perspectives.

The Chairman: I realized that when I said it.

Mr. Goodson: And I am certain that Mr. Alfred Mercier, the President of Perspectives Inc. who is sitting in the audience would have picked it up quite quickly.

The Chairman: Well, I am delighted that you mentioned that. I realized it as soon as I said it, so please carry on.

Mr. Goodson: Well, I hope that you did have the opportunity to read and study our brief. It does outline our business operation and our editorial philosophy and truly there is little I can add to the brief but to indicate to you that we in the magazine field are finding ourselves today in a very competitive market—probably in 1970—more competitive than we have ever seen it. We have the normal competition of other magazines and radio and television, but it seems today, along with many other industries, we are in competion as well with the banks for every time they tighten up their loans to business, we are tightened up as well on our advertising revenue.

I don't want to dwell on the advertising revenue aspect, but it is the sole means of getting finances into weekend magazines. On the other hand, it cannot be over-emphasized because all stages are of equal importance.

We have outlined our editorial philosophy and it is completely independent of the advertising philosophy. There is never a need from our standpoint. We found too in the last few years that the magazine industry has had to do a great deal of soul-searching to try to find a proper place in the communications empire. I think our permissive society has probably changed that as much as anything because it has changed our reading habits. In North America probably the two hottest publications are below the border in Playboy and its female counterpart Cosmopolitan. They seem to have the hottest editorial material and consequently the hottest influence at the moment. We, as a weekend magazine or newspaper distributed magazine, can't get into competition in this particular area. Fortunately or unfortunately, with a circulation of over two million, we are reaching into so many homes that we must evolve an editorial approach that has a broad spectrum. We believe we have done that and we believe we have evolved an editorial approach that encompasses all areas of Canada—large cities, small cities, country, and all members of the family. We, too, realize that in today's fast moving society we can no longer review our editorial approach from year to year but rather from issue to issue. That doesn't mean to say that we break the continuity, but we just have to make certain that we don't fall behind.

I don't want to dwell too long on that because our editor, Mr. Frank Lowe, is here. He has outlined our editorial philosophy and his editorial philosophy and he will be perfectly happy to answer any questions that you may have.

I think one aspect of the Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited that is worth noting is our transition in recent years from being a straight publisher to a combined publisher-printer. For the first many, many years of our existence we were a publisher with printing facilities devoted 100 per cent to our own publication. In recent years, we have converted over to being a printer as well, and I think it is worthwhile noting that in 1970 roughly 40 per cent of our printing will be devoted to publications of the Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited and the remainder will be on printing contracts to either other publishers or to consumer companies including some of the larger retail operations in the country. That has been quite a marked change in our existence in the last few years.

I don't think there is anything else that I would like to add to that—I think our brief is self-explanatory and if there are any questions, which I am sure you will have, we will be only too pleased to answer if we can.

The Chairman: Thank you very much Mr. Goodson. I think the questioning this morning will begin with Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if we could have a definition of newspaper magazines as compared to regular magazines and an explanation as to why you would not be a member of the M.A.B.?

Mr. Goodson: Well, the first, the explanation of being a newspaper distributed magazine is just simply bad. Our distribution comes basically through our member newspapers and the difference editorially is, of course, that we do make some changes from a normal magazine. We would not, for instance, carry features in the magazine that are generally carried in a daily newspaper because this would simply be redundant. I am talking of things such as crossword puzzles or any features of the type that are basic with the daily newspapers. We generally stay away from this type of thing because we consider that we complement the newspaper. As to why we are not a member of the Magazine Advertising Bureau—first, I could go back historically and say in the competitive field the conventional magazines have always denied that we are a magazine and we have not been invited to participate in the Magazine Advertising Bureau. We haven't considered it...

The Chairman: You never applied?

Mr. Goodson: We never applied. Four or five years ago a president of an advertising agency did put a couple of us together on a social basis but it was decided we would not likely be very acceptable to most members of the Magazine Advertising Bureau. They consider us to be what they refer to as a supplement and not a magazine. Whether they are right or wrong I don't know.

The Chairman: Well, you clearly said in your opening comments that you are in the magazine field.

Mr. Goodson: Well, we have always considered ourselves in the magazine field.

The Chairman: And they don't consider you in the magazine field?

Mr. Goodson: Well, they say they don't.

Senator Sparrow: They deny that you are in the magazine field?

Mr. Goodson: They deny this. I think this is very common in the advertising field, but this doesn't worry us. It really doesn't concern us at all.

Senator Sparrow: Do they deny it apart from the ABC circulation aspect—do they deny it on a basis other than that?

Mr. Goodson: Oh, I think they deny it really on an emotional basis because we are competitors. From this standpoint, we have always used this in our selling promotion, and that is that we are a magazine and that the budgets from which the advertising volume comes into our publications, comes out of magazine budgets.

The Chairman: Why, Mr. Goodson, do you say you are a magazine?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I suppose we could start with our masthead. That says we are a magazine but we consider we are a magazine because we are competing in the magazine field as far as revenue is concerned, as far as readers are concerned—the method of distribution really doesn't enter into our reading material. We compete for editorial staff in the magazine field just as they compete in the magazine field.

Senator Sparrow: If I might just digress for a second. You referred to your masthead but nowhere do I see in your magazine any reference to the owners or publishers, or the editor's name anywhere. Why not? Why don't you publish those?

Mr. Goodson: Well, this goes back, historically, to when we started Weekend Magazine and we still believe the policy is so and in actual fact the editor's name does appear. Mr. Frank Lowe's name does appear on a column.

Senator Sparrow: On a column only?

Mr. Goodson: Yes. Over the years the concept was that we become part of the member newspaper and legally we are published out of every member newspaper. We are not a publication from a legal standpoint—once we go into the Winnipeg Free Press masthead we are considered as published by the Winnipeg Free Press and we come under the varied laws that are related to the various provinces. I think the classic on that is liquor advertising. We cannot take liquor advertising on a national basis because we conform to each of the individual provinces. But the aspect of that is that we really feel that the readers should feel that it is part of their newspaper and not published in Montreal.

Senator Sparrow: Well, I might agree with that statement if you didn't have some that you gave away outside of the area of the daily newspaper. You do distribute door-to-door with no connection with a daily newspaper. I am just wondering if the reader has any way of knowing in fact who is responsible for that magazine. Now, of course, they can blame the Ottawa Journal or the Winnipeg paper, but this wouldn't be true with a free distribution system?

Mr. Goodson: No, it wouldn't be true with a free distribution system and it is a point which we have really not taken into consideration. When we went into controlled circulation—as it says in the brief, we went into controlled circulation as a purely competitive measure when the defection of one group of newspapers left us with a hole in our circulation in some major areas—we hit upon this system of filling the holes. We didn't change the magazine at all. We changed our mastheads with an in-printer on the press.

The Chairman: Is this what you call your masthead?

Mr. Goodson: This is a masthead. Where the member newspaper appears it is changed without stopping the press at all. It is a mechanical device which changes mastheads instantly. In order to do what you say, to re-edit for the controlled circulation areas, we would have to re-edit the publication slightly and we did not take into consideration that this was an important factor.

Senator Sparrow: I don't understand what you mean. What do you mean by re-edit the magazine?

Mr. Goodson: We would have to re-edit the magazine. In the rotogravure process we would have to take out cylinders—stop the press—redo cylinders, put them back in, in order to change the content inside.

Senator Sparrow: Well, I wasn't talking about the content—I was talking about the publisher's name.

Mr. Goodson: Well, that is part of the content.

Senator Sparrow: Well, it wouldn't matter necessarily in every issue throughout Canada in every newspaper—when the reader picks up the Ottawa Journal—surely the average reader must not realize that this is in fact not printed only by the Ottawa Journal.

Mr. Goodson: Well, surprisingly enough we receive a limited number of letters addressed directly to us; most of the letters to the editor come to us from a member newspaper—people do write to the member newspaper.

Senator Sparrow: Well, this is the point I am getting at. The point I am trying to get at is that they think that it is in fact printed by the Ottawa Journal and in fact it is not?

Mr. Goodson: That is right. That was a decision that was made a long time ago. We thought that that was an advantage.

Senator Sparrow: Well, it may be an advantage to you or to the newspaper, yes, but I wonder if it is in fact an advantage to the reader? I wonder if it is not a deceptive publication as such?

Mr. Goodson: I think not.

The Chairman: Mr. Goodson, what do you put on the masthead of the papers which are distributed through controlled circulation?

Mr. Goodson: In Hamilton we have "Compliments of the Toronto Telegram", which was a concession to the Toronto Telegram because it did infringe on part of their area. The wording Mr. Louthood?

Mr. Lewis Louthood, Vice President Newspaper Relations, the Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited: The largest market circulation in Canada.

Mr. Goodson: It is a promotion plug.

The Chairman: A promotion plug with the exception of Hamilton?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you still put that on in Hamilton?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Perhaps, I will leave that for a moment.

In your brief and from the figures we have as well, your revenue in 1968 was $15½ million or 3.2 per cent of the total revenue. It increased slightly in 1969 to $16½ million...

Mr. Goodson: Excuse me, that is the revenue of all of the rotogravure sections.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, I realize that. You refer in your brief, I think it is in 21 C, to competitive factors with regard to that revenue and you refer in A to U.S.-owned magazines, Reader's Digest and Time and B, the tremendous growth of television.

When other witnesses were before us from the magazine industry, I would have gathered from their discussions and statements that they were in favour of the special provision for Reader's Digest and Time as enhancing the image of the national magazines and as enhancing the opportunities for additional revenue due to these two magazines. But it would appear in your brief that you are critical of this provision. Are you suggesting that this provision should be changed—that the special provisions should be taken away from Reader's Digest and Time and if so, would it in fact help the newspaper magazine industry?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I think we were on record at the time of the O'Leary Commission Report that the recommendations that Senator O'Leary and his commission made at that time were proper and that they should have been instituted at that time. They weren't. They were instituted for all but the two magazines that were taking a great deal of revenue out of the field and still are. Yes, I do believe that they should have been instituted at that time and should be now. I think it would release funds to the other magazines, including us.

Senator Sparrow: Yes, the magazine industry, or the other arm of it, made the same recommendation to the O'Leary Commission that you did?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: However, it appears that in the interval, they have changed their opinion and you have not changed your opinion?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I think after the report was tabled, after the recommendations went to the Government and came out differently, after a fairly short period of time, I imagine that they took for granted that nothing was going to be done and that they might just as well join forces and operate together rather than continue to scrap with each other and cause an hostile element throughout the magazine industry. I think in so doing they were probably correct. If nothing was going to be done, there was no point in carrying on a feud, nor have we carried on a feud. We have not carried on a feud with Reader's Digest or Time. I have myself not made reference to this for many years and I don't think any of our staff has, but I think it is worth recording at this Committee that it should have been done—it should still be done but whether or not it is done, I don't know.

The Chairman: Well, you clearly then diverge from the position of the magazine industry as such. They were here and told us, as Senator Sparrow has indicated, that they are now in favour of the exemption enjoyed by Time and Reader's Digest. You disagree with that, do you?

Mr. Goodson: Yes I do. I think they would have a difficult time operating under the umbrella of the Magazine Advertising Bureau and at the same time fighting with their own image.

The Chairman: Is the membership of Time and Reader's Digest in the Magazine Advertising Bureau—would that be a factor in your considering membership?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I just couldn't say.

The Chairman: Well, if the Magazine Advertising Bureau came to you and said "Come on, join." Would you join?

Mr. Goodson: If the Magazine Advertising Bureau came to us and gave us good reason why we should be a member of the group, I would certainly consider joining regardless of Reader's Digest or Time. I have no grievance against Reader's Digest or Time, but I don't think I would change my mind on what I think should have been done.

The Chairman: You think what should have been done, should be done now?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

The Chairman: I take the point that you have no hostility against Time or Reader's Digest but they might well say with friends like you who needs enemies...

Mr. Goodson: That is right.

The Chairman: You are in favour of dropping the exemption?

Mr. Goodson: Yes. I think that Senator O'Leary and his group went into it very thoroughly and they came up with very strong and positive recommendations which were not followed through.

The Chairman: Well, we are interested in updating what Senator O'Leary said and what he says now and what the magazine industry says now. If I could just ask you one other question on paragraph 21 C which Senator Sparrow has been dealing with. Are those "competitive factors" listed in order of priority?

Mr. Goodson: No. They would be listed in order of priority if they were reversed.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Has anyone else any questions on that before I proceed to something else?

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: One supplementary if I may, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Goodson, if Senator O'Leary's recommendations had become law, do you know whether or not the advertising which was, still is directed to those publications, Time and Reader's Digest, would have automatically been given for good and valid consideration to Canadian magazines such as yours?

Mr. Goodson: I don't think anyone can come out and make the flat statement but what it would have done is, it would have certainly released a good deal of funds to which we could have put our efforts to bringing into our publication. Yes, I think a very high proportion of it would have ended up in the other Canadian magazines.

Mr. Fortier: There was an independent but authoritative study which was made in the early 1960s on that very point. We cannot disclose the identity of the parties who made this survey, but what would you say if I told you that their conclusion was that only 13 per cent of that advertising found in Time and Reader's Digest have found its way into really and truly Canadian magazines. Would that surprise you as being a very low proportion of total advertising?

Mr. Goodson: Yes, I would say it is very low and before commenting upon the research, from whence that came, I would say it was wrong.

Mr. Fortier: And you, without having studied the matter, you feel that the proportion of advertising we directed from those magazines to truly Canadian magazines is much higher, is that correct?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Although, you have not studied the matter?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I have not studied it for a long time because when nothing happened—we accepted the inevitable and we haven't tried to dig up the bones every year for the sake of digging up bones and causing inter-publication hostility throughout the industry.

Mr. Fortier: But I don't recall at the time of your presentation before the O'Leary Commission you had made such a study as to where the advertising would go if Time and Reader's Digest...

Mr. Goodson: I don't think, quite frankly, that you could make such a study. You could attempt to, but there is a lot of difference between asking the people's opinion as to what they will do in this frame of reference and what they will do.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gallop does that every day.

Mr. Goodson: And Mr. Gallop is sometimes wrong.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but he is sometimes right. That is the basis of any research though isn't it?

Mr. Goodson: Yes, but it is opinion and when you are dealing with that aspect of the market, the opinion can often say one thing and the person offering the opinion can often do the other. This has been proven with publications that have tried to come into being and they have gone to the members of the advertising fraternity and said—would you advertise in such and such a magazine and it was brought out and they go back and then the advertisers would say "Well, prove yourself first". Before they get a chance to prove themselves, they don't exist. There just isn't enough money to go around.

The Chairman: The gap between motivational and behavioural studies, I agree, is quite considerable but just to wrap this up and return to Senator Sparrow—if this exemption for Time and Reader's Digest were removed at the present time, the newspaper Weekend Magazine would survive in your opinion?

Mr. Goodson: Certainly.

The Chairman: Would the balance of the Canadian magazine industry?

Mr. Goodson: I think they would not only survive, but that they would survive with greater revenue because a greater pot suddenly appears.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: A supplementary, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Goodson, when Senator O'Leary appeared as a witness before us, you will probably recall that he suggested if he were writing his report today he would not make such a recommendation because the magazine industry, of which you are a part in Canada—his comment was, it wasn't worth saving—"that it wasn't Canadian" I believe were his words.

The Chairman: In fairness to Senator O'Leary I don't think he went quite as far as to say that he wouldn't have made the recommendations. I don't think he did. I think he said he wondered if the magazine industry was worth saving today. I think you are right there, but I think if you read the transcript you will find—he went almost that far, but I don't think he went quite that far.

Senator McElman: Well, he is such a compelling speaker he convinced me that that was what he said. All right, he came very close to saying that the magazine industry, in his opinion, was not worth saving. What is your opinion over a period of let us say the last five or ten years. Has the Canadian magazine industry improved, held its own, deteriorated, and if so in what fashion?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I would hesitate to hold myself up as an expert on what each and every magazine should do.

Senator McElman: Well, I don't ask you to be an expert.

Mr. Goodson: I think each and every magazine is trying to find its particular role in the magazine industry. I think probably the classic example of that is the change in outlook of Maclean's Magazine over the last few years. Maclean's was considered to be a thoughtful and staid magazine for a long time. Today, it is a completely different magazine and it is holding its own, whereas it had slipped for a long time. Now, that doesn't mean to say that every one of us here likes what is being done with Maclean's; some might harp back and say that they liked it better as it was. Each is trying to find its own and I think Senator O'Leary is probably expressing his own personal opinion for his own personal taste.

I can't put myself inside Senator O'Leary's mind, but I would suspect that after being bombarded by the Canadian magazine group for the length of time that his commission was meeting, I think he probably was upset when they turned around and jumped in bed with Reader's Digest and Time in the Magazine Advertising Bureau. They had made such strong protestations and when the whole thing was over, the protestations turned out to be another word very close.

Senator McElman: Phonetic reaction, action and reaction...

Mr. Goodson: It could be. I can't speak for Senator O'Leary but this is my opinion.

Senator McElman: Mr. Lowe, would you care to comment on this point?

Mr. Frank Lowe (Editor, Weekend Magazine): Well, I wasn't here to hear Senator O'Leary but I tried to read everything I could about it and I was puzzled; was he making the distinction that the magazines do—was he including the supplement in the magazine field? I don't know, but I don't agree with Senator O'Leary.

The Chairman: I don't think he was, in fairness. There was no reference made to a supplement on that day that I can recall.

Mr. Lowe: I think he was talking about the magazines themselves who consider themselves magazines, and the ones that don't consider us magazines.

The Chairman: Well, we forgot to ask him about you fellows and that was our mistake.

Mr. Lowe: Well, speaking up for the ignored supplement, I think our Canadian content has improved both in quantity and quality over the last five years.

Senator McElman: Well, as a magazine that was considered a non-magazine, what is your view of the other magazines in general?

Mr. Lowe: I think there has been a very genuine effort in Canada, on the part of all magazines, to put out a better product and I also feel that most of them had made a very honest effort to encourage Canadian writing and to take a good look at Canadian subjects. I am not saying that all of us have been successful, but I think the effort has been there and I think it is still there.

Senator McElman: Do you feel that other Canadian magazines have made a similar exertion or effort and are they becoming more Canadian?

Mr. Lowe: I was using this in the general term, not just about ourselves. I think all of them generally have made this effort.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Just going back a moment to the magazine not publishing of the name of the publisher and so on, you make no provision therefore for letters to the editor for opposite views to your editorial content. Is this a good thing? How do you in the magazine industry or newspaper industry handle that sort of thing? Is it through the local newspapers?

Mr. Lowe: This is a problem that we have been concerned with for some time. We seriously considered the letter-to-the-editor problem, or running a letter-to-the-editor section, but found with our long lead time that very often the best letters were coming out so long after the article in question, that there was a great chance that the reader might not connect the two. What we have been trying recently has been a Counter Attack column where we solicit sharply conflicting opinion which we try to run with the article so the two will be there for the reader.

The Chairman: You mean there is an article taking one direction and there is a counter-attack?

Mr. Lowe: Well, the article will be a straightforward magazine article outlining what is going on and what the situation is and then if somebody is willing, they can have the Counter Attack column to say that this is a bad situation, a good situation, that it should exist or shouldn't exist, and this type of thing.

The Chairman: I am not clear on this, Mr. Lowe. If there is an article—well, let's just take an example.

Mr. Lowe: It is not in every issue yet.

The Chairman: It is not in every issue?

Mr. Lowe: No.

The Chairman: Well, let us take an article in this issue—here is one—The N.H.L. sets a bad example. That was presumably, on fighting?

Mr. Goodson: Yes. This was a story—"A Little Blood Won't Hurt You."

The Chairman: Oh. I see.

Mr. Goodson: It is a story on the effect of fighting in hockey, not just the N.H.L.—it is being put into junior hockey, and this is on one particular person who makes the comment that he knows why his coach puts him on—he puts him on to get into fights.

The Chairman: Does he play for the Canadiens.

Mr. Goodson: Well, the Canadiens yes, but the junior Canadiens.

The Chairman: Yes, I think I know who it is.

Mr. Goodson: And then in this article we have a Counter Attack by Mr. Herb Sullivan.

The Chairman: This counter attacking, Mr. Lowe, you try to do this Counter Attack in the same edition?

Mr. Lowe: If we can.

The Chairman: Do you ever Counter Attack on a subject on which there is not a story?

Mr. Lowe: Actually, we haven't determined the format of this...

The Chairman: Do you select the writer and give him the idea?

Mr. Lowe: No, ... Well, if we can...

The Chairman: Do you simply select people to write the column, or do you have ideas for the column and solicit people to write them?

Mr. Lowe: No. Just taking this article I would try to find a writer, show him the article and ask him what are his opinions.

The Chairman: Well, this particular article... Holidays, Money and Gambling is by Robert McKeown.

Mr. Lowe: Yes.

The Chairman: I recall one Counter Attack by Mr. McKeown in which the object of the attack was the Senate. I don't ever recall an article in Weekend putting the Senate's position forward.

Mr. Lowe: No, but as I said we are not quite sure how this is going to evolve.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you couldn't perhaps find a writer!

Mr. Lowe: We do have what we call the floating Counter Attack which we think is something good and which the people are interested in and we do publish it as a counter attack.

The Chairman: Well, the article which Mr. McKeown wrote on the Senate. Would that be his idea or yours?

Mr. Lowe: Well, let us say that we discussed these things.

The Chairman: Well, which comes first, the article or the writer?

Mr. Lowe: Well, the idea would come first certainly. Usually a writer will come in and make a suggestion and I would agree with it and I would tell him to go ahead and write it. If I happen to have an idea, I will try to find a writer that could handle the job.

The Chairman: Do readers write you and ask for opportunities to do an article for a Counter Attack piece?

Mr. Lowe: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you have any examples of those?

Mr. Lowe: Yes.

The Chairman: Have you run any of those?

Mr. Lowe: Yes.

The Chairman: For example, which ones?

Mr. Goodson: Frank, if I may interrupt, we haven't done it that way for some time. This is a lead problem. You see, we are printed two and a half weeks before the article hits the street because we have to ship right across the country and then we are another two weeks into the plant, so if a letter... we found in the early days that if Counter Attack came out five or six weeks after the original article it lost the continuity and that is the problem.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Goodson, we were just thinking of asking for equal space.

Mr. Goodson: Well we could sell it to you.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that was my next question. Do you pay those contributors...those Counter Attack contributors?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You do?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: The same rate you would any journalist?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I have just one question on an area which hasn't been covered and it is of some interest to me. I have been advised that there are an awful lot of city dailies who have one or the other of the principal weekend magazines. I think you are very fortunate that yours is called a Weekend Magazine by the way. One of the largest newspapers, I think it is among the top six or eight in the country...is the one that is published in the City of Halifax in the morning and evening edition...I think it has a total circulation of the morning and evening editions of 120,000. Now, neither you nor the publishers of the Weekend...

The Chairman: The Canadian.

Senator Smith: The Canadian nor Weekend have been able to sell them this idea of a supplement. Can you tell me why this hasn't been possible? Is it expensive?

Mr. Goodson: No, I think it probably boils down to the fact that the publishers of that Halifax newspaper are very independent. I think I would like to toss this to our Vice President in Newspaper Relations who has had the job of selling this for quite a few years.

The Chairman: Mr. Louthood?

Mr. Louthood: The answer is very simple, I just haven't been able to sell there.

The Chairman: Have you tried?

Mr. Louthood: Yes.

The Chairman: Frequently?

Mr. Louthood: Oh yes, several times. And if you look at the history in the brief you will find that we weren't able to sell every daily newspaper in Canada from the beginning

...from 1951 right up to until, oh, I guess we were adding newspapers as recently as two years ago. It is not an automatic thing. It is not expensive...as a matter of fact, it returns a revenue to the newspaper, but it is not automatic...you don't just walk into a publisher and have him say "I will take it."

Senator Smith: If I am not wrong in this all of the...well, the Saint John daily newspapers and the Moncton daily newspapers have been with you from the beginning?

Mr. Louthood: Yes, from September 1951.

Senator Smith: Yes, and you are also sending it over to Prince Edward Island, to the Charlottetown newspaper?

Mr. Louthood: Right.

Senator Smith: And it was an obvious thing to me, and perhaps I am more conscious of it because I read a great many other newspapers up here, but my home is in Nova Scotia. The children down there don't even have a section of funnies to look at...it is rather an odd situation. So I thought there must be some easy explanation as to why a big newspaper...it is relatively a large one...doesn't carry this kind of service.

Mr. Goodson: I think it really amounts to the independent attitude of the people publishing it. We have made many representations to them and I am certain that the other newspaper magazines have as well, and I think it is simply a matter that they prefer to be completely independent of us.

Senator Smith: Well, as I can recall from the papers I see, the dailies who do subscribe to one or the other of these two services charge an extra nickel a weekend and I suppose that that nickel is supposed to cover the cost, if there is that much cost in the thing, to them. I am puzzled, quite frankly, and I am sure the people that live down around Bible Hill would be pleased to have this to sit around and read on the weekend.

Mr. Goodson: Well, if I may say, Senator Smith, you have been echoing what Mr. Louthood has been saying for years.

The Chairman: Mr. Louthood, is the Chronicle-Herald the largest paper in Canada that does not have one or the other of the weekend magazines?

Mr. Louthood: Yes.

Mr. Goodson: Well, the Globe and Mail...

The Chairman: Well, the Globe and Mail has its own magazine.

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

The Chairman: You have made the point—that presumably the publishers of the Chronicle Herald must think that they can make more money by not carrying your magazine than by carrying it?

Mr. Goodson: I think they feel that as a publisher . .

The Chairman: I am thinking of their conversion policy.

Mr. Goodson: Well, I don't know what the figures are on that.

The Chairman: You don't think that has a bearing?

Mr. Goodson: I think long before they had a conversion policy they didn't handle Week-end Magazine.

Mr. Louthood: The reaction that I have had on representations there, which goes back all the way to 1950, is that they just do not feel that they want this editorial feature in the newspaper and it is their opinion, their decision.

Senator Smith: Well, I think on behalf of the people who are forced to buy a newspaper in that kind of monopoly situation you should sell a little harder

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Louthood, perhaps you could take Senator Smith along on your next trip.

Senator McElman: Have you considered free circulation in Halifax?

Mr. Goodson: Well, we have discussed it but we haven't considered it. I would say that the basic decision back of that is that we still have hope somewhere along the line that they will change their mind.

Senator McElman: What is this conversion policy that you speak of?

The Chairman: Well, it has to do with advertising. We talked about it the day they were here.

Mr. Fortier: May not one of the reasons be that, as you say in your brief Mr. Lowe, that no subject was to be taboo. Could that possibly be one of the reasons?

The Chairman: For them not accepting the supplement?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, for them not accepting it.

Mr. Louthood: In the many representations we have made to them—to the publisher and to the board—they have never had anything but very nice things to say about our editorial content but they just didn't want it.

Mr. Fortier: Well, just following along with that sentence which states that no subject was to be taboo, I would like to turn Mr. Goodson to paragraph 14 A on page 4 where you speak of the contractual arrangement between the Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited and the daily newspapers. You have three sub-paragraphs where you explain what this arrangement consists of. In (a)—the last sentence, I see that under this arrangement, under this contractual agreement the obligation of the member newspaper, so to speak, is to distribute a copy in each issue of its Saturday newspaper. The newspaper undertakes to distribute a copy in each issue of its Saturday newspaper. Is that correct?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You undertake to deliver it in time to be included in the Saturday edition and they undertake to deliver it. Now, what do you do when in fact they don't deliver the whole copy as happened in September where you had an article on homosexuality? What do you do to your member newspapers?

Mr. Goodson: Well, we fight with them a little bit first.

Mr. Fortier: Did you know that they were going to—Mr. Bassett, for example, was going to have, I don't know how many thousands of people tear sheets out of the weekend section? By the way, I wonder if he had his people tear those pages of the homosexual article from the ones which were delivered compliments of his company in Hamilton?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: He did?

Mr. Goodson: He arranged that and I think that the bulk of them, we were able to pull out.

Mr. Fortier: You were warned before this actually took place, is that right?

Mr. Goodson: We were warned in Mr. Bassett's case on Thursday prior to the Saturday of distribution.

Mr. Fortier: Did you tell him that under his agreement with the Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited, he had to distribute a copy in each issue of the Saturday newspaper?

Mr. Goodson: First and foremost during the conversations—that particular conversation with Mr. Bassett—I had very little opportunity to tell him anything.

Mr. Fortier: Well, we had the same experience with him in December.

Mr. Goodson: However, contractually they must distribute the newspaper; however, they do have in the contract the ability to opt out of an issue but they in turn then must compensate any advertiser that does not receive the copy.

Mr. Louthood: Yes, the contract allows for a publisher to make a decision that if there is any material in there for any reason, permissiveness or offensiveness, he may withhold it, but he is then responsible for...

The Chairman: You mean withhold the entire issue?

Mr. Louthood: The entire issue but he is then responsible for the refund that must be made to the advertisers for that portion of the issue.

Mr. Fortier: For any advertising this is on those pages?

Mr. Louthood: He would keep the whole issue off.

The Chairman: "Their whole issue", he is saying.

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: But what about the section that was taken out in this particular case, the three or the four pages. There would, automatically, I would assume, be advertising on those pages?

Mr. Goodson: It happened in that particular issue that it affected, I believe, only one advertisement and this was the reason why the newspaper who disagreed with the particular feature stripped the pages rather than withhold the issue. This was one reason because they would have had to repay a rebate for everything in the issue.

Senator Sparrow: Did they in fact pay a rebate on the small bit of advertising?

Mr. Goodson: Yes they did.

Senator Sparrow: That was the responsibility of the daily newspaper?

Mr. Goodson: Yes. It was also the responsibility of the papers to pay for any stripping that they did.

The Chairman: Has any publisher ever exercised his right to withdraw an issue—an entire issue?

Mr. Louthood: Yes, once many, many years ago.

The Chairman: Would you tell us about it?

Mr. Louthood: It involved a movie advertisement I believe about 15 or 16 years ago. It was in one of the smaller newspapers and he felt that the movie ad was offensive. That is the only case that I know of.

The Chairman: Have there been other instances of publishers clipping out pages, as so many did on this one?

Mr. Goodson: This was a new one to us; this was the first time that this had happened.

The Chairman: When would Mr. Bassett and the others see that paper?

Mr. Goodson: We mail advance copies—they receive them at least a week in advance before the publication.

The Chairman: Did Mr. Bassett call you right away and say that he was unhappy with this article?

Mr. Goodson: No, as I mentioned he called on the Thursday prior to the Saturday and it obviously had not been brought to his attention until that time.

The Chairman: Mr. Lowe, would you describe Mr. Bassett's actions as a form of censorship?

Mr. Lowe: Yes. I think if you take something out of any magazine or newspaper it is a form of censorship.

The Chairman: Did they explain—in other words if I take the Toronto Telegram, which I happen to take but I don't actually recall this—these pages were removed. Was there an explanation anywhere in the daily paper or was it just left to the reader's imagination?

Mr. Lowe: I can't recall any.

Mr. Goodson: In most newspapers they did put a box in the front of the newspaper...

Mr. Louthood: I am pretty sure there was a box on the front page of the Telegram.

Mr. Goodson: Yes, and I think most of the others made reference to it.

Senator Sparrow: How many newspapers withdrew it?

The Chairman: Twenty-five distributed it and 14 censored it. Is that about right?

Mr. Goodson: No, not necessarily but I am afraid I don't have the figures with me.

The Chairman: Mr. Lowe, what was the reaction to the article in the papers which distributed it?

Mr. Lowe: We got very few outraged screams and it seemed to pass without any undue comment at all, I would say.

Senator Sparrow: Did it in any way force you to review your editorial policy after that?

Mr. Lowe: No.

The Chairman: Well, that was the question I was going to ask you, particularly as Mr. Goodson in his oral statement made reference to the permissive society and that the hottest publications, to use your words, were Playboy and Cosmopolitan. With those kinds of competition you must be tempted to move a little bit in that direction. Aren't you inhibited at all with this experience?

Mr. Goodson: No. We were surprised but I can't say we were inhibited at all.

The Chairman: Well, you are not inhibited now, for example?

Mr. Lowe: No. I don't think we would ever, in a magazine such as ours, attempt to take full advantage of the permissive society because of our distribution and so on. This particular article you are talking about did not contain any four letter words or things like that.

The Chairman: Well, may I just ask one other question on it. It is a supplementary to yours, Mr. Fortier, and I apologize but I just have but this one other question. Mr. Lowe, this may be a difficult question to answer but what was the rationale which led you to have this kind of article in a weekend newspaper magazine?

Mr. Lowe: Well, the rationale at the time, if I recall it, was because of the discussion in Parliament at that time. Homosexuality was being discussed in Parliament; it was being reported in all the daily newspapers in Canada and it seemed to me that this was one aspect of this problem we could do without. We had no intention of offending anybody and we thought it was a legitimate field in which to move, and that is the editorial thinking behind it.

Mr. Fortier: The member newspapers have full discretion as to whether or not they will distribute all or part of any issue of Weekend Magazine, is that correct?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Is this made clear to your advertisers when you sell them space?

Mr. Goodson: No, but we don't anticipate this as a problem inasmuch as we have been almost 20 years in existence and we have had one, I guess you would call that a major incident and one minor incident. It is not something that we are being deceptive by not telling advertisers that maybe your ad won't appear. We take for granted that it is going to appear when it is booked.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but you do not control the actual appearance of the advertisement in the member newspaper.

Mr. Goodson: No.

Mr. Fortier: You do not control it in actual fact?

Mr. Goodson: In that particular frame of reference, no.

Mr. Fortier: Well, then following on from what Senator Sparrow said earlier about a masthead in the Weekend Magazine, don't you feel here again that you do have a duty to your advertisers to say "Gentlemen, you are paying us money to have your product advertised in this or that community but we in the end do not control whether or not that ad will appear. We don't know, it is up to John Bassett, or Mr. Blackburn, or—"

Mr. Goodson: I don't really think it is necessary to incorporate that into a sales presentation in that, as I say, we produced close to a thousand issues and had just one incident and in that case we would be just penalizing ourselves.

Mr. Louthood: If I may just add to that—the advertiser has the substantiation, the proof through the ABC reports of Weekend Magazine which states that all these publishers, all these newspapers have distributed so many copies of Weekend Magazine with their newspapers; so he does have documentation.

Mr. Fortier: Well, he would be equally interested in whether or not it will be published in Weekend Magazine the week that his advertisement appears.

Mr. Goodson: We can as for instance not guarantee, nor can anyone else, that a strike won't stop it.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I think this is somewhat different here. Tell me did any one of the publishers—I don't mean necessarily Mr. Bassett...

Mr. Goodson: He was the last to come to.

Mr. Fortier: The last but most vocal. Did any one of the publishers indicate to you on what basis they were not going to allow their readers to see that article? Did any one of them tell you that?

Mr. Goodson: Yes, they picked about three different reasons.

Mr. Fortier: Could you tell us?

Mr. Goodson: Well, there was one reference to a young boy and his first introduction to homosexuality. We did not think it was sensationalism. We put it in thinking in terms of a warning to parents that these things could happen.

The Chairman: Is this the question you asked?

Mr. Fortier: No, but I will let Mr. Goodson give me this answer.

The Chairman: I think what he was asking you was what were the objections they had?

Mr. Fortier: How did they set themselves up as defenders of their readers' public morals?

Mr. Goodson: Really, I don't think anybody stated why they set themselves up as the defenders of public morals.

Mr. Fortier: Did anybody say that it was obscene or that people in Toronto shouldn't read that?

Mr. Goodson: Well, in their opinion as publishers or editors it was not a fit article to be read by their readers.

Mr. Fortier: Did they tell you why?

Mr. Goodson: In each instance I believe the comment was made that if it had been edited differently it would have been acceptable. It wasn't the fact that it was a homosexual article, but they did object to portions of it. Different publishers saw something wrong in different areas and they were all talking to each other.

Mr. Fortier: Did any one of them say to you—"we have a responsibility to not let our readers read this sort of article"?

Mr. Goodson: Oh, I would really not—it is not something that is engraved on my mind as to what exactly they did say. You must remember that I was talking over a period of a day and a half to something like 20 or 25 different people and every time the phone rang I said "Ah, here is another vote, which way is it going."

Mr. Fortier: Did you at any time—you or Mr. Lowe—attempt to convince your interlocutor of the error of his ways; that you were right and he was wrong—that every newspaper reader in Canada—everyone of your two million odd subscribers should be allowed to read it?

Mr. Goodson: Certainly.

Mr. Fortier: You did?

Mr. Goodson: Yes, and some of them took a couple of days before coming to a final decision.

Mr. Fortier: We consider this very important, as the Chairman said earlier, as a form of censorship, which has been exercised by individual publishers. Did you at any time say to them or any one of them, that people in Toronto, let us say, would not be allowed to read it but people in Montreal will? Did you use that argument?

Mr. Goodson: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: To no avail?

Mr. Goodson: To no avail. They were aware of it and in actual fact in some of the chains there was no agreement throughout the chains for instance. Some did, some didn't. Winnipeg didn't, but Vancouver did. It was a matter of opinion, or personal opinion of the editor or the publisher.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Did you in fact, by your argument, change the initial opinion of any of them who said we will not carry that and they eventually did carry it as a result of your discussions with them?

Mr. Goodson: Well, there were some who called to find out what was being done without having made up their minds one way or the other and then some fell on one side of the fence and then some on the other. Now, whether or not I sold them or whether they were wavering enough that they decided themselves, I don't really know. I don't really know how much anything I said affected them. I think they made up their own minds on it. Some called and said "What's being done" and then they decided themselves—it fell both ways. The ones that carried it carried it quite happily in most instances.

The Chairman: May I say to the Senators that we have another brief which we will be receiving this morning from Southstar. There may be some other questions for these people, but I think we have perhaps dealt with this particular line of questioning at sufficient length. I would like to conclude this brief in approximately ten minutes if we can.

Senator Sparrow:

Senator Sparrow: Almost without exception, in the presentations we have had before this Committee, we have been assured by the publishers that they have in no way interfered with editors or editorial content. This appears to me that if the 14 newspapers are—if this was a correct figure—it seems to me that there were at least 14 of them that interfered with editorial content. Would you agree with that statement?

Mr. Goodson: Well, they obviously interfered with it because they removed it.

Senator Sparrow: In your brief in paragraph 13A you refer to distribution of your magazine door-to-door in some cities. You go on to say:

"Weekend Magazine is distributed door to door in the cities of London, Hamilton, Regina, Saskatoon and Edmonton to 70 per cent of the households in those cities."

How do you determine 70 per cent and who are the 30 per cent in those cities that don't get that magazine?

Mr. Goodson: It is an arbitrary decision when it boils down. We don't think it is necessary to distribute to 100 per cent; the cost would be that much higher and we have arrived at that as a figure that is a good figure commercially. We have some areas that we eliminate from the standpoint, some high rise areas which can be difficult and we tend to move to the middle income bracket.

Senator Sparrow: So the 30 per cent portion is perhaps then the low income areas that wouldn't be receiving...

Mr. Goodson: It is a combination of low income and say the high rise apartment areas which can be difficult to deliver to.

Senator Sparrow: Why would high rise be difficult?

Mr. Goodson: We don't want the magazine stuck—200 stuck in one pile when they can be delivered to an individual box and that is satisfactory. I think Mr. Louthood could perhaps answer that question.

Mr. Louthood: Generally speaking we aim at 70 per cent of the better income areas but the high rise that Mr. Goodson was referring to—we do not allow the distributor to put a pile of 50, say, in the apartment lobby. We don't allow this unless he can deliver them door-to-door to the apartments or in the individual mail boxes; and if he can't do that we cannot do that apartment.

Senator Kinneare: Are there any restrictions on you going in to put them in the mail boxes?

Mr. Louthood: I am afraid I couldn't answer that question.

Senator Kinneare: Well, I think that is important.

Mr. Louthood: I think in many cases they had arrangements with the superintendents in the buildings. I am afraid I just can't answer your question.

Senator Kinneare: I think only the post office department should be putting mail in the boxes.

Mr. Goodson: Well, the post box in an apartment for newspapers is not necessarily—I don't think is an official post box, is it? The one with the key is, but I believe they do have brackets for packaged delivery.

The Chairman: Not in Senator Kinnear's apartment.

Senator Smith: I notice the reference that Senator Sparrow just made—you distribute Weekend Magazine in this fashion in two cities like Regina and Saskatoon and Senator Sparrow tells me just now that the general population in those particular areas would be about a hundred and...

Senator Sparrow: Forty thousand.

Senator Smith: One hundred and forty thousand each, and it makes me more puzzled. Why don't you do this same thing in this Halifax-Dartmouth complex? I am sure that there are 200,000 people that live there now.

Mr. Goodson: As I explained earlier we would still like to consider Halifax as a potential newspaper...

Senator Smith: Well, it has had potential for 20 years.

The Chairman: Well, let me ask you this. If our friends from Southstar who are going to come in a few minutes were able to sell the Chronicle Herald on carrying The Canadian in their paper, would you all of a sudden appear on the mail boxes in Halifax?

Mr. Goodson: Well, inasmuch as the President of Southstar is here I am not about to reveal our competitive strategy.

The Chairman: Well, is there a pretty good chance that you would?

Mr. Goodson: I would prefer not to comment.

The Chairman: Well, I think you have answered it before.

Mr. Goodson: Well, I would say that we would certainly give it some consideration.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Each of these other cities are ones in which a competitor does distribute, is that correct?

Mr. Goodson: Yes, that is not a coincidence.

Senator McElman: It is rather significant.

Senator Sparrow: As a social type of magazine, particularly in the articles and so on, it seems to me that you are distributing it for the benefit of the advertiser rather than 30 per cent of the people who might very well benefit from these articles on possible social changes, and so on. It seems to me that if you are distributing it on a widely free basis that there is a definite discrimination against the low income people in the cities that are not receiving this newspaper. Really, if your plan is, and I appreciate your plan is to make a profit, well, isn't there discrimination in that aspect?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I think you would have to apply that to virtually any controlled circulation publication that exists. We don't believe so.

Mr. Fortier: I don't know of any controlled circulation publication though that controls its circulation on the basis of low or high income.

The Chairman: Oh, yes.

Mr. Goodson: There are many.

The Chairman: Many of them do.

Mr. Goodson: The markets are selected for commercial reasons.

Mr. Fortier: As opposed to a particular sector of the community?

Mr. Goodson: Well, community not in terms of geography, yes.

Mr. Fortier: No, but in terms of professional competence...

Mr. Goodson: Certainly.

Mr. Fortier: But not necessarily...

Mr. Goodson: Well, taking this down this way, a controlled circulation magazine going into the building industry, would then have to be distributed to each and every individual carpenter, and so on.

Mr. Fortier: I still think Senator Sparrow's point is well taken. A magazine catering to the building industry is not one or the same as one like yours which caters, as you said in your oral comment, to a broad social spectrum. How broad is a social spectrum?

Mr. Louthood: Well, I suppose it is economic, but you must remember, too, that in your 30 per cent, there are illiterate areas of the city where hardly any magazine or newspaper or periodical reaches.

Senator Sparrow: Exactly. This is my point.

Mr. Louthood: It is an economic or arbitrary decision as to how many you are going to distribute within terms of...

The Chairman: What percentage of people in Edmonton are illiterate?

Mr. Louthood: I couldn't answer that question.

The Chairman: Do you think it is one per cent?

Mr. Louthood: Well, I have no idea.

The Chairman: Well, you used the word illiterate, Mr. Louthood—you said you don't distribute to the illiterate section...

Mr. Goodson: I suspect he shouldn't have used that word.

Mr. Louthood: Well, you do have illiteracy in the English language.

The Chairman: Well, you don't have illiteracy in Edmonton, or Regina, or Hamilton, or Toronto?

Mr. Louthood: Well, you have your foreign population.

The Chairman: Well, you could hardly call the foreign populations illiterate?

Mr. Goodson: Well, at any rate he is using the term illiterate in the sense of reading English rather than in the terms of education.

Senator Sparrow: It is a straight economic thing.

Mr. Goodson: It is straight economics.

Senator Sparrow: I have just one other question and I would like to yield to Senator McElman in a moment. I would like to ask you about MagnaMedia, but perhaps we won't have time and I will ask the next group about that. However, in 14 (c) you say:

"All publishing and printing costs are reported and open to verification by auditors named by the Weekend Magazine member newspapers. After all costs have been met from advertising revenue, the balance, if any, is refunded to the member newspapers pro rata circulation, with a share to The Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited."

Two questions. One, what shares goes to the Montreal Standard Publishing Company Limited if there is a profit and if there is a loss, who covers the loss?

Mr. Goodson: If there was a loss, it would be covered similar to a profit pro rata circulation. We haven't had one.

Senator Sparrow: You haven't had one?

Mr. Goodson: No.

Senator Sparrow: And the profit?

Mr. Goodson: Can we say this in camera?

The Chairman: Well, if you would prefer to write us on it, that would be fine.

Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Louthood, you are a director of Perspectives Inc?

Mr. Louthood: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Who are your co-directors?

Mr. Louthood: Mr. Fortier, we have a board of 11 co-directors. I think we are on record with the president that I can't speak for Perspectives Inc. but I can speak for Montreal Standard which does public relations for Perspectives.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I believe this is important...

Mr. Louthood: The co-directors are the other representatives of the newspapers publishing Perspectives who own Perspectives Incorporated, who are the majority shareholders.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Chairman, since we do not have anyone from Perspectives here as a witness...

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Louthood is a director of Perspectives.

Mr. Fortier: Exactly, and that is why I was asking the question and I gather Mr...

Mr. Louthood: Mr. Mercier is in the room.

Mr. Fortier: And I think perhaps the question should be directed to him.

The Chairman: Well, what is the question?

Mr. Fortier: It is a twofold question. What is the share distribution...

The Chairman: Well, if I may say to Mr. Mercier, who I believe is still here—we could not alert him to this possibility and I don't know whether he would care to have this question put to him or not. In fairness to him, if he doesn't want it put to him I don't think we can. If he would agree to answer we would of course be delighted.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Mercier, would you tell us who are the shareholders of Perspectives Inc. and who are its Directors, please?

Mr. Alfred Mercier, Editor of "Perspectives": The shareholders are the member newspapers, meaning, "La Presse"...

Mr. Fortier: Could you go on, please? I asked you if you could give us the distribution of the shares of Perspectives Inc. and then give us the names of the Directors of the company?

Mr. Mercier: The share capital of Perspectives Inc. is divided into three classes. Class A, 7,700 shares, held by the member newspapers, I believe that you have the list, Mr. Fortier. The B shares, 2,300 shares, are held by the Montreal Standard. And Class C, 1000 shares, are owned by the Montreal Standard. The Directors of Perspectives Inc. are the member newspapers; one representative per newspaper. In the case of newspapers with more than 125,000, they are entitled to two directors. Under the circumstances, these are "La Presse" and "Le Soleil". Montreal Standard is entitled to two directors.

Mr. Fortier: Are all the Class A, B and C shares entitled to the same privileges, or are there privileges that are particular to them?

Mr. Mercier: The Class C does not have the same privileges—what do you understand by "privileges"?

Mr. Fortier: From the point of view of shares, the strongest?

Mr. Mercier: The Class A and Class B, have voting rights.

Mr. Fortier: In equal proportion, or...

Mr. Mercier: In equal proportion. Except, there is a clause—there is an agreement that nothing can be changed, unless two-thirds of the majority, unless two-thirds of the shares...

Mr. Fortier: Do you mean to say that the Letters Patent of the company cannot be changed?

Mr. Mercier: Yes, exactly, the Letters Patent.

Mr. Fortier: This cannot be done, regardless of the resolution, by an application?

Mr. Mercier: The Letters Patent, the basis, the by-laws of the company.

Mr. Fortier: And the Class C shares, the 1,000 shares held by Montreal Standard, are non-voting shares?

Mr. Mercier: No.

Mr. Fortier: Are these shares of a preferred type?

Mr. Mercier: That is not a privilege, that was simply to establish the proportion of 26 per cent. No member can hold more than 26 per cent of the shares.

Mr. Fortier: No member can hold more than 26 per cent?

Mr. Mercier: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Montreal Standard has 3,300 shares, is that correct?

Mr. Mercier: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And the member newspapers, 7,500?

Mr. Mercier: 7,700.

Mr. Fortier: Now then, "Perspective-Dimanche", I believe that only "Dimanche-Matin" holds...?

Mr. Mercier: "Perspectives-Dimanche" was formed, because—that is a rather long story.

Mr. Fortier: Was it because the paper appeared the next morning?

Mr. Mercier: Not exactly. We had a vacuum in Montreal, and "La Presse" did not wish to participate in "Perspectives" unless it had control of the shares, to which we never wished to consent.

Mr. Fortier: Is that "La Presse" after the new administration or before?

Mr. Mercier: Before. So, in order to fill that vacuum, we finally approached the "Dimanche-Matin" and they distributed "Perspectives" as such. When the new administration of "La Presse" appeared, which agreed to distribute "Perspectives", we were of the opinion that we could not drop "Dimanche-Matin". So, at that time we published "Perspectives-Dimanche" with an entirely different editorial content as "Perspectives". In order to avoid that duplication, we thought that we should have an altogether different editorial content. The advertising makeup is exactly the same, except that the advertisers have the option to advertise one week earlier or one week later, or to make an arrangement in that manner.

Mr. Fortier: Is "Dimanche-Matin" the only one distributing "Perspectives-Dimanche"?

Mr. Mercier: Only "Dimanche-Matin".

Mr. Fortier: And the editorial content is written by the team of the "Dimanche-Matin"?

Mr. Mercier: By the team of "Perspectives".

Mr. Fortier: Of "Perspectives" or of "Perspectives-Dimanche"?

Mr. Mercier: That is the same personnel, with the same Director, Pierre Gascon.

Mr. Fortier: So, that means that the team of "Perspectives" publishes two newspapers per week?

Mr. Mercier: The team of Perspectives Incorporee. The team of Perspectives Incorporee published two magazines: "Perspectives" and "Perspectives-Dimanche".

Mr. Fortier: Is there ever a duplication in the text?

Mr. Mercier: In the text, yes.

Mr. Fortier: Thank you.

[English]

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Mercier.

I am going to suggest the following. I think that one of the matters we had wanted to talk to you about and we haven't is the operation of MagnaMedia which I think is an important part of the discussion we are having this morning. I am going to suggest, however, that we perhaps adjourn for five minutes but following the adjournment we receive the brief from Southstar. If we could prevail upon you Mr. Goodson—I don't like to do this, it is an unusual procedure, but if you wouldn't mind staying for the balance of the morning—when we come to discuss MagnaMedia I think, in fairness, that perhaps not all of our MagnaMedia questions should be put to the Southstar people. If you could perhaps be available in the room we would be most grateful. It is now 11.40 a.m. and I am going to suggest that we adjourn for five minutes and reconvene at 11.45 a.m. to hear the Southstar brief.

.. A short recess.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, if I may call this session back to order. The second brief we are going to receive this morning is from Southstar Publishers Limited, publishers of The Canadian and The Star Weekly. Sitting on my immediate right is Mr. E. J. Mannion, who is the President and Publisher of The Canadian Magazine and the President of Southstar Publishers Limited. On my immediate left is Mr. Michael Hanlon, the Editor of The Canadian Magazine, and sitting on Mr. Mannion's right is Mr. George Floyd, who is the comptroller of Southstar Publishers Limited.

I should perhaps add that I am grateful to Mr. Goodson for remaining in the room and we are, as I said, grateful to Mr. Goodson and his colleagues.

Mr. Mannion, I must say that the brief you have prepared for us was received three weeks in advance. I know you were here earlier this morning so I won't take time to go through all the things I usually say at this point, so why don't you just proceed with your oral statement.

Mr. J. Mannion, President, Southstar Publishers Limited: Thank you Mr. Chairman and honourable Senators. Thank you for the opportunity to meet with you and to present our ideas. Mr. Hanlon and Mr. Floyd have already been introduced so I won't comment further on them. I am delighted, however, that two of our Directors are also with us this morning—Mr. Honderich, who is the President and Publisher of the Toronto Star and Mr. Fisher who is the Vice President and Managing Director of Southam Press Ltd. Both of them are directors of Southstar Publishers Limited.

We will be pleased to answer any questions you may have for us and to provide you with the details and information you are seeking.

Our written brief has given you the complete details of our corporate structure: our history, the performance and the effectiveness of our publication, our editorial content and philosophy, the economic state of our industry, and the steps we are taking to improve our present position.

I would like to summarize that submission as briefly as possible. But perhaps before I do, because of the fact that our publications seem to cause some confusion to some people, I would like to show you what they are.

This is The Canadian magazine which is distributed in 12 daily newspapers in Canada and has a total circulation of a million six, one hundred thousand. It is the exact same publication as the Star Weekly log type which is sold on newsstands and from door-to-door by newsboys and has a circulation of approximately 400,000. It is the identical magazine; but in the Star Weekly version we add three additional sections: The Canadian Panorama was introduced about 18 months ago and is a potpourri of various happenings and events in Canada which are of interest to a great many Canadians but which do not have the significance to justify being in the magazine or rotogravure section. Secondly we carry a novel, traditional feature in the Star Weekly and which receives a great deal of interest from our subscribers. We also have 12 pages of coloured comics. Once a month in addition to that, we publish Canadian Homes Magazine which runs as a supplement in both The Canadian and the Star Weekly. It is a publication entirely devoted to new trends in housing in Canada, do-it-yourself, ways to build condominiums, et cetera. Those basically are our publications.

That we continue to publish a distinctively Canadian magazine is of great concern to us. Magazine journalism—and especially colour photo journalism which we practise perhaps more than anyone else in this country—is an important and indeed vital branch of the media.

Newspapers report the news events as they happen, interpret them fully in many cases, and do an excellent job. Television and radio bring an even greater immediacy to the public's relationship to events. However they do not bring to the issues the same depth of reporting and interpretation that newspapers do. Magazines present yet another perspective.

We cannot attempt to cover news events as they happen, yet we can add depth and dimension to their presentation to the public. We can gather together the loose threads of stories that have never been told completely. We can show, through colour-photo journalism, aspects of Canada and Canadian events that are often unavailable in other media.

I feel our role is distinctive and vital. We produce one of the only two English language national newspaper distributed magazines and the only national Canadian weekly magazine on sale on the newsstands in Canada today. Is it not, therefore, extremely important that we continue to publish a vital, distinctively Canadian magazine?

The Canadian magazine delivers more than 100 editorial pages a month into over two million Canadian homes (that is almost 50 per cent of all the English speaking homes in Canada). The Star Weekly portion of our circulation delivers almost 200 editorial pages a month. No Canadian periodical, and few in the world, deliver that much editorial content. Most important, all of it is of specific interest to the residents of Canada.

We realize that we have a great responsibility which goes with the size of this publication. We are very conscious that we speak to the whole country and try to give a national view to as many issues as possible. We know that our viewpoint on a particular subject will be brought to the attention of a very significant segment of the population.

There is no room for irresponsible action. There is, however, room for irreverence, room for an ironic sidelong glance at many institutions or principles that some hold sacred, room for questioning, room for refusing to accept the pat, readily available answer, room for digging a little deeper than some people might wish, room occasionally for shocking, and, quite often I hope, room for giving the people of Canada a good belly laugh.

All of these things are possible for us. The people of Canada are fortunate indeed in having a completely free press. I think they are fortunate also in the fact that we can publish each week an independent magazine with complete freedom. Fortunate too, that the parent companies of Southstar Publishers (Southam Press and the Toronto Star) saw the need for a publication such as ours and was prepared to carry it financially through its very costly launching and initial operating difficulties.

It is a safe assumption, I think, that because of the tremendous costs involved, and the competitive factors presently in existence, there will never be another national magazine launched in this country. This is tragic, in my judgment, considering the need for as many channels of communication as possible in a changing and developing country, but it is nevertheless an economic fact of life in Canada today.

It is my fervent hope that this Committee will recognize the great economic difficulties of publishing magazines in this country, the necessity for such magazines to be available to the Canadian public to help create and build a Canadian unity, Canadian awareness and Canadian pride.

We think that the launching and development of Canadian magazines is extremely important. We subscribe entirely to the contention of Mr. Lloyd Hodgkinson, publisher of Chatelaine magazine. You will recall, he told this committee that his publication "Miss Chatelaine" could not have come into existence without the protection written into the law in 1965 that this allowed the cost of advertising in the Canadian edition of an American magazine as a tax deductible business expense. Had this law not been passed, he said, "Seventeen" magazine would have come into Canada with a Canadian edition and cut the market out from under "Miss Chatelaine."

We believe that Canada will never have a viable periodical press as long as foreign publications of any kind are allowed to dump editorial matter into this country at a fraction of the cost.

We believe that it would be possible for new Canadian magazines to begin publishing in future if they did not have to compete head-to-head with subsidized publications from other countries. Canadian communications media expect and welcome competition, and the Canadian public is better served because of it. But even existing Canadian publications find it extremely difficult to operate in an unequal competitive situation.

Our readers obviously represent a cross-section of the whole of Canada. Their reactions to our articles firmly indicate to us that they are sufficiently interested in the Canadian viewpoint in all matters that they strongly support this contention.

I included excerpts from many letters in my written brief. I am proud of those letters because they arrived unsolicited, commenting on our attempt to build a Canadian identity, even though we have never publicly stated that it was our intention to promote Canada. We are pleased, of course, to find that our message is getting through to our readers by our performance alone.

Here is a letter that arrived just last week that perhaps sums up the way a lot of our readers feel. It is not a very significant letter—there certainly is no major issue involved. It is a completely unimportant subject, and to a degree it is corny. But I think it sums it up. We carried an article just the week before last... a fashion article on women's dress and was entitled "Vested Interest." I received this letter and this is the type of letter that we receive a great deal of and I would like to read it to you.

"Just a note to tell you how great I think your Canadian Magazine is. One of the features I like best is the fashions by Helen Myer. At this minute I am looking at her "Vested Interest" feature. It is as chic as anything that one might find in Vogue. Yet, it's Canadian. Hooray! Good for her! Good for you! I have nothing to do with fashion, no vested interest but I just thought you should be commended."

This is what we are trying to do. We are trying to present a Canadian viewpoint in every possible area. It is an extremely difficult thing to do but I think that letter sums up the type of reaction that we are getting from the ordinary individual Canadian.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Mannion. I think the questioning will begin once again with Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: We would like to get into a discussion on MagnaMedia but to start with I noted that the last of your comments were with regard to letters to the editors. I note that you do print the publisher's name in The Canadian Magazine, and the address and editor's name. Where do your letters to the editor go? Do they go directly to your magazine?

Mr. Mannion: Both; but we get a great many letters in our office because we do carry on our editorial masthead, our name and address and we therefore get literally hundreds of these letters.

Senator Sparrow: Direct?

Mr. Mannion: Direct.

Senator Sparrow: Would you receive most of your letters direct then?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: On the question that you brought up in your verbal remarks on the overflow of U.S. publications, are you recommending or suggesting any control on those at this time, and if so what type of controls?

Mr. Mannion: Not a control by any sense of the imagination in the distribution of any of the publications, but rather the fact that I believe as Mr. Goodson stressed, the recommendations of the O'Leary Commission should be adopted, even though it is five years later. That all non-Canadian publications be exempt from the income tax provisions.

Senator Sparrow: Including Reader's Digest and Time?

Mr. Mannion: Right.

Senator Sparrow: Do you have any free circulation?

Mr. Mannion: No, we do not.

Senator Sparrow: You referred again to the...

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, I just wanted to ask this before we leave the Reader's Digest and Time situation. You subscribe entirely to Mr. Goodson's views, do you?

Mr. Mannion: Yes, I would say so.

The Chairman: Fine.

Senator Sparrow: You gave examples verbally and in your brief of a number of complimentary letters to the editors. There was no example of non-complimentary ones.

Mr. Mannion: Well, we get very few. We get some, but very few, and generally when we do we get them they are on a specific subject that someone disagrees with the way we presented. For instance, we had a flood of letters not long ago because we reported a story on the disintegration of the British Empire; so we had all the monarchists in Canada writing us and telling us that we were all wet.

The Chairman: I may say for your interest, Mr. Mannion, that I received a number of letters on that as well.

Mr. Michael Hanlon (Editor of the Canadian Magazine and the Star Weekly): I just might add a comment here and say that we published quite a few of those letters, or excerpts from those letters, on this subject.

The Chairman: Was that the largest negative response you have ever had?

Mr. Mannion: It probably was. Mr. Hanlon could probably answer that better than I could.

Mr. Hanlon: Yes, as far as I can recall I would say it was the largest negative response, not the largest response.

The Chairman: But the largest negative response?

Mr. Hanlon: Yes, I would think so.

The Chairman: I recall a very controversial profile you did on Premier Thatcher which I think engendered quite a response.

Mr. Mannion: Yes, that was before my time.

Mr. Hanlon: It generated a noisier response.

The Chairman: But that was before the both of your times?

Mr. Hanlon: No, I was with the magazine then and I remember that vividly.

The Chairman: How would it compare in size to this British Empire response?

Mr. Hanlon: I don't know, Senator, I am afraid because I wasn't editor then. I know it very well because I was our western correspondent at the time and I was almost afraid to go into Saskatchewan.

The Chairman: Did you write it?

Mr. Hanlon: No, I didn't write it. Some Alderman wrote it.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Did you get any number of positive letters following the publication of your article on the monarchy?

Mr. Mannion: Yes, we got some, very definitely. And an unusual number of people spoke to me personally about it; I would say they were split probably 50-50 in that area—some tore strips off me and others told me that they read the article and it made a great deal of sense and that it was completely factual, et cetera.

The Chairman: Who wrote that article?

Mr. Mannion: Mr. Dave Cobb.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: In paragraph 20 of your brief you say:

"By comparison to the United States, Canada unfortunately has very few consumer magazines today."

What comparison figures are you using? Isn't the readership of Canadian magazines greater than that of the United States when you take into consideration their magazines and your magazines are distributed weekly?

Mr. Mannion: I don't know that it is greater so I really cannot answer that question. I just know that there are a great many more magazines obviously available in the United States than there are in Canada and I do not know what the readership figure might be.

Senator Sparrow: Well, you are saying that there are obviously more American magazines but not necessarily a greater readership?

Mr. Mannion: Not necessarily. I do not know the answer to that.

The Chairman: I think Senator Sparrow's question relates to an assertion by Mr. Ron McEachern who said that on a per capita basis we read more magazines in Canada than in the United States. That was his contention.

Mr. Mannion: It might be because they are better selling, they sell more magazines per household in Canada, but it is debatable whether they are more read in Canada.

The Chairman: Well, I do not want to be unfair to Mr. McEachern...

Senator Everett: He was speaking only of Maclean's and Chatelaine.

The Chairman: Thank you, fine. Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: In paragraph 21 you say:

"We are proud to say that our editorial content is 99 per cent Canadian..."

I would like to know how you define Canadian content. You use such a high figure. I ask this question in relation to such things as pollution—you know that you must refer to the North American situation in such an article; you also referred in your brief to coverage of world wars which, again how much would be Canadian content—and articles such as that. How do you define Canadian content? How do you arrive at a basis of 99 per cent?

Mr. Mannion: Every article that we carry, or almost article that we carry—there is the odd exception—almost every article that is run in the The Canadian Magazine is either written about Canada or interpreting a major event to Canada because of a specific Canadian interest. When we write about wars, for instance, we write about General Crerar or General McNaughton, or whoever it might be that has been involved who is a Canadian. Certainly the event is not a Canadian event, but when we write it it makes it a Canadian event because it is only written from a Canadian point of view.

Would you like to add to that Mr. Hanlon?

Mr. Hanlon: Well, since you mentioned the wars—World War II the way we covered the anniversary of World War II was to talk to people living in Canada who are now Canadian but weren't at the time and what their reaction was at the outbreak of World War II. Now, we considered that that was definitely Canadian content because they are now Canadians and part of our country in which we live. That definitely is Canadian content because it gives a Canadian angle to it.

Mr. Mannion: Plus the fact that a couple of years ago we sent one of our writers to retrace General Simonds' steps through Europe but this was written from General Simonds' point of view as Canadian Commander on what he saw 25 years later.

Senator Sparrow: Is there a simple definition of Canadian content?

Mr. Mannion: Well, let me put it this way. We would never cover the Republican Convention in the United States. We would never cover any subject of that nature except if there was a specific Canadian angle. I will give you an example that we considered—and it could be considered borderline. Just last week we carried an article on North Vietnam. We carried it because Michael Maclear of the C.B.C. was the first North American correspondent to be allowed into North Vietnam in three years. We felt that Canada who has only seen the one side of the Vietnam situation would like to see through the eyes of a Canadian photographer what was happening in North Vietnam and we considered that Canadian content. It is written specifically for Canadians.

Mr. Hanlon: From a Canadian point of view—his point of view as opposed to the views of a North Vietnamese, or an American correspondent, or French correspondent.

Senator Sparrow: How does that 99 per cent figure that you used compare with Week-end Magazine, or Maclean's magazine, or others?

Mr. Mannion: It is higher. It is higher than any other Canadian periodical.

Senator Sparrow: Is that an arbitrary figure—that 99 per cent?

Mr. Mannion: It is, yes.

The Chairman: Do you make this judgment about being so nationalistic—now, I don't think there is anything wrong with that at all, but to what extent do you make that judgment—and I am not, Mr. Mannion, even by implication questioning your Canadianism or your motives, but to what extent do you make that judgment based on readership studies and research you have done which indicates a growing requirement for this type of material in Canada?

Mr. Mannion: Well, I think I should go back to when I first joined The Canadian. I had been living in the United States, but I am a Canadian, and I had spent a great deal of time in the United States prior to actually moving there. Then actually actively living there, the thing that struck me most about the United States was the tremendous nationalistic pride that most Americans felt. It was my contention that this same nationalistic pride existed in Canada but it was somewhat beneath the surface. The people seemed content to hide their nationalistic pride but nevertheless it is there. We felt that we were performing a service to the country because we were telling people what they really wanted to know, and we were talking about Canadian accomplishments and what people were doing in the world who were Canadians, et cetera. The letters that we have received, as I say, indicate to us that we are right. We have not done readership studies or research. I don't know how you would do research to determine whether this is really what the people want because I am not certain that the people know that this is what they want; but the tremendous response that we have had—unsolicited letters which is not normal in this business—not normal at all—indicates to me that we are on the right track. We receive literally hundreds of letters.

The Chairman: I would just like to ask you why you aren't into free circulation?

Mr. Mannion: Because we see no need for it. It costs a lot of money and we are out to sell The Star Weekly. Senator Smith was commenting about Halifax...

The Chairman: Well, I would like to ask you about Halifax if he doesn't.

Mr. Mannion: Well, if we put free circulation into Halifax—we sell 11,000 copies each week of The Star Weekly in Halifax and we have no desire to disrupt that. Eleven thousand copies times 25 cents times 52 is a lot of money.

The Chairman: But you would presumably disrupt that if you sign a contract with the Chronicle-Herald?

Mr. Mannion: Well, on the right terms.

The Chairman: Are you attempting to sell the Chronicle-Herald?

Mr. Mannion: Not at the present moment.

The Chairman: Would you be alarmed if Weekend sold the Chronicle-Herald.

Mr. Mannion: Not really, because as I say, my chief concern at this moment is very much governed by The Star Weekly. The Star Weekly is extremely important to us for many reasons, not the least of which is the fact that if we sell the product we know that the product is good. We know The Canadian is good because it is the same product. As I say, it is economics. I don't want to disrupt $150,000 a year business in Halifax by knocking The Star Weekly.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, may I just ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes, of course.

Senator Smith: Could you tell me just how many copies of The Star Weekly you sell in the Province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. Mannion: I would be guessing, but I would say around 30,000.

Senator Smith: Well, I see it everywhere so I am not surprised.

The Chairman: You have no concern about the fact that your competition is in the controlled circulation business?

Mr. Mannion: Certainly it is a concern. I recognize the fact that it makes Weekend a two million circulation publication, the same as we are a two million circulation publication. I am certainly aware of it and I probably under similar circumstances would have done exactly as they did.

Senator Sparrow: In paragraph 30 you say:

"Despite the economics of magazine publishing, we do not cut our editorial content if advertising lineage drops. We run between 22 and 26 editorial pages in every issue of The Canadian, even if we have only one or two pages of advertising."

Does that in fact happen?

Mr. Mannion: Absolutely.

Senator Sparrow: Where you have only one or two pages of advertising?

Mr. Mannion: Well, let me see. We have been as low as two or three pages of advertising and I don't recall that we ever had an issue of only one or two pages of advertising. We have been as low as two.

Senator Sparrow: That is an arbitrary figure again?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: It doesn't happen often, or it happens often?

Mr. Mannion: Well, we have run a fair number of 28 page issues and if we are going to carry 24 or 25 pages of editorial we haven't got very much advertising in 28 pages. We have a very definite news minimum content. We do get down, particularly in the summer-time, and you never know when an advertiser is going to schedule advertising. It could be that you will have three pages in one issue and 12 pages in the next issue because of the way the advertiser schedules his work.

Senator Sparrow: Well, without leaving that and just going to number 40 in your brief, in reference to the C.B.C. you say:

"Of course, the fact that many television advertisers were subsidized by the C.B.C. (by selling programs for considerably less than their cost) was one element in the decision of many advertisers to switch to television."

Now, when you sell a magazine with one or two pages of advertising aren't you subsidizing those advertisers the same perhaps as the C.B.C. is?

Mr. Mannion: No, because we are charging enough to cover the cost of the advertising. We are subsidizing the reader.

Senator Sparrow: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Mannion: Well, we are not subsidizing the advertiser. We charge enough through our advertising rate to cover all of the costs of the advertising involved and we assume that we are going to have a volume of business that is going to make us a profit. If we do not and we continue to supply that volume of editorial content we are in effect subsidizing the reader.

Senator Sparrow: Well, if I were an advertiser I would be very pleased to have an issue go out and I were the only advertiser in that issue.

Mr. Mannion: So would I.

Senator Sparrow: So in that particular case it happens, right?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: So, you are in fact subsidizing—and using the argument that you used with the C.B.C.—if you are subsidizing that advertiser in that issue, is that not true with the C.B.C. as well that they have a program to sell and they can't really get the total dollar advertising return that they are asking for, so they in fact reduce the price, or reduce the total program costs?

Mr. Mannion: Yes, but in the case of the C.B.C., Senators, it has been—I can't quote figures exactly but I have seen instances where the C.B.C. has gone out and paid $400,000 or $450,000 to an American producer and sold the program for $50,000. That is a great deal different.

The Chairman: Could you give us an instance of that?

Mr. Mannion: Well, as I say, I can't recall specific instances, but I know that that has existed.

The Chairman: Well, could you send us a specific instance?

Mr. Mannion: If I can find it, yes.

The Chairman: Do you think you can find it?

Mr. Mannion: I think so.

Senator Sparrow: What is the difference then? In comparison you have a magazine 24, 26 or 28 pages, or 29 pages...

Mr. Mannion: The point is what would we do? Not publish?

Senator Sparrow: No, but what does the C.B.C. do?

Mr. Mannion: Well, I would say that they have to charge what the advertising costs them. I don't necessarily disagree with what they are doing in a given instance but the point is we find it extremely difficult to compete when an advertiser for instance can say "All right, I can buy this program for $50,000 or $75,000 and I will buy the time necessary to produce the program" for let's say $150,-

000. So, for $200,000 he can become a national advertiser in Canada. He can't be a major national advertiser in any other way in Canada for $200,000 but he can through the C.B.C. because it is being subsidized.

Senator Sparrow: Are you suggesting now that all programs as such are a mistake?

Mr. Mannion: No, I am not suggesting that. I say that there are instances of that but I don't know the inner workings of the C.B.C.—but with a $150 million loss, I would think that a heck of a lot of them fall in that category.

The Chairman: Well, I wonder if the $150 million loss is accurate terminology. I question whether it is, but in any event carry on. I just might say that we will have the C.B.C. here a week from Thursday. I must say also that many, many publishers have made the point that you have made and I think that is why Senator Sparrow has been pursuing it.

Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I will yield for the moment.

The Chairman: I just have a couple of questions and then perhaps I will turn to Mr. Fortier.

In section 17 of your brief you list the directors. Mr. Honderich is the Chairman of the board, you are the president, the comptroller is Mr. Floyd, and you have a pretty high powered list of directors. I think you would agree with me that they are a pretty high powered group.

Mr. Mannion: At board meetings they sure are.

The Chairman: Well, then that leads me to ask you a question about section 3 on the first page where you say:

"Although we are owned by two major publishing organizations in Canada, we operate completely independently and decide our own editorial and advertising policies."

Well, if you decide your own editorial and advertising policies, what do they talk to you about on board days?

Mr. Mannion: Various things. The economics of publishing, the printing itself, the distribution.

The Chairman: And they don't say anything about editorial or advertising?

Mr. Mannion: I have yet to have any observation, or restriction, or even a suggestion of a restriction made to me by any member of my board.

The Chairman: Well, you are talking editorially—what about advertising?

Mr. Mannion: We discuss things and I ask their opinion on many things. They are the board and I work for them and they can certainly direct me, but we still operate as an independent body separate from either the Star or the Southam Press.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Mannion, you say in number 3, and you can look at it with me, you say, "we operate completely independently and decide our own editorial and advertising policies." Now, you have made the point that they don't influence you editorially and we will come to that in a moment or two, but what about the advertising? You surely don't operate "completely independently" when it comes to advertising policies, do you?

Mr. Mannion: Southstar Publishers Limited does. Southstar Publishers Limited might very well have policies that are different than either the Southam Press or the Toronto Star but we operate as an independent company.

The Chairman: But those views are brought to your board table by publishers of the Toronto Star—

Mr. Mannion: Absolutely, but it is still an independent decision as it affects Southstar Publishers Limited.

The Chairman: That is fine. I appreciate that explanation. I know you were here this morning, Mr. Mannion, when we talked about the experience on homosexuality in Weekend. Have you had any similar experiences in The Canadian?

Mr. Mannion: No, fortunately not.

The Chairman: None at all?

Mr. Mannion: No.

The Chairman: Has it just been because you are fortunate, good management, or what?

Mr. Mannion: Well, perhaps a little bit of all—all of those things. Personally, I did not see very much wrong with the homosexual article—there was a couple of things that I think I would have left out and I think my editor would have left out of that article which would have perhaps eliminated a large part of the problem.

The Chairman: Could the papers which subscribe—the member papers of The Canadian—would they be free to react in the same way as the 14 publishers of Weekend did?

Mr. Mannion: Yes, they would.

The Chairman: They would be within their rights under terms of the agreement?

Mr. Mannion: In exactly the same manner.

Mr. Fortier: Well, I will ask you the same question that I asked them. Do you tell your advertisers that your member newspapers have this right?

Mr. Mannion: No. We don't see any necessity for it.

Mr. Fortier: And you have been proven right so far.

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You describe yourself, as indeed you are, as one of the two national newspaper-distributed magazines in English language Canada. To become truly national, has your board ever considered the advisability of publishing a weekend supplement in the French language?

Mr. Mannion: Not in my time with the board, no.

Mr. Fortier: Would you express a personal view, Mr. Mannion?

Mr. Mannion: I would be delighted if the economics of the situation would allow us to do so, Mr. Fortier, but I can see no way that we could publish a French language edition and have it economically viable at all.

Mr. Fortier: Well, what I am trying to get at is The Canadian came into being, we have to assume, because there was—or it was felt in some quarters that Weekend was not everything that it could be. It was felt that there was room for a competitor so I ask you whether or not it is felt at your board that Perspectives is not filling the full role that it should fill in Quebec and whether there is not room for a competitor?

Mr. Mannion: Well, our principal role is to produce a newspaper distributed supplement. There aren't any newspapers left in Quebec of significance that could carry a newspaper distributed supplement on a competitive basis and on a magazine basis. As I said before, I don't think there will ever be a national—"national" in that context—magazine in French speaking Canada.

Mr. Fortier: Well, of course, when The Canadian came into being, there were many newspapers who were contractually bound with Montreal Standard Publishing and left at the expiration of their contract.

Mr. Mannion: Right.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that same argument could prevail in this case.

Mr. Mannion: Well, of course it could.

Mr. Fortier: Except that they may be locked in a little.

Mr. Mannion: Well, I think their owners now are a little different. Even so, I think we would certainly listen to anyone who said that there was an opportunity for us to turn out a French language publication.

Mr. Fortier: The Montreal Gazette, I believe, is the only newspaper in Quebec that distributes The Canadian, is that correct?

Mr. Mannion: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: What about the Chonicle-Telegraph in Quebec City?

Mr. Mannion: It distributes Weekend and has done so for many years.

Mr. Fortier: You said there will never be another national magazine launched in Canada and in your verbal presentation you referred to the reasons being economic problems. Have you ever picked up The Last Post or the Mysterious East?

Mr. Mannion: I picked up The Last Post last night—I had never seen it before.

Mr. Fortier: Well, that was only the second issue. There was a good article on Senator Davey in that?

Mr. Mannion: Yes, I noticed that.

The Chairman: Carry on, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Do you know about the Mysterious East?

Mr. Mannion: I know of it. I understand you received a submission from them. Is that right?

The Chairman: Yes, we did.

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if you felt that there was any hope or any possibility that a publication such as the Mysterious East or The Last Post can grow from a small start into a national Canadian magazine?

Mr. Mannion: I very definitely hesitate to say no because I am a positive thinker. I would love to see that type of publication develop in this country, but I must say, putting on my cost-conscious hat, that I don't believe it is possible to build a significant publication in this country because of the cost of circulation development and the cost of production, et cetera.

Mr. Fortier: You end your brief on a very, what I would term as a pleading note. You say:

"We also hope that any such assessment will be so positive that future Government actions would be designed to assist in the growth and health of this industry."

Could you be more specific as to what kind of government action you refer to here?

Mr. Mannion: Well, the only one I can come up with immediately is the abolition of the exemption for Time and Reader's Digest. If there is some other way that it could be done other than Government grants, fine. I think it is required in a developing country to have many voices of communication and I don't think we have enough of them in this country. I would like to see Maclean's strengthened, despite the fact that it is a competitor of mine because it is good for our country, and I would like to see other Maclean's. I don't think it is economically feasible or possible.

Mr. Fortier: Do you believe that Maclean's magazine, and Weekend, and The Canadian or Star Weekly would be healthier if the exemption enjoyed by Time and Reader's Digest were removed?

Mr. Mannion: I do.

Mr. Fortier: You do?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You think that there would be enough advertising channelled to those publications...

Mr. Mannion: Well, it would give us $15 million more of available money that everyone could shoot at. Surely a percentage of that money will fall into Canadian publication hands because let's face it these people are buying advertising to reach the Canadian population and if they can't get it one way, they are going to get it another way because it is part of their economic strength as well.

Mr. Fortier: Well, you probably heard my question earlier to Mr. Goodson, where I referred to the conclusions of a study, of which one conclusion was that only 13 per cent of Time and Reader's Digest advertising would go to publications such as yours. Have you ever made any study along those lines?

Mr. Mannion: I have not made a factual research study but I would completely disagree with that figure.

Mr. Fortier: You find that figure very low?

Mr. Mannion: Very low.

Mr. Fortier: So the committee should be clear that you are not suggesting any other concrete Government action?

Mr. Mannion: No.

Mr. Fortier: Similarly though, you say that the national magazine industry is important enough at this committee and then possibly the Government should apply its mind to finding a formula to allow it to stay alive and to prosper, is that correct?

Mr. Mannion: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: And you don't stop short of a direct subsidy, or do you?

Mr. Mannion: I do.

Mr. Fortier: You think this would be an infringement on the freedom of the press?

Mr. Mannion: Well, it obviously is and I would be against any subsidy.

Mr. Fortier: Your editor is shaking his head.

Mr. Hanlon: I am nodding my head.

Mr. Fortier: Would you agree with that Mr. Hanlon?

Mr. Hanlon: Yes, definitely. I don't think there should be any special privileges to the press because they do have strings attached. If they don't actually have strings attached, they look as if they have strings attached, which is just as bad.

Mr. Fortier: Before coming to Canada you worked on several newspapers in England—The Sunday Express and the Daily Mail being two of them. Did you ever work on magazines in England?

Mr. Hanlon: No, I was never on the staff of magazines, but I did write the add piece for magazines, and I didn't really start writing full time for magazines until I came to Canada. I worked for the Globe Magazine—I was on the staff but I was freelance writing for the magazine.

Mr. Fortier: Weekly magazines in England are performing rather well are they not?

Mr. Hanlon: Yes they are, exceptionally well.

Mr. Fortier: Well, what is their secret? Is it in their selection of readers, or the form of competition which they have?

Mr. Hanlon: Well, I think it is the selection of readers. Although they are in national newspapers they do appeal to specialized audiences—The Sunday Times appeals to a special audience and The Observer does, the Telegram does and the Daily Mirror which now has its own magazine does. They are not as we are, having to appeal to every type of town in Canada and every person in Canada. Every variety of person in Canada gets our magazine. This makes a vast difference of what you put into the magazine.

Mr. Fortier: This is the old argument which we heard a few weeks ago to the effect that the specialized magazine, you know, is gaining strength or the general interest magazine is losing.

Mr. Hanlon: Yes, but I don't mean that so much, Mr. Fortier. What I mean is that the readers of the supplements take it because they do take a particular newspaper. They are a particular type of person; their interests aren't necessarily limited in any particular sphere any more than our readers are—it is just that they are a particular group of people.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, you are expressing yourself much better than I was—that was what I was trying to say and this is indeed the situation over there. Is this the only answer—this selection of readers?

Mr. Hanlon: No, I don't think so. I think the English public is very, very much a reading public for they have nine national newspapers and several afternoon papers and they buy several editions of an afternoon paper if only to read the racing results. I think also the fact that they are a smaller country they require to know more of what is going on there and are more interested.

Mr. Fortier: That facilitates the distribution and sale of both the newspaper and the weekly magazine?

Mr. Hanlon: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Your argument is valid on both counts is it not?

Mr. Hanlon: Oh, I would think so, yes, because they can produce a magazine in London and sell it the same day anywhere in the British Isles or in Manchester or in Glasgow—it is just a matter of geography; they have a geographic advantage.

Mr. Fortier: Your magazine is printed in Montreal now?

Mr. Mannion: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Only as of this last month, is that correct?

Mr. Mannion: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: What made you turn about as you say in your brief? Were there any other considerations which you considered before deciding to go to the Montreal Standard for the printing of The Canadian?

Mr. Mannion: Really, the only basic item of consideration was the fact that we could produce the magazine cheaper in Montreal than we could in Toronto.

Mr. Fortier: It flowed naturally from the creation of the MagnaMedia though did it not?

Mr. Mannion: Well, one or vice versa.

Mr. Fortier: Well, except that MagnaMedia—did it not come first?

Mr. Mannion: No. They came together simultaneously—the principle being that we—and this was just not a recent decision. This had been considered for some considerable period of time; you put three magazines into one plant and elementary economics and production efficiency indicate that you can produce the three of them cheaper per copy than you can with putting two in one plant and one in another. It is simply a matter of production efficiency and production economy.

Mr. Fortier: So except for editorial material you are now operating under the same roof as Montreal Standard?

Mr. Mannion: No, we are not. Well, I should clarify that. We send our copy to Montreal to be produced in a plant exactly the same way as we formerly sent it to our former printing plant.

Mr. Fortier: And MagnaMedia is handling all of your advertising sales?

Mr. Mannion: That is correct. Simply on the advertising side from the point of view of accounting; the business office, the editorial office, the makeup, the art and photography, et cetera, is all continuing to be done in our own office. The final pages are sent to Montreal for processing as they were formerly sent to the other plant.

Mr. Fortier: In selling advertising space are there package deals offered—you know, for publication in both The Canadian and Weekend?

Mr. Mannion: No, there are not.

Mr. Fortier: But in actual fact the 70 per cent of advertisers which you surveyed and found to advertise in both Weekend and The Canadian before MagnaMedia came into being—this figure has now increased, has it not, since the creation of MagnaMedia?

Mr. Mannion: No.

Mr. Fortier: As I say, I have not seen figures that compare the two.

Mr. Mannion: If it has, I am not conscious of it and I can't imagine that it could have because we have only been in business for eight weeks.

Mr. Fortier: Well, as I say, since the turn of the year I have looked every weekend at both The Canadian and Weekend Magazine, and it has struck me that there was even more advertising duplication.

Mr. Mannion: If there was it was by coincidence only. It is not by design. We closed the February 28 issue on December 31, and MagnaMedia started selling on January 1. The March 7 issue isn't out yet, so it couldn't possibly have affected it.

The Chairman: What is the relative cost per page in your publication as opposed to Weekend?

Mr. Mannion: Very similar.

The Chairman: Is it identical?

Mr. Mannion: No, in no way is it identical.

The Chairman: Which is less expensive?

Mr. Mannion: Well, that would depend on the category of contract. I don't want to vacillate but on the open rate our rate is higher than theirs, for example. They have a certain advertising category, certain categories of contract where their rate is below ours and vice versa.

The Chairman: In terms of a national advertiser who is budgeting a campaign the rates are if not identical they are very comparable?

Mr. Mannion: They are comparable.

The Chairman: Is that a fair statement?

Mr. Mannion: That is correct. That is correct because the circulations are very comparable.

The Chairman: Well, the circulations are very comparable except presumably Weekend continues to distribute free copies?

Mr. Mannion: That is correct. For the past three years, or whatever it is they have been doing it, the circulation has almost been identical and therefore the rates have been almost identical and the advertisers have accepted that.

The Chairman: What is your circulation?

Mr. Mannion: Approximately two million.

The Chairman: And what is theirs?

Mr. Mannion: Approximately two million.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could put this to Mr. Goodson, but I will put it to you instead, and perhaps he can jump and cry "foul" if you are wrong. Of their two million how many are qualified or controlled circulation?

Mr. Mannion: Well, I think I could answer it...

The Chairman: I am sure you could answer it.

Mr. Mannion: I believe, and Mr. Goodson can correct me, I think it is 240,000.

The Chairman: Is that correct, Mr. Goodson is nodding his head. So about 240,000 of their is qualified?

Mr. Mannion: That is right.

The Chairman: And the rates per page subject to contract modifications are comparable?

Mr. Mannion: Right.

Mr. Fortier: MagnaMedia is owned in equal proportions is it not by Southstar and Mont-real Standard

Mr. Mannion: That is correct.

Mr. Fortier: Is there only one category of shares?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And they are owned 50-50?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How about the makeup of the board?

Mr. Mannion: Fifty-fifty.

Mr. Fortier: No casting vote?

Mr. Mannion: No casting vote.

Mr. Fortier: Then it is an even number?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: And in case of a deadlock you just have to wind up as a company?

Mr. Mannion: Well, in effect that is what you would have to do.

Mr. Fortier: There is no provision anywhere for a solution to a possible deadlock?

Mr. Mannion: No, there is not.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear?

Senator Kinnear: It is a question which I think we are vitally interested in in Canada and that is housing. Your magazine, Canadian Homes, I noticed you have about 26 million copies?

Mr. Mannion: We publish 26 million copies a year.

Senator Kinnear: A year?

Mr. Mannion: Yes.

Senator Kinnear: Do you think you have any influence on housing in Canada, and another question—I would think that the people who haven't housing would be terribly worried when they see your magazine on homes that they are going to be left out because there is such a shortage of homes.

Mr. Mannion: Well, when we talk about homes, we talk about all types of homes. We, incidentally, publish the only remaining magazine devoted to homes in the country.

Senator Kinnear: Yes, I am sorry that the Canadian Homes and Gardens fell apart years ago because it was a lovely magazine.

Mr. Mannion: We are attempting to recognize the problems in all income levels. For instance, recently we had I thought a most interesting article on how to decorate a small apartment by yourself. We priced the materials and we indicated the way it was to be done; we were thinking in terms of people who have anywhere from $75 a month to $130 a month apartments. This article gave great detail in showing them how to make interesting apartments. We also run quite a lot of do-it-yourself articles, for example how you can make a piece of furniture for your home. We do not try to run a Better Homes and Gardens. We just can't do it and make it economically sound.

Mr. Hanlon: I was just going to say, Mr. Chairman, that we also run stories in Canadian Homes. There is one in the current issue on how the housing problem is being tackled elsewhere, to give the people some idea of what is going on and just how it might be applied to Canada. In our other publications we have done stories on housing.

Senator Kinnear: I am sure your stories are read by many people interested in improving their homes no matter what type of home it is.

Mr. Mannion: You see, one of the articles in this current issue is "How Good is Co-op Housing" and we say it is one way of cutting housing costs and keeping the advantage of ownership. There is a complete article on that and how co-op housing works in Sweden.

The Chairman: Mr. Mannion, I would like to return to a discussion of MagnaMedia for a few moments. Would you describe MagnaMedia as the weekend papers' response to the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Mannion: Partially, yes. We are the only medium in the country—only major medium anyway that does not have an official voice.

The Chairman: Haven't you really effectively removed all competition—the element of competition has been removed from weekend papers in Canada?

Mr. Mannion: Not really.

The Chairman: Well, would you explain why not?

Mr. Mannion: Well, first of all you have to accept the fact that as the figures indicate in the brief, rotogravure publications have been going downhill for years. It is the only major media category in Canada, other than the farm papers, that have lost in the last ten years. We felt that we must have a voice to go out and sell the concept—the basic newspaper-distributed magazine concept—and we felt that the only way we could do this was to get together, pool our resources and pool our efforts. We considered that we really weren't competitors in the commonly accepted sense of the word because of the fact that 70 per cent of our advertisers use both, so they obviously didn't think we were competitors. They felt that we complemented each other. As I illustrated in the brief, in the City of Ottawa, which is a pretty good example, there are three different supplements in three different newspapers in this city and if you want to cover the whole market you have to use all three to cover it in rotogravure and high advertiser?

The Chairman: You are talking about the advertiser?

Mr. Mannion: Yes. As far as editorial material is concerned, we are highly competitive. It is our responsibility—a major portion of my responsibility and Mr. Hanlon's responsibility—to give a package to our newspapers with which they can compete locally and they will scream blue murder if we don't give them that package.

The Chairman: What is the overlap—in other words, you have two million and they have two million—of those two million how many people would read both? For example, I could tell you that I read both, so how many people are there like me?

Mr. Mannion: A relatively small percentage.

The Chairman: How small?

Mr. Mannion: I would say about 4 per cent.

The Chairman: Four per cent?

Mr. Mannion: Right. Now, I am discounting the controlled circulation. I am talking about subscribers to both newspapers.

The Chairman: Of the three million eight hundred some odd thousand—3,760,000 I guess—there would be—what is 4 per cent of 3,700,000?

Mr. Mannion: It would be about 150,000.

The Chairman: Having gone this far—you have common production, and common advertising sales, why wouldn't you go all the way and have common editorial content? Mr. Hanlon is a very competent editor and I am sure so is Mr. Lowe so they could probably put out even a better publication if they sat down and worked together.

Mr. Mannion: Well, you used Mr. Bassett's name around here earlier this morning, I can imagine Mr. Bassett receiving the same supplement as Mr. Honderich.

The Chairman: What does it matter though if you say only 4 per cent are in common?

Mr. Mannion: It would be one against the other.

The Chairman: Well, if there is only 4 per cent of this circulation which is overlap, as I read it 96 per cent of the people wouldn't care less.

Mr. Mannion: Well, I would think though that Mr. Bassett—and I hesitate to use him, let us use Mr. Southam in Ottawa...

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Mannion: I would say that his circulation people are going to want a supplement that they consider to be considerably better than the Ottawa Journal's supplement, so that they can use it in their selling to the people of Ottawa.

The Chairman: Do you think that your supplement is, and I use your quote now, considerably better?

Mr. Mannion: I would say that they want to think that it is considerably...

The Chairman: Do you think yours is considerably better?

Mr. Mannion: Yes I do.

The Chairman: All right Mr. Hanlon. How is it considerably better?

Mr. Hanlon: I would like to make it clear that I am praising our magazine and not criticizing some other one.

The Chairman: I don't care which way you do it. I want to know why you think it is considerably better.

Mr. Hanlon: I think it is better written, I think it is...

The Chairman: Is it considerably better written?

Mr. Hanlon: I think it is considerably better written. Ours is very well written and very well produced; it looks very good; it contains, I still say, a lot more Canadian content than many other magazines and the stories in it are of extreme interest to Canadians. We make sure that they are of extreme interest to Canadians and we don't try to cover foreign events that become outdated in the period of time between the happening and the appearance in the magazine. We plan our magazine very carefully so that we do give whatever subject we cover—we try to clarify to our reader so he can grasp the meat of it, so it is meaningful and so that it has some relationship to his way of life. If we are arguing about something on the prairies we would like to show the man in Newfoundland just what it means to him.

The Chairman: Mr. Lowe, do you think your magazine is considerably better than theirs—I bet I know the answer to that.

Mr. Mannion: do you think that the 150,000 readers, who represent the 4 per cent, think that one magazine is considerably better than the other?

Mr. Mannion: If the comments that I hear from the people who care to comment are any indication, yes.

Mr. Hanlon: Well, I was just going to comment on the point you raised about what is the point of having two magazines when Mr. Lowe and I could sit down together and put out a better magazine between us.

The Chairman: Well, it seems to me that working together, you would have better production, have better advertising sales, so why don't you think you would have better editorial content?

Mr. Hanlon: Well, I think we could...

Mr. Mannion: I think it would be safe to say that we could, but our publishers would never let us do it.

Mr. Hanlon: Not only that, but if we were to do that, you would just have one editorial product, one editorial voice speaking again. Now, you have two.

The Chairman: Well, what would it matter? Only 4 per cent of the people receive both of them?

Mr. Hanlon: Well, that doesn't matter I think, Senator—it is a matter of choice. Maybe 96 per cent of the others prefer one or the other. They have a choice. If they want to take Weekend they can, and if they want to take the Star Weekly or The Canadian they can. We give them that choice and there are two points of view here.

The Chairman: Well, you live in Toronto and so do I. I shouldn't be implying an opinion here—and I am not, but do you think that the person who goes to the newsstand on Saturday makes his decision as between the Toronto Star and the Toronto Telegram on the basis of The Canadian versus Weekend?

Mr. Hanlon: Well, I would like to think that some people do, but I don't think they all do, no. I think it is a question of the total package. I think ours is a very valuable contribution to the Saturday Star, just as I am sure Mr. Lowe is convinced that his is a valuable contribution to the Telegram.

The Chairman: But if only 4 per cent of the people are in common...

Mr. Mannion: It is not a matter of being in common, it is a matter of which are they going to buy. They are not in common if they buy one or the other—they are only in common if they buy both.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Mannion: So there is a very definite choice there and if The Canadian, for instance, is not a vital part of the package, the promotion department of the Toronto Star is making a great mistake because they keep telling people it is.

The Chairman: But conversely I think, Mr. Mannion, the circulation people at the Telegram...

Mr. Mannion: By all means but that is where the rub comes. You have to get down to the facts on whether the person is going to buy the package or the component parts.

Senator Sparrow: You said your magazine is considerably better. Is the editorial cost considerably higher?

Mr. Hanlon: I have no idea of what the editorial costs of Weekend are.

Senator Sparrow: Would you make a judgment on that aspect?

Mr. Hanlon: On how much they spend on editorial costs?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Hanlon: No, honestly I couldn't, Senator, I have no idea.

The Chairman: Well, you must have some idea. You are hiring the same writers very often and you are incorporating the same kind of stories very often, so you must have some idea?

Mr. Hanlon: I would say that their editorial spending would be roughly the same as ours.

Senator Sparrow: You just spend your money more wisely, is that it?

Mr. Hanlon: I think so, yes. I could not see any value at all in combining the publications. If you combine two publications you are killing one off in this case and we have only two in this field at the moment.

The Chairman: Mr. Mannion, one of the interests which the committee has had, and a great deal has been spoken about it by various witnesses, is of course the trend toward concentration in all of the media. We have heard a great deal about the dimensions of the trend and we have heard a great deal about the rationale justifying the trend, and we have heard other witnesses who have been very critical of what is happening. I would be very interested in any assurance that you could give us that this is not a proper concern for the committee when it comes to weekend newspaper magazines.

Mr. Mannion: Well, I would think that it is not, but I would have to refer you to the statistics that have been listed as to the economics, the advertising revenue of the various media, and indicate to you that if the trend continues—if the trend is allowed to continue—somebody is going to go out of business; because at some point in time either my board of directors is going to decide that they don't want to continue, or probably I am going to recommend to them that they do not continue because we are not going to run an operation that is continually going to go deeply into the red; the share of market that has been lost over the years by supplements and newspaper distributed magazines indicate that that is the trend. The trend has been going this way the past few years.

As the figures indicate, in the last ten years the revenues have gone down. It is particularly significant when you consider that that is despite the introduction of The Canadian. The Canadian has only been in business for five years—less than five years, and yet in the last ten years the total dollar spending in newspaper distributed magazines has gone down. The Canadian should have been able to regenerate the industry; it should have been able to generate more dollars into the medium.

I think it has in some respects and perhaps, therefore, has smoothed the trend down, but it has to smooth it all the way—it has to be reversed. The only way it is going to be reversed in my judgment is to put forward a concerted effort by the best brains, the best research, and the best sales operations that we can put together.

The Chairman: You have made a big point about the Canadian dimension of your magazine, and you speak about it in your brief. I see a trade paper ad for MagnaMedia and I will quote it.

"...the magazine MagnaMedia represents: leading Canadian magazines produced by Canada's top editors, writers and columnists. What is important to Canada is important to these magazines."

Now, that is not just speaking about your publication. That is speaking about Weekend as well?

Mr. Mannion: Senator, if I was invited to present a brief on behalf of all the publications I would have made a presentation on that basis.

The Chairman: Would you have leaned as heavily on Canada as you did in your own brief?

Mr. Mannion: I could. I couldn't quite as heavily, but I will go back to what Mr. Hanlon just said, that it is not a matter of criticizing the other fellow but rather pointing out our own strength and weaknesses. Weekend does a magnificent job in my judgment.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps on that note before we adjourn, Mr. Goodson was kind enough to remain and we appreciate it and since we haven't asked him any questions, perhaps I could ask you one concluding question and the one which really intrigues me. How real is the competition between you and Southstar?

Mr. Goodson: Well, I think there has been possibly a small error which has crept in. I believe the figure bandied about so much a few minutes ago—that figure of 4 per cent overlap, is quite low. I think it is higher than that—I don't know how much higher but it is higher certainly in the major centres. The one you mentioned, in particular Toronto—the Telegram and the Star would have a greater overlap than that. In areas where there is only one newspaper there is no overlap, so that there is a great area of competition amongst the member newspapers from an editorial and circulation promotion aspect. These are the areas in which we are particularly interested in competing.

Mr. Fortier made the comment that he has noted since the turn of the year that the advertising is more similar than it used to be. Well, this is only a continuation of the trend which we recognize and has nothing to do with MagnaMedia. The ads were booked before MagnaMedia was ever announced or came into existence. Our competitive area is a competitive area for (a) retaining our member newspapers and (b) our member newspapers retaining their readers in competition with the other newspapers in their own areas.

The Chairman: How many advertising salesmen did you have prior to MagnaMedia?

Mr. Goodson: Would you repeat that, please?

The Chairman: How many advertising salesmen worked for Weekend prior to MagnaMedia?

Mr. Goodson: Ten.

The Chairman: Wasn't there a dislocation of personnel both in the production side and on the advertising side of the merger?

Mr. Mannion: Yes. There was a minor change.

The Chairman: Are there other questions that the Senators have?

Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I am sorry we didn't get to this in the previous presentation but in 28 they said:

"I think the Canadian editor, for instance, has more freedom than his counterpart in the United States or Great Britain."

I didn't have a chance to ask that question with the previous delegation, so could you comment on that?

The Chairman: Perhaps Mr. Hanlon would be the ideal person to comment on that, Senator Sparrow.

Senator Sparrow: Fine.

Mr. Hanlon: Well, certainly I have complete freedom here, no shackles, no pressure groups, and I think the editors in newspapers in the United Kingdom have freedom. I can't speak for the States because I have never worked down there, but the difference is the newspapers in the United Kingdom do have strong editorial slants. Some papers are known as Tory papers, some of them are known as Labour papers, socialist papers, and some are known as Liberal papers. I suppose the editors there are more conscious of their affiliations and I would say that perhaps their stories tend generally to lead in a particular direction more than they do here. However, whether that is the result of a conscious pressure from anyone or just preconceived ideas, I don't know. I think it is more preconceived ideas which fortunately we don't have here because, for one thing, as far as we are concerned the variety of newspapers we have here is concerned and I am sure Mr. Lowe is concerned, Canada all have different points of view on varying subjects.

The Chairman: Thank you very much Mr. Hanlon.

Senator McElman: Of your 400,000 circulation of The Star Weekly, what would be the approximate circulation or percentage in the Atlantic Provinces?

Mr. Mannion: About 90,000. The biggest percentage of it would be in New Brunswick.

Senator McElman: Are they poor letter-writers or why weren't any of them in these four or five pages of references?

Mr. Mannion: I don't know, frankly, why they are not in there because we certainly had many letters from the Maritimes. I would think when we changed The Star Weekly, the greatest indication of support and agreement with what we were doing came very definitely from the Maritimes. We found it necessary not very long ago, to raise the price of The Star Weekly and where you normally suffer, for a period at least, a decline in circulation, the Maritimes went up. The Star Weekly's friends are very definitely in the Maritime Provinces.

Senator McElman: Do you feel that your editorial comments reflect wide debate?

Mr. Mannion: I think so. As a matter of fact, we have a story—I don't know whether or not it is in the works, but we discussed it a few weeks ago—on the subject "The Other Side of the Maritimes" because we feel that there has been so much said about the Maritimes being the "tobacco road" of Canada, that maybe the other side of the story should be told.

Senator McElman: We have been waiting for some time.

Mr. Mannion: Well, Senator, it is on its way. It has already been discussed.

Mr. Hanlon: We have covered the Maritimes considerably in the past, in fact in the five years we have been putting out the magazine, we have covered it very well and shown the positive side of it.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps on behalf of the Committee, Mr. Mannion I could thank you and your colleagues, and you Mr. Goodson, more adequately than I did at the end of your brief. I would like to thank you and your colleagues for coming here today. It has been a useful discussion and we are grateful to Mr. Mercier for joining in as he did and helping, with no pun intended, to put this whole weekend newspaper magazine picture into perspective for us.

Thank you very much.

I would remind the Senators that the committee meets at 2.30 this afternoon to receive a brief from The Canadian Public Relations Society and at four o'clock, from Mr. Richard Beddoes.

The Committee adjourned at 1:10 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Seated on my immediate right is the head of the delegation, the Chairman of the Canadian Public Relations Society, Mr. David G. Wood. Mr. Wood is also—I was going to say in 'real life' but I guess that is not the expression—Director of Information, Western Co-operative Fertilizers Limited, Calgary.

Dave, perhaps rather than me attempting to make all these introductions and botching them up, why don't you introduce the others right now.

Mr. David G. Wood, Chairman, the Canadian Public Relations Society, Inc.: Starting on my left, Mr. Chairman, is Mr. R. Brian O'Re-gan, President of the Ottawa Society; next to him Mr. Douglas W. Heal, President of the B.C. Society and also National Secretary; next to him is M. Aimé Gagné, who is National Council Director. On my right is Mr. Charles Harris, who is Second Vice-President of the National Society; Mr. Jean Balcer, President of the Quebec Society; and Mr. Melbourne James, President of the Toronto Society.

The Chairman: Now the brief we requested has been received in compliance with the guidelines we forwarded to you. Our usual procedure is to make available to you fifteen minutes to discuss the contents of your brief or say anything else which may be on your mind and then we will turn to the questioning from the Senators. As you have a rather large delegation, if you feel you want to have them in on the action you simply need to so indicate.

Mr. Wood: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators. We appreciate the opportunity to appear before this Committee and we have a sincere desire to make some contribution of value to your studies.

I should like for the record to read the summary of our brief which as succinctly as possible puts some of the points forward that we wish to make.

This submission to the Senate Committee on Mass Media deals with public relations in general and with the news relation function in particular. It includes an explanation of the practice of public relations, a review of The Canadian Public Relations Society, Inc., and observations on news relations.

Briefly, the practice of public relations in Canada has grown over the years to become a recognized management function. It is established on sound principles and is represented by The Canadian Public Relations Society, Inc., the national body of public relations.

If I may be permitted, Mr. Chairman, to make a parenthetical observation, I would like to comment on the growth of public relations. It has grown rapidly since the end of World War II and promises to accelerate in the 70's due to many factors.

I would like to quote from my recent speech given before one of our Societies to name some of the factors:

"The speed of change has introduced new uncertainties for management, forcing them to seek methods for adjusting to change.

"Attitudes in our society are changing. The inter-action of business of government; the inter-relation of political and social and economic forces is not the same as it was. So the value of explanation and dialogue has gone up.

"People's values are changing. The materialistic values which put industry so high in our system aren't quite the same, and certainly not so important as they once were to the young people. Life styles appear to be left dependent on commercial products and services.

"Management, government, rule makers, are required, whether willingly or not, to come to grips with the social, political and economic changes as well as a vast amount of technological change; and communication is the tool that will help them do it."

Returning to the summary: Relations with the news media are but one aspect of the overall public relations' function. Practitioners often devote more time to other public relation operations than they do to news relations.

Nevertheless, relations with the news media are an important factor in public relations. The requirement here is to represent the news interest of the practitioner's organization or the consultant's client. It is a vested interest, but one not detrimental to either the mass media or the public interest.

The press relations specialist is the point of the liaison between the employer and the news media. His or her knowledge of the organization, its policies and operations, is a valuable asset to the new gathering services. It is not the purpose of the press relations executive to stand as a barrier between the organization and the news media.

By creating a better understanding of the news function on the part of management, public relations practitioners have provided a tangible and beneficial service to the news media. Business executives in particular now understand and accept the news function as vital to their operations and public responsibility.

As a direct result of public relations, news representatives have a greater acceptance of the corporate policies making level than ever before. This enlightened attitude towards news media has pervaded other areas of our social and economic life.

In working with the Mass Media, Canada's public relations practitioners are providing a valuable service in the dissemination of information. A few more remarks, Mr. Chairman. Our Society, as our country, is a confederation and it is at least as difficult to obtain a consensus.

Our brief attempts to outline the basic thought of 950 members of the Canadian Public Relations Society, from Newfoundland to British Columbia, but because of myriad corporate an organization environment, there are bound to be particular viewpoints which cannot be expressed as common to all.

Nevertheless, because of the dominant size of two of our federated societies, I want, Mr. Chairman, to draw attention to their particular viewpoints...those of the Quebec Society, contained in Appendix 'A', attached to the brief, and some amplifying viewpoints as expressed by working material supplied by the Toronto Society.

A Toronto viewpoint, in which I am sure we all concur in our Society, is that there are indeed skilled public relations people who are not members of our Society. There are also a number of people in Canada who choose, perhaps because of the growing prestige of the name, to call themselves public relations representatives, but who in fact would not qualify for membership in our Society.

If you examine the Quebec Society appendix, Mr. Chairman, you will find some concern over concentration of ownership of media. The Toronto society adds the view that this is not necessarily undesirable, providing individual publishers, editors, or station directors are allowed to establish, with complete independence, their own news and editorial policy.

All of our societies recognize the impact of media in influencing the public, and are therefore vitally interested in the quality and attitude of Canadian media.

Our Toronto society expressed another interesting viewpoint...and I feel our Quebec members would agree...that the public relations function helps media representatives obtain background information and current facts that might otherwise be unobtainable without considerable research. Practitioners carry out this function by providing media representatives with such material as copies of speeches, background reports, and fact sheets, and by arranging direct meetings with senior officials and experts who might otherwise be inclined to avoid saying anything...the familiar "no comment".

All of us in public relations are acutely aware that most of the material supplied to news media is accepted in direct relation to the reputation of the people at its source. We know that we are hired to represent a specialized point of view...just as a lawyer is hired to present whatever case he may choose to accept in the best possible light...and we know that material presented to the mass media will be closely examined by them.

And now, Mr. Chairman, if I may, I quote directly from the Toronto viewpoint.

"We feel that critical examination of intent should also be applied by media representatives. Occasionally news coverage, in its effort to attract readers, will emphasize through headlines, or leave out, certain facts in the copy, and by so doing, create an unbalanced or less accurate account of what in fact took place.

"This concern is expressed also about radio and television. Although lengthy interviews are recorded, the pressure to entertain listeners and viewers as well as inform them, sometimes leads to editing in which serious omissions are made from statements of fact or comment, placing the person or persons interviewed in a position never intended. In today's society of almost instant communication and the consequent increased pressure of deadlines, errors such as these can have devastating effects.

It is more important than ever, therefore, for the media to guard against such errors, and when created, to rectify them as quickly and effectively as possible. In so doing, the media gains, rather than loses stature for its credibility."

We believe, Sir, that we have a most representative gathering of senior public relations officials here for your questions today, each prepared to express the variation of opinion which goes to make up our Society, and by extension, our country.

Mr. Chairman, we warmly invite your questions.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Wood. Did we identify these people not only by their positions in the organization but by their professional role as well? I think the Senators would be interested. Perhaps they could introduce themselves.

Mr. R. Brian O'Regan, President, Ottawa Society: I am Brian O'Regan, Assistant Director of the Information Division, Canada Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Douglas W. Heal, National Secretary and President British Columbia Society: I am Douglas Heal, Vice President, Public Relations Division, James Lovick Limited.

Mr. Aimé Gagné, National Council Director: Aimé Gagné: Manager of Public Relations for Alcan, and at the same time commissioner on a Royal Commission in Quebec looking into the linguistic situation.

Mr. Charles A. Harris, Second Vice President: Charles Harris, Director of Public Relations, Canadian National Railways.

Mr. John Balcer, President Quebec Society: ...

Mr. Melbourne V. James, President Toronto Society: Mel James, Public Relations Manager, Toronto Area, Bell Canada.

The Chairman: I think that it is important for the Senators to realize that although you are not here in your corporate capacities that you do have significant corporate capacities in the public relations area.

Thank you for your statement. I think perhaps we could turn to the questioning and if anyone wants to chime in just indicate and we will try and get you on stage, as it were.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Wood, here is a golden opportunity for a little public relations for your Society. Do you feel your client could get along without you today?

Mr. Wood: Not as successfully, Sir.

Mr. Fortier: Why?

Mr. Wood: Because of the need for communication, public dialogue, understanding.

Mr. Fortier: Is not the public sophisticated enough that it does not need to be educated by public relations people.

Mr. Wood: Public relations people alone certainly cannot educate people. That is not our whole function, Sir. I invite comments from other members of our organization.

(Translation)

Mr. Aimé Gagné, Director National Council: Mr. Fortier, in public relations it is not just a matter of providing information to the journalists. It is above all a matter of acting as adviser to management. The president of a company cannot be aware of all the activities of the different sectors of his enterprise. One of these sectors is the opinion of his employees and the opinion of the public at large. So, we are close to the public and close to the employees, and we are able to pass on to the management what the employees are thinking, what the public is thinking and what the politicians are thinking. In the light of what we are gathering we are able to suggest the means of action to help the enterprise play its role.

Mr. Fortier: Do you not believe that in a company such as the one for which you are working, for instance, Alcan, this information or these pressures would naturally be exerted, without the specific role you are playing?

Mr. Gagne: I will give you an example. One or two years ago, we at Alcan went through a rather difficult period. One of our enterprises was misunderstood by the public in a certain province of Canada. This was due to the fact that management was more occupied with its role of managing that enterprise, with providing to its employees what they needed, with creating the necessary working conditions. Unfortunately, the outside public was not aware of the steps taken by the enterprise, and the amounts of money which it had spent on the improvement of its working conditions, and so the result was that we made headlines in the newspapers. Today, due to the service of the public relations, the situation is reversed. Where formerly Alcan was accused of certain wrongs, today, well, the people say: "Those problems no longer exist at Alcan." There you have a practical, efficient, positive role of a public relations service.

Mr. Fortier: Which has accomplished, as you say, this service for Alcan?

Mr. Gagne: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Which would not have been accomplished otherwise?

Mr. Gagne: I would not say that. It is impossible to say that. I believe that it would have taken time. You know, businessmen are not trained to communicate with us. They are communicating more and more. They need advisers somewhat like they need legal advisers, to help them in the course of their activities.

Mr. Fortier: You are speaking there, up to a point, of the education which you are contributing to your employers, are you not? To the people with whom you are rubbing elbows in the enterprise where you are working? But there is also another aspect, the education of the public isn't that right?

Mr. Gagne: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Meaning the press releases or other releases concerning the enterprise with which you are associated which are sent to the newspapers, radio and TV, etc. In that case, you are trying to educate the public in the same manner, or are you trying to present the best possible image of your employer?

Mr. Gagne: I do not like the word "educate", if you permit me, Mr. Fortier. We are trying to inform...

Mr. Fortier: Inform...

Mr. Gagne: ...the public concerning the enterprise, in order that it may better understand its problems and also its successes, and, above all, its contribution to the economy of an area, a city, or a province.

Mr. Fortier: Is it your testimony before the Committee that this information would not be given to the public, whether this involves the reading public or the public watching TV, in an adequate manner except for the precise role you are playing?

Mr. Gagne: In the majority of cases, I would say that, if we were not there, communication would not be made as easily, and maybe not with as much success as it is done today. There may be some exceptions, but, in general, I would say, that without the specialists in communications or public relations, it would be more difficult.

Mr. Fortier: What I want to get at is this: If the newspapers, if the written press and the electronic press really had wished to play that role, could they have hired employees for their newspapers, their radio, their TV, who would do exactly the same work you are doing?

Mr. Gagne: Could they have done the same work?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Gagne: You know, it is somewhat like a legal adviser. When he is working for an enterprise, he wins and earns the confidence of the people of that enterprise. Therefore, when a legal adviser arrives quite new from the outside, could he obtain that confidence overnight? With the newspaper, it is the same thing. It takes years before he can be appreciated by management of an enterprise. While we are on the inside, we first of all earn the confidence of these people. When we have that confidence, we are able to obtain from management information which, normally, it would not be willing to give. But, since we are there, these people have the right to know. They have the right to know if a plant is going to be closed. They have the right to know if people are going to be laid off. They have the right to know if those employees will receive allowances. But would the boss himself be willing to give that information? I do not know. It depends upon the boss. There are some bosses who are outgoing and communicative by nature; others are not. Therefore, our role is to get the information from management and to see to it that it plays its corporate role.

Mr. Fortier: Does the public relations counsellor play a role in the company, in the development of the company, that nobody attached to a newspaper, to a radio or TV station could play effectively.

Mr. Gagne: Effectively, yes. I could not be categorical. There are certain newspapers who are successful because, for instance, in a small city they know the management of an enterprise very well, and are able at a certain time to act as public relations directors. But, in general, I would say, no.

Mr. Fortier: What happened before 1955, before your company was formed as a corporation?

Mr. Gagne: There were public relations directors—I have been one for 31 years. It is not necessary to be a member of the company to be, as was said by our president, an excellent public relations adviser. There are some who are members; others are not.

Mr. Fortier: Nevertheless, there has been a development, a marked development during the last twenty years?

Mr. Gagne: There is no doubt about it. Since it exists, it has established much more strict criteria than before. It has enabled the company to improve its reputation. I would say the same thing for the profession above all.

Mr. Fortier: I understand. I should like you to justify your existence, you see.

Mr. Gagne: Do not ask me that, because I would take hours.

Mr. Fortier: I believe that you have done rather well in a few minutes.

[English]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Wood, you make a point in your brief as well as in your verbal remarks this afternoon that there are people who call themselves public relations representatives who are not members of your society.

What are the qualifications for membership in the society? I realize again in your brief you say that you can become a member after five years but what sort of control do you really exercise in deciding that Mister X will become a member in good standing and Mister Y will not be considered a member in good standing? Have you such a thing as an admission committee?

Mr. Wood: We do, Sir. At each level we have an application chairman of the membership committee. The society is charged with the responsibility of screening the membership prior to or upon application of a person and then that membership application is sent to the national body which also screens the application. I should like to point out, however, there are several categories of membership as outlined in the brief. We encourage probationary membership amongst students or people intending to become serious public relations practitioners. You can become an associate member, akin to apprenticeship, after two years and an active member after five years full time public relations practice.

Mr. Fortier: Has the National Society ever refused membership to one who had not been recommended by a member association?

Mr. Wood: Yes, Sir.

Mr. Fortier: Has this happened often or are these isolated cases?

Mr. Wood: Not often, Sir, no; because the member societies I think are taking their responsibilities quite seriously and by the time the application comes to National it is generally thoroughly screened.

Mr. Fortier: What criteria would you use at the national level that was overlooked at the provincial level?

Mr. Wood: In some instances it is an honest oversight as to the date—two year or five year—and in some cases we send the application back for clarification of a particular period of activity where we are not sure from the description that it was indeed a bona fide public relations activity.

Mr. O'Regan: If I may add to that: initially it must be proposed and seconded by two active members who have attested to the applicant's qualifications. I should like to mention that the Chairman of the membership committee at the regional level must also check qualifications on the application and submit it to the Board of Directors at the regional level. A final check as to the qualification of the applicant is the thirty day period in which the name is posted among all members across Canada and following no objection becomes ratified as a member.

Mr. Fortier: Could one member, once a name is posted, veto the application for membership of an individual.

Mr. O'Regan: He would not veto it. It would be brought back to the chairman to check into the pro and con of whether the objection was valid or not.

Mr. Fortier: Would a hearing be held in the normal course of things where it was a contested application.

Mr. O'Regan: I would think in most cases this would be referred back to the Regional Society for their action. Most of the applicants, as our National Chairman pointed out, who are not permitted to join, they are caught at the regional level.

Mr. Fortier: What about the disciplining of members?

The Chairman: Before you go on to that... the applications are at the local level, are they?

Mr. O'Regan: That is right.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Wood asked about the fall-out at the National level; what about the local level? Is it tough to join the PR Society?

Mr. O'Regan: I don't know that I would use that particular word, Senator Davey, I believe our criteria for membership are strong but valid. He must be highly qualified, have the skill and knowledge. We do rely upon the proposer and seconder, their ability in the field and of course their active membership. I would think in the Ottawa Society in the past year out of a possible 15 applications we have rejected at least 3.

The Chairman: Without being unfair to those people, for what kind of reasons have you rejected them? Is lack of experience the basic one?

Mr. O'Regan: Partly. I think lack of experience... if you refer to the Chairman's opening remarks he said there are people who call themselves by the name of public relations people who are not qualified for the practice as we in the Society practice it.

Mr. Harris: For example, there have been people who have been salesmen and not public relations people and on examination it became quite clear they are in sales promotion or some field of that kind.

Mr. Wood: If I could amplify the remark, we welcome membership in the society. We want qualified and bona fide public relations people to join the society. We sincerely hope that the society is elevating or improving the practice of public relations.

The Chairman: You have 950 members—I think I saw that figure somewhere in the brief. In your opinion, and I realize it can only be a guess, how many bona fide public relations practitioners are there in Canada who do not belong to the Society.

Mr. Wood: I should think something in the order of 400.

The Chairman: Do you attempt to recruit those people in.

Mr. Wood: This varies with the society.

The Chairman: It is a local matter?

Mr. Wood: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you in Toronto, Mr. James?

Mr. James: Yes, we do try, Senator. We would be very anxious to have a good many Toronto practitioners in. There are two main reasons for it: One is membership is voluntary. The other reason is in some corporations they feel they cannot sponsor the membership of their entire public relations body. There are people working in public relations who are not at the sponsored level. Those are two big reasons. I appreciate that there are perfectly fine practicing public relations people who do not in fact belong to the Society. We do try to mount a campaign every year and the membership has gone up.

The Chairman: Of the 950 members how many of them would be in Ontario? Could you break it down regionally for us?

Mr. James: The Toronto Society has 300.

Mr. O'Regan: 109 in Ottawa.

Mr. Heal: Just over 80 in British Columbia.

Mr. Balcer: 255 in Quebec.

The Chairman: How many would you have in the Maritimes.

Mr. Wood: We have a roster here. It would be in the order of 45 to 50.

The Chairman: On the Prairies the same, I suppose?

Mr. Wood: A little more; probably 75 to 90.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagné: Mr. President, we also have a section in Newfoundland, which must have from 15 to 20 persons.

[English]

Mr. Chairman: I have some other questions but I know the one you are leading up to. You go ahead, please, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: What is a member is a bad PR man? Do you discipline him?

Mr. Wood: We have a judiciary committee and under the terms of our bylaws there are grounds upon which a person can be brought before the judiciary committee.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. I think some of them are recited in your brief. I am more concerned about the quality of the work done by the individual. I repeat: Supposing he is a bad PR man and doesn't necessarily do anything unethical. Just as there could be a bad doctor or lawyer...a bad lawyer would not be ousted from the Bar Association.

Mr. Chairman: He would not be?

Mr. Fortier: Well, I have lost a number of cases! That is what I mean...not a competent man.

Mr. Wood: We do not have any legal grounds other than ethical, other than stated in our constitution, for removing a member once he is a member of the Society. Hopefully our admission screening would catch those before they happened. They don't always do so.

Mr. Harris: It might be mentioned that the accreditation...this whole question of standards and qualifications is going to be resolved in the accreditation system which is only a year old now. Something like 103 of the members of the 950 who have written their examinations have become accredited, which is not bad.

Mr. Chairman: Could I ask you a question on that? I would like to ask about the exam. Is it a written exam?

Mr. Harris: There are three parts to the process. One is that you have to submit a project, something that you have worked on in your organization perhaps. Secondly, you have to undergo a written exam which takes the better part of three hours and finally you have an oral exam.

Mr. Chairman: What kind of questions might be asked first on the written?

Mr. Harris: I am not allowed to divulge that or I will lose accreditation.

Mr. Fortier: You pass them?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

Mr. O'Regan: I would like to add that with the application to write the examination, the accreditation examination, you are required to provide the names of six references and our accreditation board does contact each one of the references.

Mr. Chairman: I don't want to labour the point but surely you can give some idea of the kind of question. Would it be a sort of case history he would be asked or what would he do?

Mr. Wood: First of all I should like to add to something that Mr. Harris said. He indicated that our accreditation had been in process for a year. This is only true of the English speaking portion of the membership because of some translation difficulties we had on our case history.

Mr. Chairman: It is a case history thing?

Mr. Wood: If I could speak to your specific question. The kind of questions we relate to...are intended to find out the public relations experience of the person taking the examination rather than the type of question which would ask you to do a logarithm on a certain specific number or a page number in a text.

Mr. Chairman: What percentage of people trying have passed the exams?

Mr. Wood: The accreditation board is a separately operated entity under the direction of Dr. Roby Kidd. The National executive does not have access to the exact figures but we are told the failure rate is very low indeed, less than 2 per cent.

Mr. Chairman: Less than 2 per cent?

Mr. Wood: Yes, I should think so.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Wood, you make much of the statement in your brief that the practice of public relations in Canada has become a recognized management function. I stress the word "management" because it appears throughout your brief. Are you implying here your members are all top management men, which they are not.

Mr. Wood: No, Sir. The term is not to imply that management has the ultimate responsibility for the function of the public relations but in order that the public relations function properly in any organization, it must have open complete access to top management. You cannot very well represent somebody that you don't understand.

Mr. O'Regan: In effect public relations is the staff or support function for management, with management having the responsibility for public relations.

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Gagné.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagne: Mr. Fortier, in most large companies, the public relations department is run by a vice-president. So it is part of the management team, and this vice-president is assisted by specialists in the various areas of public relations work. To give my own case as an example, I am directly responsible to the vice-president of Alcan, and when he is away, I take his place at board meetings. If problems come up while I am away, my assistants take them in turn and bring them to the attention of the management, even of the president, and recommend courses of action to him. So they say that all the public relations experts are management people, and if there were not this trust, and this free access to the senior officers of the company, they will not be able to do their work as they should.

[English]

Mr. Fortier: I wonder, Mr. O'Regan did you get a translation of that answer?

Mr. O'Regan: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How would you relate? You are with the Department of Agriculture, you are a civil servant.

Mr. O'Regan: A public servant.

Mr. Fortier: How would you relate that view, those comments, to your particular role in the Government Department? Do you have access to the "top dog"?

Mr. O'Regan: Yes, I do. I am an Assistant Director.

Mr. Chairman: I assume you mean the Minister when you say "top dog".

Mr. Fortier: You can read what you want.

Mr. O'Regan: I would say "yes", I do have access when it is required for me to do so. Under normal circumstances the Director of the Information Division is responsible to the Deputy Minister and is a member of the Senior Management Committee; he is not restricted to information aspects.

Mr. Fortier: There is a parallel between your role in the Government and your colleagues' role in private companies.

Mr. O'Regan: Yes. I shall be sitting in the particular role for the next three weeks while my Director is on holidays.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagne: Might I add something for everyone's information? Taking a company like ours as an example, I direct public relations activities throughout the country, but I have assistants in each province, and they look after affairs at the provincial level. They belong to the provincial management of the company. In Kitimack, for example, where we have a large plant, we also have a public relations department. It is the duty of the director of the department to advise the manager of the Kitimack plant, and we have the same thing in Newfoundland, in Vancouver, or in Toronto or elsewhere.

Mr. Fortier: Do these people report directly to you?

Mr. Gagne: In disciplinary matters and overall thinking. But in their daily work, they act as advisers to the local management, and have to assist local management in performing their civic duty and meeting the requirements of their positions.

Mr. Fortier: How do you at Alcan—I keep coming back to the word "educate"—how do you educate a man who joins the company to be an expert in public relations?

Mr. Gagne: I do not like the word "educate", if it's all the same to you. This is what I did last year.

Mr. Fortier: You do not like education. However, on the Gendron Commission they talk about it fairly often.

Mr. Gagne: What we do now is to recruit either from within the company or from among people in the social sciences, and after a year or two in one of the departments, you invite them to join your own, and there you train them. Last year we began by hiring a young student from Loyola College in Montreal in the communication department, and he spent a summer working for us in Montreal. This summer, if he returns, we are going to send him to Kitimack, where he will work in the public relations department, but as a member of a team. If he comes back next summer, we shall send him to Arvida, and he will be able to work in both languages, and after that we shall assign him to a permanent position.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gagne, in most companies like yours, where your colleagues work—I am putting the question to you and your colleagues—do you prefer to go after someone who is just leaving school, college or university, and gradually promote him within the company, or do you more often go after middle-aged people and then try and fit them into your department?

Mr. Gagne: Your question is in two parts. Firstly, if I have the time, I prefer to get young people and train them. If I do not have the time, I will either look for someone in another department within the company, or go outside. But on that point, there may be others who...

[English]

Mr. Fortier: Would Mr. Wood care to comment on that question?

Mr. Wood: If a company is large enough to have more than one or two people in its public relations or information department I should think it would prefer to bring in people and move them up. But if a company or an organization were hiring only one person I should think they would prefer to hire a fully experienced person because of the managerial aspect of the function.

Mr. Harris: We were lucky last year to get two from Loyola and one from Carleton in Ottawa. All three are doing very well. This is becoming more and more the case now you have good Departments of Journalism or communications, or whatever name you want to give them.

Mr. O'Regan: I would like to add to that that we are in the midst of doing something quite similar at the Canadian National. We will have two students coming in in May, one from the Carleton University School of Journalism, majoring in public relations, and the other one from Macdonald College. It depends particularly on the type of job you have whether you bring in students or bring in the more mature and more experienced people. I think perhaps the trend is toward students. One member of the Ottawa Society has an apprenticeship of 18 students working for his company.

Mr. Wood: Mr. James had a comment.

Mr. James: I was going to add there is a mix in our company. Sometimes we go outside for senior people with special skills. We do also have people start their public relations career say from University or shortly thereafter—perhaps one or two years of newspaper experience. These are other people who move into the department and back out into their own department two years hence. They have two years in the department doing Administrative and other work and then move back to their own department. We have a mix.

Mr. Fortier: It used to be that public relations people came into a corporation from active journalism. This was the case in England.

Mr. Wood: Predominantly. We used to practically insist.

Mr. Fortier: Do you find that the young people who join your respective companies or associations fresh out of college or university lack a certain necessary required knowledge of the everyday newspaper, radio and television life, which seems to me would be so important.

Mr. Wood: Mr. Fortier, as I tried to say at the outset there are many other functions of public relations other than the news relations.

Mr. Fortier: Let's talk about that one.

Mr. Wood: It is therefore as necessary today as it might have been twenty years ago.

Mr. Fortier: Because of the other side?

Mr. Wood: The other side has evolved. I would like Mr. Heal to comment.

Mr. Heal: The newest experience does give some very practical background in the researching and assessing of information and the communicating of it. After all the communications function is the essential part of our business; so high skills in communications are very well regarded by all of us in the business. We tend to bring a great many people in from the news media and in many cases they also have a very strong academic background. In our own organization our four senior people were all university graduates before having anywhere from 10 to 15 years in the newspaper business.

Mr. Harris: There was another aspect to the question, Mr. Fortier: Do these people lack experience, the ones coming from from University? I think the courses are giving them a good deal of practical experience. I know we have students fairly regularly now coming around on assignments in public relations and they certainly carry out the practical assignments in journalism. At Loyola they have a very well equipped TV, radio news room and production facilities. So again it is not just an academic process.

The Chairman: Could I ask Mr. Wood a question for the benefit of the Senators. I think they would be interested. Could you state concisely the relationship between the practice of advertising and the practice of public relations? What is the relationship?

Mr. Wood: They are two different functions.

The Chairman: Do you want to expand on that?

Mr. Wood: Public Relations is involved with the entire field of communication or can choose and make use of many forms of communication. Whereas advertising is a paid message usually requiring specialized skills.

The Chairman: Would it be fair to say that one of the techniques a PR consultant can employ is advertising.

Mr. Wood: Certainly advertising can be used as one form of communication, yes.

The Chairman: A public relations word we hear a great deal about is "image". What is public relations imagery? Is that a bad word in the Society or a good word?

Mr. Wood: I don't like the word myself.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Wood: To me it connotes something that is not really there.

Mr. Harris: Artificial.

Mr. Wood: Artificiality.

The Chairman: In other words, in the context of your society it is a bad word.

Mr. Wood: The Society has not made any judgment as a Society. We don't take exception to the word. We think that people intend it to mean "reputation". If that is the way it is intended I have no objection.

The Chairman: How do you personally describe a corporation's overall reputation? Is "reputation" the word you use?

Mr. Wood: "Reputation" is the word I use.

The Chairman: I would like to talk to you about the reputation of PR people. I was going to say "image" but let us say the "reputation" of the PR people.

The Globe and Mail in an editorial, which I am sure you saw, appearing on July 7th, 1969 said, referring to the PR counsel: "The opportunity to influence what the public reads, hears and sees is as great as it is subtle."

Do you think your influence is "great" and do you think it is "subtle"?

Mr. Wood: I would like to think it is as great as that editorial seems to believe it is. I have very great respect for newspaper people. I think they examine things that are given to them with skill and a careful eye. Mr. Charles Harris, could you comment on that?

Mr. Harris: The word "subtle" suggests something a little sinister. I don't think there is very much of that in public relations.

The Chairman: Let me ask you another question, Mr. Harris. The Globe and Mail is a well respected newspaper in this country and it says editorially that you fellows have a great influence and that it is a subtle influence. We have put this to many of the publishers who have come before this Committee. I think we have asked everyone of them to describe their relationship with public relations people, to describe the public relations function, if you will, and to comment upon it.

What do you think the average reaction has been?

Mr. Harris: About public relations?

The Chairman: What do you think the media thinks of you people generally?

Mr. Harris: I think it would vary depending on the personal experience they have had, that an individual reporter or any newsman would have had with a public relations organization.

Mr. Wood: Mr. Chairman, I think they probably view us as a useful source of information subject to further checking.

Mr. Heal: Mr. Chairman, of all the information and advice that is available to management, the public relations function is probably the one that is most in the forefront. Certainly there is nothing hidden about the connection of the public relations man in advising a company or acting for a company. Our names are put to every piece of information that goes out on behalf of that company and in many cases probably the news media would more often know the public relations representative than the legal or financial counsel of the company because it is in the forefront of the day-to-day relationship with the company.

I was going to say at the best level of performance in public relations, I think we bring a specialized focus of attention to the communications requirement and implications of any situation. If a project is being initiated there are concerns about the financing of it, technical concerns about bringing it into production and concerns about how it will affect all of the people who are involved—government, shareholders and employees. It is at that level we bring a specialized focus of attention to advising management on the implications of the situation.

Mr. Harris: I wanted to add an instance to your specific question, Mr. Chairman. We are in the process of taking a survey now to find out exactly that—what the media do think of us. This is not the first time for this particular survey. It involves about twenty companies who go in on a corporate basis and is done by an independent survey firm. The sort of questions they want to get at are in terms of whether they think the information they are getting from us is accurate; is it freely volunteered; what is our reputation for honesty in dealing with them, giving the bad news as well as the good.

The last one we took, the last one we were apart of showed our reputation was pretty good. I am talking about our own company now.

The Chairman: I am concerned with the aspect of your activity which relates to media relations. I am asking the question specifically about that. Does the media concern itself with whether the PR people are members of your Society or not. Is the media concerned about whether or not the PR people belong to the Society.

Mr. Harris: I don't really think so.

The Chairman: Would it help you if they were.

Mr. Wood: I think it would be of help to the media but this is a highly biased point of view.

The Chairman: Mr. Wood, let me ask you a question. You say in your oral brief, if I could quote, you say: "there are also a number of people in Canada who choose, perhaps because of the growing prestige of the name, to call themselves public relations representatives."

What evidence have you go to offer, what evidence can you bring, that the name "public relations representative" has a growing prestige.

Mr. Wood: In almost any classified advertising section of the newspaper today you will find that instead of an advertisement for "a salesman wanted" "a salesman with a car wanted", it is a "public relations representative".

The Chairman: Is that not unfortunate from your point of view.

Mr. Wood: They are really looking for a salesman but in order to enhance the prestige of that position, they are using the name "public relations representative". It is unfortunate from our point of view, yes.

The Chairman: From your point of view it is unfortunate.

Mr. Wood: Yes.

The Chairman: What indication is there that public relations representatives, as such, have a "growing prestige".

Mr. Wood: Because of the desire of non-public relations people to call themselves public relations people. This is what we had in mind, what I had in mind when I made the oral statement.

Mr. O'Regan: I would like to say, Senator Davey, that the increased usage of our services by the media is certainly an indication of the prestige slowly established by the Public Relations Society. In answer to a former question, it has been my experience that the electronic media, radio and television, do have a relatively good regard for our services and the print media is mixed. I was quite pleased to have come into my possession the submission from the Montreal Standard Publishing Company and I think on the basis of paragraph 25 in the submission we have a relatively good reputation with that company.

The Chairman: You should be careful. I have the submissions of all the other newspapers.

Mr. O'Regan: I realize that.

The Chairman: They were not all as generous.

Mr. O'Regan: Radio and television generally good; print media mixed. With regard to the print media, if I may draw attention to the public record the senior Canadian Press man in Ottawa, he has gone on record stating he finds valuable, the public relations service of the Government. The common complaint of the mass media in that it is flooded with press releases but he has stated he finds use for every one he receives. Every one is being used and not put in the waste paper basket.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagné: What often happens is that a number of small companies have what they call public relations officers, people who are not professionals, and they flood the newspapers with news releases that are really free advertising, and that can hurt us.

When you have worked with newspaper editors and radio and television people for a number of years, you establish very close relations, and if you ask them, you will discover that they appreciate the service you provide. I have been in the profession myself for thirty years, and often I even took the journalists side with our company, to get them more information than the company wanted to give.

I do not want to take issue with critics of the newspapers, and I would not like to generalize, because in our profession, there are some good public relations specialists. But there are also some who are not so good, and the bad apples often spoil the barrel.

[English]

The Chairman: Senator Smith, were you going to ask a question?

Senator Smith: I would like to come back to something said a moment ago by Mr. O'Regan. It is my impression that when we had some discussions with various segments of the business press that they were the most enthusiastic of all with regard to the use of material given to them by the public relations people in general. It was balanced to some extent by quite a number who left me with the impression they viewed it with some suspicion as to whether it was really news. Perhaps they didn't have time to check.

Have you any comment to make on the question? In regard to the business press, perhaps that does not concern you in your particular function with the Department of Agriculture as much as it would one of the industrial representatives here.

Mr. O'Regan: I think basically, Sir, we are dealing with value judgment between the public relations man as opposed to the editor in his judgment as to the factors which pertain to news within the release. I think it is necessary to draw distinction between news and information. I would think that in Government, to a great extent, we deal more with information than news... information of the services and programmes of the Government which the editor would not classify as news. The only time that is news is when the initial policy is announced. The programme is not news.

Senator Smith: The complaint you mentioned about the great mass of stuff that comes over the editor's desk is true of the weekly newspaper editors at least. They say they cannot cope with this at all and most of it goes in the waste paper basket.

Mr. O'Regan: I would agree with you, I have had that reaction. I attend their annual convention. I also had some positive reaction with regard to my own department. They do make use of what we call our NEWS, NEWS, NEWS.

Senator Smith: We have them coming down to visit with us the next week. You better come down.

Mr. Harris: I think this is one area where the public relations people have not done enough to improve their service—in the area of tailoring things like press releases to the specific needs of the media. It is being improved but I am not sure all of us have done as much as we could to send out separate releases for radio, for example; whereas years ago they used to get the same release as newspapers. Brian O'Regan is doing a first-class job, for instance, of putting out special productions for the radio people. I think it is likely that the business press is one area where the material has been specifically tailored to a given publication interest and requirements.

Senator Smith: And of course it is not tailored as news. They are putting out information.

Mr. Harris: That is right. We know they are awfully anxious to get it.

Mr. James: The business press in the general area of the feature-type article—it is not hard news. There is also the problem of the heavy type of article. They come and say we would like to do the same thing you are doing. We would like to see it have application and be able to tell the rest of our readers about that. We do tend to tailor-make a story. There is a close relationship because of this.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, could I ask another question? I would be interested in the regularity which seems to occur in something. There will be an information or a news story, a combination of both, which appears in a magazine or newspaper, and somewhere pretty close to that same material will appear a highly priced ad for that particular company involved in that general subject area. Is that ethical in your functioning as a public relations people? Is it ethical for you to assume if you buy an ad, you have a better right to expect the material which you submit to be published close to or on the same page as that ad?

Mr. Harris: I would like to think that that is coincidental. We are an advertiser, advertising is part of our public relations programme. When Canadian National uses a publication, whether it is the weekly newspaper or a magazine or a radio station or whatever, it is because we are getting value for what we are paying in that medium and not with any intention of influencing. There are people in the company who suggest that because we put an ad in the publication we ought to get a better shake on the news. My answer to that is if we didn't think it was a good advertising buy in the first place we would not be there.

Mr. Wood: It is generally true, Sir, I think that most public relations people don't think too highly of magazines or publications of any kind that would make that kind of statement.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could preface this question by asking: Are any of you with the PR Counselling firms?

Mr. Heal: Yes, I am, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman: That is James Lovick?

Mr. Heal: Yes.

The Chairman: Is there a corporate membership in the Society?

Mr. Heal: No; it is entirely on an individual basis and each member of the Society can only qualify on his individual performance and background of experience.

The Chairman: Do you in the Toronto Society, Mr. James, have representative members from Public Relations Services Limited.

Mr. James: I believe one.

The Chairman: Public Relations Services Limited are the company which has been buying the full page from the Toronto Telegram and running on that page editorial copy. You are quoted, Mr. James, in Marketing of September 15, 1969, as saying: "I think it is bad. My concern is what implications it has for press ethics." The article goes on as follows, "James feels the reader would tend to lose faith in the accuracy and objectivity of newspapers and reporters if the reader could not tell what is advertising and what is important reporting."

Could you comment on that?

Mr. James: First of all let me say the page is not identified as advertising although it does have a leader at the top which indicates it is paid space. However many people do read the page and perhaps would read it with the idea it is hard news. I am concerned, as I expressed it in the comment in Marketing, if, for instance, the financial editor—this is in the financial section—if the financial editor did have other views than those expressed in the paid space. It makes it more difficult for him to point out those views when they might be on the page opposite and it might be one contrary to his views. I would prefer not to seek communications of this type. It might be alright if it was clearly identified as advertising and perhaps in a different type face. I have some concern that it puts the paper and the editor under some duress, if in fact the articles were quite different from the policy of the paper.

The Chairman: I gather, Mr. Balcer, that the same practice is engaged in by Le Devoir?

Mr. Balcer: I understand they had the deal for one issue and they have dropped it, I think. Is that right, Mr. Gagne?

The Chairman: Mr. Gagne, does Le Devoir still do this?

Mr. Gagne: To the best of my knowledge, no. I know some former newspapermen and PR people have made unofficial representation to some of the staff of Le Devoir.

The Chairman: Is the Telegram still engaged in this practice, Mr. James?

Mr. James: I believe so. I haven't seen the paper recently. I can't recall the time I saw it last.

The Chairman: It quotes the President of PRSL, Mr. John Hall, as saying:

"The services of value to both the Telegram and the client as it producers timeless in-depth articles of the equality that cannot be attained by the media which have neither the time nor the resources to devote to such projects."

You don't agree that is a valid contention by Mr. Hall?

Mr. James: I don't think so. I think the in-depth articles—certainly the Toronto papers, and I can only speak for them—that they now do in the Saturday section and other editions, I think they would be capable of doing them.

The Chairman: Mr. Wood, is there a Society position on these paid editorials—because that is what they are. Do you have a position?

Mr. Wood: The Society has not been asked to get a consensus on that.

The Chairman: Here is one of the biggest public relations counselling companies in Canada engaged in a very questionable practice and one which has occasioned a great deal of controversy certainly in and around

Toronto. Would this be the kind of thing your Society, the local Toronto branch, on which you could take a stand? Couldn't you discipline the representatives of this company who belong to this society?

Mr. Heal: Perhaps since Mr. James is involved... could I say something?

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Heal: We should recognize who has the prime area of responsibility as to whether the material is objectionable or fits into the policy of the newspaper. It's the newspaper's responsibility. It affects the judgment of their readers on the quality of their paper as to whether they run what would be called paid editorial space. The responsibility rests with the newspaper.

The Chairman: I would agree with you, Mr. Heal, in the first instance; but surely in the second instance it is also equally the concern of the public relations community when PRSL are engaged in practices open to question, notwithstanding the fact the newspaper is cooperating.

Mr. Heal: I think that is true. We have not obtained consensus of opinion across the country from this subject.

The Chairman: Mr. James, did you want to add something?

Mr. James: We haven't even obtained a consensus within the Board of the Toronto Society. This is a very difficult area because, as I mentioned earlier, it does identify this space as paid for by—I forget the name of the company. It is identified, the name of the company. It is not identified as paid for by PRSL.

Mr. Wood: I am not sure we could discipline the individuals who belong to the Society from that firm. He may have nothing to do with that particular project. His company is not a member of the Society.

Mr. James: I think the crux of the whole matter is it may be prepared so skilfully the editor of the paper might not have wanted to change a single word. It may have been prepared so skillfully they didn't have that much time available to research it but the operative quality of it is it has not been subjected to an editing pencil and therefore should be clearly labelled "advertising".

The Chairman: That and the fact it deceives the reader or it may deceive the reader.

May I ask you on page 13, section 44, you say: "we do not intend to deal in detail the ownership and control of mass media or their performance, influence and impact."

I would like to ask you why you shy away from making those observations, particularly when in appendix 'A' we have some very forthright observations which we would like to speak about in a moment or two—some very forthright observations from the Canadian Public Relations Society in Quebec. How is it that that Society could take a position and you fellows cannot.

Mr. Wood: Mr. Chairman, the Quebec Society questioned each of its members and I understand the appendix is a consensus of the questioning. There are as many different media in Canada, far more media than there are public relations people and the Society has not made a value judgment on individual papers or publications or radio or television stations from coast to coast. I am sure that all individual members of the Society have opinions about the quality of specific publications but it is impossible for the Society to make a value judgment of that nature.

The Chairman: May I ask you this? In appendix 'A', page 2, you say:

"The French-speaking members see this multi-media ownership as a threat to the freedom of the press, and to the exactitude and objectivity of information. The English members agree that it could be a threat to objectivity."

My first question is: Who wrote that sentence "The English members agree that it could be a threat to objectivity"? Is that the opinion of the Quebec Society or is that the opinion of the National Society?

Mr. Wood: It is the Quebec Society.

The Chairman: This is the English press and the Quebec Society?

Mr. Harris: Yes. It is made up of about 250 members—50-50.

The Chairman: I would like to talk about Quebec. Mr. Wood, are you in your capacity as a Public Relations Counsel in Calgary ... and not in your capacity as Chairman of the Society.. concerned about the increasing concentration of media ownership in Canada.

Mr. Wood: Not in the west, Sir.

The Chairman: In Canada?

Mr. Wood: Because of the nature of my specific duties I don't deal with media outside of Western Canada.

The Chairman: So in the west you are not?

Mr. Wood: There is no evidence to lead me to believe that there is any danger arising from multiplicity of ownership in the west.

The Chairman: Are there any other people not from Quebec who would care to state a personal opinion? I am not trying to draw you out but I think the Committee would be most anxious to hear before we turn to this Quebec appendix.

Mr. O'Regan: Senator, about five years ago I undertook a study paper, in the United States, based on the situation in the United States. It showed there that there has been a growing trend towards chain ownership and monopolization of the media which perhaps originated back in the 1890's. As a result of my studies and as much reference material as I could undercover, I found no real great concern over this particular issue in the United States. I am speaking now of 1965. In consultation with the Dean of Journalism at the University of Wisconsin and others they seem to agree with the conclusions I reached at that time.

With the evidence brought out before your Committee and my own continuing interest in this particular subject, I myself at this stage see no danger in chain ownership or monopolization except where it occurs in a localized area within a City or Province, as has been brought forward to you. I think basically the danger of this situation where there could be a manipulation of opinion is offset by the competing media which does exist in the country.

The Chairman: I think the Committee would be most interested in having a copy of your paper which we would return to you, if you wouldn't mind.

Mr. O'Regan: It goes a little beyond that particular subject.

The Chairman: Mr. Heal, do you want to comment on that? You are from a City where there are no newspapers!

Mr. Heal: We miss them. I have enjoyed the opportunity of reading the three Toronto newspapers and the Ottawa papers for the last few days. In Vancouver I don't think we see any harmful effects of chain ownership in the quality of material that is present in the two newspapers that still compete quite aggressively in the editorial content of the Vancouver Sun and the Province. I think the resources of the organizations involved in owning those two papers are such, they have possibly enabled both newspapers to continue in operation, where that might not have been possible on an independent basis.

The Chairman: Mr. Harris?

Mr. Harris: I am a Quebecker.

Mr. Wood: I am perfectly willing to comment on the Alberta situation.

The Chairman: I did want to talk about appendix 'A'. Perhaps, Mr. Fortier, you might want to put that question. Mr. James, have you any comments?

Mr. James: As was mentioned in the preamble the Toronto Society did feel it is not necessarily undesirable, providing there is individual determination with respect to editorial and broadcast policy. We in Toronto are fortunate, we are not speaking of chain operation as far as the daily press is concerned.

The Chairman: I think you are. The Globe and Mail is a member of a chain.

Mr. James: Yes; but not a one-ownership community. This is what I meant to say.

The Chairman: I want to ask you a question on the Toronto viewpoint. You say the Toronto Society adds the view this is not necessarily undesirable. "Not necessarily undesirable"—is a very interesting phrase. You go on to say "providing the individual publishers, editors, or station directors, are allowed to establish with complete independence their own views on editorial policy."

Now is it realistic to expect they will have complete independence?

Mr. James: No; I would suppose if you put it in those terms, it is not realistic. I think what we initially suggested and should have left in was "to establish and maintain their own news and editorial policy as an ongoing thing". Obviously it could be difficult to have complete independence at all times.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Balcer, this growing concentration of Quebec newspapers in the hands of one group—Mr. Desmarais' group—leads you to say that it may become, and has in effect become, a threat to the freedom of the press. On the other hand, you acknowledge in paragraph 2, further down—unfortunately, I do not have the French text.

Mr. Balcer: I was actually going to tell you, by way of introduction, that the original work on our text was done in French.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, I noticed that when I read the English text.

Mr. Balcer: Yes, and the translation was done locally; it is a literal translation.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, and I would very much prefer to have the French text, if you have a copy—I do not think I was given one.

Mr. Balcer: As an introduction, I think I should explain to you how our group from Quebec City proceeded.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, please.

Mr. Balcer: We examined the Senate Committee's terms of reference, and drew up a list of questions that relate directly to the points raised in the guidelines. We knew that the National Society would cover the public relations function in Canada, as such. So we restricted ourselves to an examination of the points that might concern the public relations function, and what we came up with was a questionnaire, to which our members replied; matters were so arranged that we could tell whether each respondent was English or French-speaking.

Therefore, a reply was drawn up for the two groups and we proceeded from there.

That is why, in our text, you often see that it is said that the opinion of francophones, natives of Quebec, is one thing and that of anglophones something else.

In the French text, coming to item 8, we say that our French-speaking members see the concentration of ownership as endangering freedom of the press, and so on. That is much milder than saying "we see a threat".

Mr. Fortier: Yes, it is a possible danger, given exaggerated importance?

Mr. Balcer: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: That brings me around to asking you this question: what is that danger? What are the factors which have been observed by your group, as being able to endanger freedom of the press? Is it simply the fact of concentration, or are they things that have happened, within newspapers belonging to the Desmarais group?

Mr. Balcer: I do not believe that they are really things which have happened, but it is mainly the fact that all information points would be controlled by the same source, if you like, whereas we would have only one side of the coin, on events which are to happen.

Mr. Fortier: Yes, but if I understand your testimony correctly, to-day, it is to the effect that this danger is not a fact. Nothing has happened which permits you to say: Ah! You had been told that there was a danger?

Mr. Balcer: Well, from what our members told us, I do not think so, no.

Mr. Fortier: Two paragraphs further down, you recognize that the concentration of media ownership is brought about first by economic and technological factors, and presently, in paragraphs 3, 4 and 5, you suggested that the Society was of the opinion that the quantity of information distributed in Quebec was sufficient. You say:

Our members are generally satisfied also with the quantity of English language media.

Then, how do you envisage quantitatively the number of separate media existing to-day, which have to cope with these economic and technological factors, which make independent newspaper publishing less and less profitable? How can the danger be eliminated?

Mr. Balcer: Well, several theories have been suggested. There certainly are several options, or suggestions, that have been made. Among others, it has been mentioned that some independent papers might receive government subsidies.

Mr. Fortier: Are you in favour of that?

Mr. Balcer: My personal opinion?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Balcer: Maybe, under certain conditions.

Mr. Fortier: If I understand correctly, in the questionnaire which you sent to your members, you did not ask them to suggest ways of eliminating those problems, did you?

Mr. Balcer: No.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Gagné, you were also consulted, obviously, you are one of the members to whom the questionnaire was sent?

Mr. Gagné: Yes, I answered the questionnaire, just like everyone else, but I did not participate in the analysis, because I am not a member of the board of directors of the Quebec section.

Mr. Fortier: Do you agree with the statement that reads:

That the concentration of ownership may endanger freedom of the press, truth and objectivity of information.

Mr. Gagné: Yes and no. I do not have the same fears as other people. Now, as you said, it "may endanger". At present, that is not the case.

Mr. Fortier: At present, men who own such enterprises are not endangering freedom of the press? Is that correct?

Mr. Gagné: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. Fortier: But, if those men were not who they are, in other words, if it were in the wrong hands, we could have poor newspapers?

Mr. Gagné: I wonder whether it is possible to-day. You know that newspapermen are syndicated and that the editorial staff cannot make certain changes as easily as it would like to. I do not have the fears others have. They exist perhaps, but...

Mr. Fortier: Obviously, you are speaking of a milieu, a community in Montreal, where there are several papers, several radio stations and several television stations?

Mr. Gagné: I will make a correction. In my answer, I included all of Quebec—because I used to be a newspaperman myself, I was editor of weeklies, I know the position of newspapers in Quebec, I do not say it from the financial point of view, because I am not in on heaven's secrets. I see papers, I know them, and I see how they answer the information needs of the public, I say that, at present, I do not see the dangers that some see. There may be a danger, but it escapes me.

Mr. Fortier: On the other hand, let us take New Brunswick as an example, where all English language newspapers are owned by one individual, that is, there is no competition where the written press is concerned in New Brunswick. It has been suggested, before this Committee, that certain news was not published in Mr. Irving's newspapers, just because the news concerned enterprises in which he was involved—or in which his conglomerate was involved. Is this one of the dangers to which you are referring here?

Mr. Balcer: That could be one, yes.

Mr. Fortier: I looked at Mr. Balcer, but Mr. Gagné, do you have something to say?

Mr. Gagné: This is my own personal opinion that I'm expressing. I am not up to date on the situation in New Brunswick, I should perhaps not answer that question, but since I have learned to live dangerously, I am going to answer.

I tell myself that if the situation exists—I would not so much blame the newspaper owner as I would be inclined to blame the editor of each of the newspapers.

You know, in life to-day, one must assume responsibilities, and one should not be afraid. Moreover, I would think of informing the public, because I have lived through similar situations. I was editor of a newspaper published by Alcan which, at one time, was a regional newspaper, because there were no other papers—and we let workers criticize us. I was able to get my directors to accept it. They accepted it and everyone expressed his point of view in the newspaper, and even criticized the company. It is necessary that those who assume responsibility, exercise that responsibility and be concerned about it. But, I do not want to criticize anyone...

Mr. Fortier: No, no.

Mr. Gagné: That is a personal opinion.

Mr. Fortier: That is why you are here, to give us your personal impressions, which are the result of your experience. You described what your experience was, which is very varied, and you certainly are in a position to express an opinion which deserves to be respected.

[English]

Senator McElman: Is there any chance of Mr. Gagné coming?

The Chairman: He wants to know if you will go to New Brunswick? He wants to know if you would go there and stay there?

Mr. Gagne: I don't know. It depends what challenge I would have.

Senator McElman: There might be a market for a good newspaperman.

Mr. Gagne: I am no good anymore! I can't write anymore!

Mr. Fortier: I wonder if Mr. Harris, who described himself as a Quebecker, and as such as referred to appendix 'A', collectively at least, would care to comment?

Mr. Harris: I agree, I think, with what they both said. It is a matter of degree. The idea is better expressed in French than English. What is said in Appendix A is: "It appears that the French-speaking and the English-speaking members of the Quebec society do not see the situation eye-to-eye. Everybody sees this as possible danger but I don't think any of us have seen any great evidence of it being real...that anything has happened as a result of it. I don't know what I could add.

The Chairman: I think that perhaps this might be an opportunity to thank our guests. As I think you gentlemen are aware, I think we really first became involved in a study of the influence of the public relations community on the mass media at the insistence of the Globe and Mail and the insistence of several programmes carried on the CBC; and because of that insistence it naturally lead us into an interest in the public relations function as it related to the mass media.

In the guidelines we forwarded to the publishers and others we asked specific questions about the role and function of the public relations industry. Those views are a matter of record and they are of considerable interest to us but they will be more meaningful because of the discussion we have had here today.

Certainly, Mr. Wood, we want to thank you. I won't thank all the people individually but I will thank you for bringing them. If the Society has additional ideas or views as a result of the hearing this afternoon we would be only too delighted to hear from you.

Mr. Wood: I thank you, Sir, for this opportunity, as I said at the outset. For the record, I think your committee might wish to know that all of us are appearing here today at our own or our organization's expense and not at the expense of the Society.

The Chairman: I was going to say I am delighted but I guess I shouldn't! Thank you.

We will adjourn until 4:15; then we will receive a brief from Mr. Beddoes.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, this afternoon we are receiving a brief from Mr. Dick Beddoes who is, as I think most of you know, a sports-writer for the Globe and Mail in Toronto. I think in your briefing books you have biographic material on Mr. Beddoes so perhaps no further introduction is necessary from me.

The brief which you prepared for us has only been circulated to the Senators now and therefore I might suggest you begin by reading the brief and following that we would like to ask questions on the contents of the brief and perhaps some other matters as well.

Mr. Dick Beddoes, Toronto Globe and Mail:

Alright I will read from the brief.

We shouldn't be too shocked, I suppose, to discover that the special Senate committee on the mass media is naive about ghost writing.

The naivete appeared to be shared by Frank Swanson, publisher of the Calgary Herald, one newspaper that buys the Bobby Orr hockey column from the Toronto Star Syndicate.

Mr. Swanson told the committee, in response to a question from the honourable chariman Keith Davey, that he "takes the column in good faith and would be very surprised if Bobby does not write the column himself."

That is not quite the answer I would have expected from a publisher in the 20th Century, although it may be possible to understand the Senate's unawareness.

Honourable Senators are shy, retiring gentlemen after all, quite out of touch with reality in the monkish environment of the Upper House.

Chances are the solons really do believe the columns by celebrities in newspapers are really written by the celebrities.

Perhaps the senators, back there braiding buggy whips in a cave, believe there actually is a Susan Ford in the Toronto Telegram.

Maybe they genuinely think Nancy Greene, Jean-Claude Kilby, Gordon Howe, Ron Northcott, Eagle Keys and Frank Clair write their own stuff.

If they are possessed of such charming naivete, the senators must also believe that politicians write their own speeches.

It might interest Senator Davey's committee, therefore, to know that most athlete-columnists collaborate with a ghost who owns one typewriter and 95,000 gallons of gall. This is how it is in the year of our landlord, 1970, gentlemen...

Not to put too fine a point on it, let's put a portion of a recent Orr column on the senatorial record:

In my case, Bobby Orr Enterprises hired a man to put my thoughts and suggestions into readable form. He talked to me regularly, in person or by telephone. But I didn't need any translation through a ghost writer to forecast that Toronto Maple Leafs would finish last in the Eastern Division of the NHL. I meant it.

When I rapped Chicago Black Hawks for their shabby treatment of Bobby Hull, that was me talking.

When I suggested Punch Imlach was an old primitive who complained about the freedom of speech of modern players, that was my accurate expression.

That comment reflects how many NHL players feel, that Imlach's yap, loud as it is, cannot span the generation gap between young players and old retreads.

As to Canadian senators: they ought to know that ghosts don't just pop out at Halloween...

As to Mr. Orr, he is having one of the spectacular seasons in all the years of the National Hockey League.

He is in position to win practically every major prize: The Ross Trophy as top scorer, the Norris as the best defenseman, the Hart as the most valuable, and the Pulitzer as the league's smoothest writer.

It may be that P. E. Trudeau, the general manager of Canada, writes all his own material—but I know a few bookmakers who would bet the other way.

Richard Nixon's presidential addresses in the United States are generally a concoction stirred up by several speech writers, or ghosts.

The normally reliable New York Times reported that Nixon's message of last Nov. 3, the one where he made a corny appeal to the "silent majority," was one of the few speeches the president wrote almost entirely by himself.

Writers on the order of Ted Sorenson and Arthur Schlesinger were big in the blatting order of the Kennedy Years.

They had, in John Morley's phrase, the glory of words. It was their language which helped the Kennedys defend the New Frontier. Time magazine reported that it was Sorenson's words which Edward Kennedy spoke publicly in describing his adventure last July with Mary Jo Kopechne on Chapquiddick Island.

The Toronto broadcaster and American historian, Joseph Morgan, claims ghosts have roamed the White House at least since the assassination of Lincoln.

Judge Samuel Roseman, for example, wrote many of the speeches delivered by Franklin Roosevelt in the celebrated Fireside Chats.

It may be that political speeches actually written by politicians is a lost art that died with Lincoln.

It must be recorded, in all honesty, that Abe probably wrote the Gettysburg Address himself, I must admit, in all humility, gentlemen, that no ghost could have improved upon it.

There is a large body of opinion, however—in the Parliamentary Press Gallery and around the watering holes of the West—that ghost writers should be running the country.

That is because the ghosts know what skeletons are hanging in what closets.

I find it peculiar that many briefs submitted by newspaper publishers to this committee made scant reference to the sports pages.

I say peculiar because the sports pages frequently contribute as much to a newspaper's circulation as any other section. It is true that some intellectuals on newspapers deem an interest in games evidence of arrested development.

They seldom miss an opportunity to boast that they are utterly uninformed about sports and wouldn't know Avelino Gomez from John Diefenbaker. There is a foolish snobbery that exposes their own deficiency in the inability to see a whole, round world in which games have a part along with politics and science and industry and art.

Lester Pearson always seemed to be a more civilized Canadian to me because he could see sports and politics running as an entry. Mr. Pearson always bled a little for the Toronto Maple Leafs, for example, and I hope he has a good supply of tourniquets this winter.

It is unfortunately a fact that the quality of performance on Canada's sports pages is too seldom on a par with that in Canada's sports arenas. The profession is still burdened with hacks who make tin-can gods out of cast-iron jerks. I believe there still is a tendency among sports reporters to slant news in favor of the home team, to defer to local sports management for the sake of maintaining cordial working relationships, and to accept publicity handouts in place of digging for their own stories.

Some Canadian papers, unlike the Toronto Star or The Globe and Mail, permit their reporters to accept free meals, rooms and board from the teams with which they travel.

Some good-behind-the-scenes stories are killed because of untoward pressures. I am thinking of a case in Vancouver, in 1963, where a feverish sports fan employed as a managing editor instructed sports writers to re-write stories more in favor of the home team, the Lions, who had lost the Grey Cup to Hamilton Tiger-Cats.

Most of the slanting comes from too-close association with the coach, who throws a bone to the reporters every few days so they will have something fresh to write about, then expects the reporters to give him a break when the going gets rough.

This leads to pre-fabricated journalism. So much hockey coverage in the National League, for example, seems to me to be coverage of what the Establishment says.

It is the same in sports as in every other facet of news: reporters and commentators are used as conduits for brain-washing the public; and those who balk at being so used may find themselves excluded from off-the-record briefings and subjected to savage whispering campaign attacks.

It has been my experience that the Establishment uses every weapon from flattery to slander, from special news favor to exclusion, to make the sports attaches a submissive herd. Dissent is treated as not quite respectable, which was exactly the formula followed by Adolf Hitler.

There isn't any doubt that sports writers are bombarded by lobbyists for promotions and often take the easy way out, i.e., they not only accept an exorbitant number of free drinks, they also accept too many publicity releases as pure gospel.

In my time, publishers in Canada's major cities have guarded against selling their sports pages to promoters by paying their sports writers enough money to be respectable. My experience in Vancouver and Toronto is that publishers in those cities reward a sports writer sufficiently to make him independent.

The committee should be aware, if it is not hip to sports in this country, that there are two branches of athletics: one is played for the game's sake, the other for the gate's sake.

Eric Nicol, the Vancouver humorist, contends that all the bump-and-grunt news should not simply be lumped into a section called Sports.

I would second Nicol's motion that the bump-and-grunt sections be split into a page or two of Sports, and a page or two of Athletic Entertainments.

The whole range of professional sports—football, hockey, boxing, horse racing—should be grouped under Athletic Entertainments. These are all investment projects in which the player's purpose is to win for his dear old alma Mammon.

"On this page," Nicol says, "the writers could fulfill their role as drama critics as for any other staged performance—hailing the starts, blaming the directors and feeding the fans' appetite for gobbets of gossip."

The Sports pages, on the other hand, would chronicle happenings in that dwindled field of games that are played for the fun of it: cricket, field hockey, college football, amateur curling, swimming.

Mr. Nicol: "The Sports pages, though nobody reads them but the players, would help tighten up the fast-failing link between sports and sportsmanship, and remind the young athlete that the most important grip he must master is the handshake after the game."

Hero worship of the professional athlete does not necessarily provide a youngster with the technique of the handshake.

"Reared in an atmosphere of the pros," Nicol says, "the child soaks up the idea of win-or-be-booded, of hate-'em-if-you-wanna-lick-'em, which will benefit his general character about as much as a semester in a bordello."

I would hope, gentlemen, that you recommend that all Canadian publishers upgrade their sports staffs on the advice of Summer Blossom of the late American Magazine:

"Any $90-a-week reporter can tell you accurately what happened at any event. It takes a good writer, worth $250 a week, to take you to the scene and make you SEE it and FEEL it happen."

I appreciate your indulgence, which has allowed me to stray quite a way from ghost writing. I think a defense for ghost writing can be made on Biblical grounds, by the way. Chaps like Matthew, Luke, Mark and Paul would qualify as Holy Ghost writers.

The Chairman: Now I assume you are prepared to submit yourself to questioning?

Mr. Beddoes: Jean Beliveau in the second row, I guess!

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: With that introduction, Mr. Orr, could I ask you the first question!

Mr. Beddoes: Please do.

The Chairman: I think it is Mr. Beddoes.

Mr. Fortier: Alderman Beddoes, I read your column this morning and I don't know whether you wrote it thinking about your appearance before this committee this afternoon but there is one sentence I would like to read and ask you for your comments. I think it follows naturally from your presentation. You said: "The only point made here is that the integrity of games depends on performers levelling." Do you remember writing that or was this ghost written for you by Mr. Orr?

Mr. Beddoes: Mr. Orr was busy preparing for St. Louis tomorrow night. I wrote that line.

Mr. Fortier: You say "The integrity of games depends on the performers levelling." Don't you feel a performer such as Bobby Orr, Jean Beliveau, Gordie Howe, any one of these athletes—should level throughout and not only level when they are on the ice playing hockey or in the stadium playing baseball? If he has been asked to write a column which will be read by amateurs and professionals alike from coast-to-coast, don't you think that he should level with those people and tell them "Look, this is the way my column will be written."

Mr. Beddoes: I would just say in respect to Mr. Orr—I think most ghost writers would say this, Mr. Fortier—in the role of performer and ghost, it is their word set to my kind of music. In the case of Orr, it is his words set the way I would do it. Presumably he cannot type or doesn't own a typewriter. I wouldn't know that.

Mr. Fortier: You say that Senators are naive. I will make a confession and I will tell you that lawyers are also very naive. I have asked around in Montreal and Toronto, where I was a couple of weeks ago and I would say that nine out of ten people did not know that the Bobby Orr column was actually written by you. Do you believe that or do you feel this is an exaggeration? Are only Senators naive or are nine out of ten Canadians naive in this respect.

Mr. Beddoes: I would hope that naivete was not a national characteristic. I would hope it was generally known that most of these "how to play" columns—Arnold Palmer's golf tips, for example, are not really written by Arnold Palmer. I would hope certainly that we are not that naive as readers. For instance, all those "Help the Needy" columns at Christmas time are not really done by Santa Claus.

Mr. Fortier: What has been your experience amongst your friends in Toronto? Would you say that all of them without any exception knew that Bobby Orr and others did not write their column?

Mr. Beddoes: I can't recall, Mr. Fortier, that it ever came up in conversation. I don't have friends socially as such in my profession for reasons that are personal. No, I must say I have never talked about this much with anybody except Mr. Orr's agent who employed me to do the column.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent did you, or people on your behalf, or to be more explicit, Bobby Orr or people on behalf of Bobby Orr Enterprises, publicize the fact that Bobby Orr did not put pen to paper every day?

Mr. Beddoes: I would say it was probably not published at all.

Mr. Fortier: You say this is good journalism?

Mr. Beddoes: No. In the case of the Globe and Mail—and I suppose I represent at least one section of it—we look on these things as something we would not publish. We don't, in the Globe and Mail, publish "how to play" columns, columns by coaches during the Grey Cup time—Bobby Orr columns.

The Chairman: Are all the people at the Globe and Mail real people?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes, I believe all the people at the Globe and Mail are real people and not custard people.

The Chairman: How about Elizabeth Thompson?

Mr. Beddoes: I think that is the pseudonym for the lady who writes the Elizabeth Thompson column.

The Chairman: So there is no Elizabeth Thompson at the Globe and Mail.

Mr. Beddoes: No; and no Dorothy Dix.

The Chairman: Is this correct?

Mr. Beddoes: Any more than there is a Susan Ford at the Toronto Telegram.

Mr. Fortier: A friend of yours at the Toronto Telegram (although you disclaim any friends) probably knowing I was going to refer to the Scott Young column last Saturday said: "I will not recommend the purchase of any ghost written material for any publication in which I have any influence."

Do you share that view now?

The Chairman: This is a quote from Scott Young in the Telegram on Saturday.

Mr. Beddoes: If I was a sports editor, which I am not, Mr. Fortier, and a salesman from a syndicate tried to sell me what I consider was not written by the athlete in fact I would not buy it. No.

Mr. Fortier: What publicity, if any, in your considered opinion should be given to the fact that a column published in any newspaper is in fact authored, you know, by Mr. X or Y or Mr. B?

Mr. Beddoes: Since I work for a paper that doesn't go that route I don't feel involved that way any more than I would think speeches that Mr. Trudeau delivers might have at the bottom "written by so-and-so".

Mr. Fortier: But is this a true comparison, Mr. Beddoes? You and I know and the public...

Mr. Beddoes: Mr. Fortier, it is all show business.

Mr. Fortier: I would dispute that and I will tell you why. There is in the PM's office, or any Minister's office, a desk at which sits a speech writer, you know that. He advertises himself as such. He is one of the Prime Minister's speech writers. We all knew that Ted Sorensen and Pierre Salinger and others were writing speeches for President Kennedy. We know that Tim Porteous and others are writing speeches for Pierre Trudeau. They don't conceal the fact before the public.

My point here is that in the column in question this was concealed from the public and you say the public was naive because it did not know it was in fact written by Dick Beddoes. I dispute the comparison. I don't think it is a valid one.

Mr. Beddoes: Look at it this way, Mr. Fortier; I think many biographies are done... in fact in the case of Mr. Young, whom you have just quoted, he has just finished over the past summer doing a sort of job for Mr. Imlach...

Mr. Fortier: Acknowledged as such?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes, acknowledged as such. I do believe the custom has gone on certainly before I was in this business. You would like me to have a defence for it. I don't have a defence in my case. With respect to Mr. Orr, he is a young man, as you know, and he asked me at training camp last Fall if I would do this and I said "Sure. We will talk about it. I will put it down for you." This is what it amounted to... his words done through me.

Mr. Fortier: But the public were being lead to believe they were reading Bobby Orr by Bobby Orr?

Mr. Beddoes: I think in that respect, Mr. Fortier, you should perhaps talk to the Toronto Star Syndicate who syndicated this particular item and other items of this nature.

The Chairman: Would anything be lost if above the column it stated "By Bobby Orr" and then in small letters "as told to Dick Beddoes"? That is sometimes done.

Mr. Beddoes: I would hope, Senator Davey, in cases like that the column might be much more saleable.

The Chairman: What do you mean?

Mr. Beddoes: Then the public, which Mr. Fortier is concerned about, would know in fact a professional had whipped this thing into shape.

The Chairman: You think that would be a plus?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: That is done sometimes?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes. I did a book in 1965 with the coach of the Vancouver Lions, David A. Skrien called "Count Down to Grey Cup" then "David Skrien as told to Dick Beddoes".

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Scott in the same article last Saturday said: "When the Toronto Alderman and columnist Dick Beddoes wrote it, it was identifiably filled with Beddoes' type words and ideas." I think he means that as a compliment, as I read the two paragraphs.

Mr. Beddoes: I am suggesting that Mr. Young is not naive as some of the readers you think were.

Mr. Fortier: He goes on: "I don't know who is writing it now but it is some other ghost." You are not writing it now?

Mr. Beddoes: No.

Mr. Fortier: Would you care to tell the committee what came about?

Mr. Beddoes: Well, as I work for the Globe and Mail which happens to be a competing newspaper with the Toronto Star and it is in my contract that in fact I should not be writing for anyone else and if anything I write appears in some other publication and they take some umbrage at that and ask me to desist. I suppose there's a technical point here I was not working for the Toronto Star; I was working for Mr. Orr and his agent and then they sold it to a large syndicate; but I have desisted, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: On the advice of Counsel?

Mr. Beddoes: From the standpoint of self-preservation.

The Chairman: Do you know who the other ghost is?

Mr. Beddoes: No, I don't know. I have no idea. It may be Mr. Eagleson, but I must say in all honesty I don't know.

Mr. Fortier: Is it true that Punch Imlach writes his own column?

Mr. Beddoes: It is so badly written from a professional point of view, that I hope no professional writer is writing it, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: It is for certain that no one would claim to write it now. I think your comments in your brief dealing with the effectiveness or the appeal of the sports pages and the sports section on the readers of newspapers are very succinctly and eloquently put.

Have you tried at the Globe and Mail to do just that—to have a division of the sports section, for example, between the amateur and professional sports?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes. I believe with the sports editor, Mr. Vipond, that the amateurs and pros do get a fair split. I would say sometimes, as a reader, I think that we sometimes give the amateurs more of a play than I, as a sports editor, would like to see them get.

We are heavy on high school sports, for example, and I think that sometimes it is over-balanced in favour of the amateur. I say that as a reader, rather than someone who would be involved in the thing sociologically.

Mr. Fortier: Will this come about? A clear division of the sports section between amateur and professional?

Mr. Beddoes: I doubt that very much. I think in the news business, you should be probably putting together the news, publishing the news people want to read. I think there are very few people, outside of the high school athletes, or the kid's parents or family that really care what he did at today's basketball game. I think they are concerned about the Montreal Canadiens and Jean Béliveau, rather than what happened at the Montreal little leagues. It is just news people want to read more.

Mr. Fortier: The "establishment" whereof you speak in your brief—are the proprietors of the papers with which you are familiar, members of that "establishment?"

Mr. Beddoes: The papers I have worked for—for example, the Globe and Mail now and Mr Max Bell, a part of that newspaper, is big in horse racing and I suppose he would be considered part of the establishment. He is a director of the Jockey Club of Ontario.

Mr. Fortier: And at the Toronto Telegram, John Bassett?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes, John Bassett, whom I haven't worked for and am unlikely to, is very big, as you know, in the Toronto Maple Leafs and I think Chairman of the Board of Toronto Argonauts and has the Telegram, and is involved rather largely with CFTO. Your question?

The Chairman: I think the question he is asking you referred to the "establishment" on page six. The question is, specifically: who is that establishment?

Mr. Beddoes: My quarrel—and I have a quarrel—I think we are paid well enough today, Mr. Fortier, on papers like the Globe and Mail which are reasonably independent—and in the case of the Globe and Mail, I think quite independent—where we don't have to buy the sort of prefabricated journalism which the hacks you had here as a previous delegation are. We don't have to buy what they are selling. Even though I happen to work for a newspaper which does have Mr. Bell as a publisher, I don't accept personally any handouts from the Jockey Club flacking agency. I prefer to do my own leg work.

Mr. Fortier: What control, if any, is exercised by Mr. Vipond, the sports editor, in for example, the writing of your column?

Mr. Beddoes: As with any columnist, as Mr. Fisher could attest, we are governed within the broad limits of libel on the one hand, and bad taste on the other.

I have been with the Globe and Mail for almost six and a half years, and I have had two columns killed in that time.

Mr. Fortier: You have anticipated my question. Go on.

Mr. Beddoes: One was clearly thought to be actionable by our solicitors and the second one might have had some bad taste connotation. I didn't think so, but the editors did.

Mr. Fortier: As I read the bottom of page five, this statement: "There still is a tendency among sports reporters to slant news in favour of the home team"; I am tempted to ask you if bad taste would be slanting of news in favour of the visiting team?

Mr. Beddoes: It would be considered so by some hacks in the press box and Mr. Imlach, if he were running a particular team.

The Chairman: On page six you say: "It has been my experience that the Establishment uses every weapon from flattery to slander, from special news favor to exclusion, to make the sports attaches a submissive herd."

Is it fair to ask you for some specific examples of that?

Mr. Beddoes: I think Mr. Imlach, with whom I suppose I have some running feud, it was my impression when he was the Maple Leaf Mahatma, that he always liked it if he had a sports writer under his thumb—and I think he did have some—who would horse-whip his hockey players if he couldn't get at them. You don't smear people with money any more, I don't think. You do it in a more insidious way. If you do the coach a favour, he will give you a news story when you require one, tip you off to something that is happening. That is what I consider a news favour. I consider that a form of payoff.

Mr. Fortier: Is your experience limited to the Toronto scene here, or are you speaking for other similar instances in other large cities in Canada?

Mr. Beddoes: I have worked in Vancouver, Mr. Fortier, and in my time there, the only large sport professionally was the Vancouver Lions football team. I was there in their inception in 1954 and on towards 1962 and 1963. They were not as sophisticated, I suppose, as some Toronto and Montreal people, who have run major sports for a long time, where the payoff was not part in money what the Vancouver people did. I think it has happened in Montreal and I think Toronto. I don't think it is happening now. I don't think a promoter now comes up and has a satchel full of money that he puts beside the sports writer's door, or inside his briefcase or something. I don't think that happens any more. I think the payoff happens other ways.

The Chairman: It doesn't happen anywhere now?

Mr. Beddoes: I am not familiar with that, Keith. I would say probably it does happen. I think they will get to you whatever way they can.

Mr. Fortier: He feeds them the scoop on occasion?

Mr. Beddoes: Quite often. If this is his way of operating. My impression is, Mr. Fortier, and perhaps it is the case with politicians, they don't want some reporter trying to lift up the rocks to see what is crawling underneath.

Mr. Fortier: In the same category, you put the free meals and the room and board from the teams with whom the reporters travel?

Mr. Beddoes: Exactly. I think that is compromising whatever you consider your integrity to be. You are more likely to be susceptible to blandishments and more liable to lay off on criticism when you should be criticizing.

Mr. Fortier: Well, if you work for a large, wealthy paper, such as the Toronto Star or the Globe and Mail, I suppose the publisher could afford to pay your way, but you know, and I know, in the case of the smaller papers, it would be financially impossible for the publisher to pay the way of a reporter going out to Los Angeles three or four times a year, following, say, the Toronto Maple Leafs or the Montreal Canadiens around. Is there not a happy medium that could be reached here?

Mr. Beddoes: I hope not.

Mr. Fortier: You say this should be banned entirely, any reporter, any sports reporter, should not accept the travel on the team plane and should not accept meals from the team management.

Mr. Beddoes: Anybody that would be going to Los Angeles or New York or wherever, would probably be working for a large paper that could afford it. I have never worked for papers—with the exception of an Edmonton paper that has since folded—that could not afford to pay their own way.

Mr. Fortier: But you are making that distinction: newspapers being able to pay the reporter's way should do it?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes. And if we cannot afford to pay for it, maybe we should not go.

The Chairman: You say on page five: "Some Canadian papers, unlike the Toronto Star or the Globe and Mail permit their reporters to accept free meals, rooms and board from the teams with which they travel."

Is it accidental or on purpose that you omit reference to the Telegram?

Mr. Beddoes: I am not familiar with how the Telegram handles sports writers' accounts.

The Chairman: You are not suggesting by that omission that the Telegram necessarily allows reporters to accept free meals and so on?

Mr. Beddoes: If I am suggesting anything, I suppose it is that I don't know.

The Chairman: All right. I have a couple of questions...

Mr. Fortier: Could I have one more?

The Chairman: Yes, of course.

Mr. Fortier: It is on somewhat the same note. In the previous paragraph, we covered it briefly, you say there is a tendency among sports reports to slant news in favor of the home team." The verb "slant" has a pejorative connotation and you mean it in this way, do you not? Is it wrong for a reporter on a Montreal paper let us say, to speak glowingly of the Montreal Canadiens? Would this be wrong?

Mr. Beddoes: I would not speak glowingly of the Montreal Canadiens unless they deserved it and I think frequently when they don't deserve it, there is a tendency to give them all the best of it, and not to say they played badly.

Mr. Fortier: So this is what you mean by the verb "slanting"—the holding back of news or information.

Mr. Beddoes: You might not get "hello" from Toe Blake or Claude Ruel if you happened to knock his performance or his performers' performance.

Mr. Fortier: It is withholding of information or the drafting of articles slanted in a particular way?

Mr. Beddoes: Of saying it, Mr. Fortier, like it really isn't.

The Chairman: You make a point in the column you wrote for Mr. Bobbie Orr, which is quoted on page two:

"but I didn't need any translation through a ghost writer to forecast that Toronto Maple Leafs would finish last."

On page five you make reference to Mr. Pearson, and hope he has a good supply of tourniquets this winter. Where did you predict the Maple Leafs would finish?

Mr. Beddoes: I think I forecast them fifth. That was my only prediction this year.

The Chairman: I make the point because it is not true, you predicted last year that the Maple Leafs would finish second and fifth in two different publications. Is that not true?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes, that is true. It was not last year, it was several years ago and I am embarrassed.

The Chairman: Last December, you put your name forward for Alderman in the borough of Etobicoke in the west end of Toronto and you were elected. Would you care to make any comment on political journalism, albeit at the municipal level, but from your point of view, in the three or four months you have been on council?

Mr. Beddoes: I see as a regular thing, Toronto papers, and I think their political journalism is very good.

The Chairman: How about at the municipal level?

Mr. Beddoes: I don't see the Telegram at that level, that often. I do see the Globe and Mail and frequently, the Star and I think in both cases they do a good job to cover the municipal scene.

The Chairman: Do you think there is sufficient coverage of local Etobicoke borough politics?

Mr. Beddoes: I would make the exception of Etobicoke. The Toronto papers seem to think that the circulation area ends at the Humber River, and as you know, Etobicoke is west of the Humber River. I would like to see our borough covered better.

The Chairman: At the municipal election in Toronto, the Star and Telegram, and your newspaper, in their recommended list of candidates, recommended, in the City of Toronto, aldermen, but in the boroughs they didn't. They may have occasionally. I think your own newspaper recommended you as an alternative choice.

Mr. Beddoes: Yes, I didn't get top billing in the Globe and Mail.

The Chairman: You really have no comment to make on the level of political journalism?

Mr. Beddoes: I think this vis-à-vis sports journalism. My impression is, political journalism in this country, in the major newspapers—and I consider the three Toronto papers to be major—I think the level of journalism at the political level is higher than on the sports page. I think they write better and perhaps have more awareness that there is something else besides politics and certainly something else besides sports. I suppose my anger or peeve at the sports section is that we think it ends there. That you cannot live in the playpen forever. I think there is a more urbane approach, certainly, in the case of the good political columnist, vis-à-vis sports writers.

The Chairman: I have a transcript of the evidence before the committee when Mr. Douglas Fisher was a witness. He is in the room now. He very briefly, at the end of the hearing talked about sports writing. Some of the words you used, a moment or two ago, appeared in the comments he made. He said: "I would say that the level of sports journalism, particularly in the larger papers, is comparable to the level of political journalism. Neither one is consistently excellent but it is fair."

Mr. Beddoes: I would consider that a compliment to sports writers.

The Chairman: There is a question I was going to ask you, arising out of his testimony. I won't quote him directly. He expresses some concern about the fact so much interest in sports finds its origination, or its focus, if you like, in the United States. He was thinking, I think we talked about the interest in baseball, we talked about the interest in professional football. He says (and perhaps I should quote):

"There tends to be, of course, another aspect of which we haven't really met yet and that is that professional sport is concentrated in the United States..."

"So in American baseball, football and so to a natural degree—and I think a pretty good case could be made—it is one of the things that is pulling the interest of a lot of the people to the south..."

Is that a valid observation?

Mr. Beddoes: My impression is, we probably overbalance sports. I think it deserves its place, along with everything else I mentioned—industry, art, politics, all of it. I don't think it should be overplayed nor do I think it should be underplayed. I have been reading the testimony, and other than Mr. Fisher's, I thought there was very little reference made to the sports section. I think that was an oversight and I think Mr. Fisher's reference is the only one I read with reference to my particular line of work. I don't think we should overplay ourselves, and sometimes that happens.

The Chairman: Do you think sports writers take themselves too seriously?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes.

The Chairman: As a rule of thumb?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes, I think they forget there is something else going on besides who is going to win the Stanley Cup. Maybe they would not know where Biafra was, some of them.

Mr. Fortier: Mr. Beddoes, you worked at the Edmonton Bulletin and covered fires, school board meetings, invitational craps-shooting contests?

Mr. Beddoes: That is where you get invited for twenty-four dollars and seventy five cents to blow it on one roll of the dice.

Mr. Fortier: You then worked in the news room of the Vancouver Sun?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Before finally being transferred to the sports department, as you have said in this column, by the immensely popular demand of the city editor. So you have had some experience in other areas of journalism?

Mr. Beddoes: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: How would you compare the treatment afforded sports writers in a newspaper with the treatment afforded a reporter which is covering, let us say, the local scene? Are there degrees of treatment?

Mr. Beddoes: By whom? By editors or publishers?

Mr. Fortier: Let us first cover the coverage of the editor.

Mr. Beddoes: Yes. I think that I as a columnist, Mr. Fortier, am afforded the same degree of respect, or whatever, by the sports editor, as is Mr. George Bain as a political columnist, by the editor of the newspaper.

Mr. Fortier: You are not treated as second-class citizens?

Mr. Beddoes: Oh, no. I think the major papers, and the Toronto papers are all major papers, in my view, would treat their columnists, not as sacred cows, but we are probably underpaid but wonderfully overprivileged.

Mr. Fortier: What about the sports reporter compared with the reporter covering the local beat?

Mr. Beddoes: I think they could be considered very much as equals. I don't think the sports reporter, even though he is in the playpen, is looked upon by the editor with any less degree than the reporter who covers a fire.

Mr. Fortier: No discrimination?

Mr. Beddoes: No discrimination. For example, Mr. Fortier, just in the area of being paid, they are mostly members of the Newspaper Guild and if you are a five year or six year reporter in the newsroom, you get the same salary as a five year or six year sportswriter.

The Chairman: Do sportswriters seek to leave the playpen, as you call it?

Mr. Beddoes: This is one sportswriter who would finally like to, and Mr. Young, as Mr. Fortier has quoted, for some years was a general columnist at the Globe before he went to the Telegram as a sports editor and columnist again. I think you finally find out, a hockey game is a hockey game is a hockey game—this year, last year, next year. How often can you say it? Maybe that is the case in politics or anything else but I would now like to write something else.

Mr. Fortier: Would you like to go to financial affairs, where a buck is a buck is a buck?

Mr. Beddoes: Of course, of course, of course!

The Chairman: I think of Paul Gallico as a case in point.

Mr. Beddoes: Yes. He became a very strong and good novelist after he was a sportswriter on the New York Daily News thirty years ago.

Senator Quart: Maybe we should ask Mr. Beddoes if he would like to become public relations officer to publicize the Senate. I see it as a form of sport, after all. When you reporters have nothing else to write about, you take a slingshots at us.

I notice particularly—and I didn't want the meeting to close without asking your opinion about this. I notice on page one you mentioned that the Honourable Senators are "shy". I question that; "retiring gentlemen"—I would also question that from what I know about the gentlemen of the Senate—and "quite out of touch with reality in the monkish environment of the Upper House". It sounds like you are putting it into a monastery.

You don't mention a bit about what the female of the species are. In your opinion, if the others are shy and retiring is it because we are aggressive females and they are afraid of us or at one time we were quite bossy?

Senator Smith: You are not monks, anyhow.

Senator Quart: You catch more men with honey than vinegar. Don't think I would be bossy.

Mr. Beddoes: If Senator Quart will allow a half-pint to reply, I would like to say with reference to the Senate requiring a public relations officer, you have one in Senator Davey.

Senator Quart: He doesn't get extra pay for it.

Mr. Fortier: She wants a Conservative one.

Mr. Beddoes: You could always get Dief.

Senator Quart: I think we want a sportswriter.

Mr. Beddoes: I think this, Senator Quart, I think poking fun at the Senate may be a national pastime that is sort of harmless. I expect the backs of the Senate are strong enough to take the barbs thrust into it. My first page amounted to nothing more or less than a put-on.

Senator Quart: It gave me an opportunity for a question.

Mr. Beddoes: You would know, as a lady, whether the male senators are shy and diffident. I would not know that. I don't know many male senators, other than Senator Davey.

Senator Quart: He is not shy.

Mr. Beddoes: Very diffident, though.

Senator McElman: Turning to the matter of ethics, how would you regard, Mr. Beddoes, a newspaper editor who had his staff write letters under pseudonyms, to put in the Letters of the Editor column, let us say, to project a public debate on some issue he felt should be discussed. Is this an ethical procedure.

Mr. Beddoes: It is not ethical. I would consider it at least to be specious. I understand it has happened but I hope it is not happening on what I consider the major newspapers in this country.

The Chairman: Are you not worried about other newspapers, in this country? I don't see why you would say "major newspapers". Would you not be concerned with what is happening...

Mr. Beddoes: I perhaps have had blinders on with respect to other papers. I am concerned always with my competition and where I work and when you don't necessarily see that many papers. For example, I don't see the rather mediocre papers put out by Mr.

Irving in New Brunswick. If I saw them, I suppose I would have comment on them, at least on his sports section. Does that answer the question?

Senator McElman: Yes, I think it does.

The Chairman: Do you see any of the smaller city dailies on a regular basis?

Mr. Beddoes: No, I don't. I see the Vancouver papers when they publish regularly.

Mr. Heal, who was in the previous delegation, suggested something that I would take exception to and argue with. He suggested (and perhaps I am taking it out of context) that since the amalgamation in 1957, his impression was that they perhaps had not deteriorated. That is not my impression. I think the Province has become a shadow of what it once was, when it was an independent rival of the Sun.

Senator McElman: There is a lot of discussion of relevance with youthful generation. Do you believe that sportswriting today, in general terms, has relevance to the youth who are not motivated in sport.

Mr. Beddoes: I think, Senator, that people in sport, generally are the biggest squares I know. I think there's a lack of sociological sense in my kind of people, where, for example, only the very good publications, on the order of Sports Illustrated, in this field, have really come to grips in the United States with the race problem—black versus white. I think we do look on it as a Never Never Land. We don't come to grips with issues outside of who won and lost. I do believe we do lack some relevance.

Senator McElman: You place great emphasis on sportsmanship in your brief and I was wondering what your feeling was as to whether you are reaching through to actually promote sportsmanship rather than sport in the commercial sense.

Mr. Beddoes: No, I must say I am not. My approach is, I hope to show something about the human condition as it relates to sport, in reasonably good language. Nothing more than that.

I think I perhaps would have a greater social field if I was writing something else.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: When you joined the Globe and Mail in 1963, it was then independently owned. It has since become a member of a group, a chain. Have you noticed any changes in the sports desk particularly, and of the newspaper generally, since the changeover?

Mr. Beddoes: No. I must say, at my level, which is not the highest level of the paper, of course, that I have noticed nothing at all. The thing that I would be concerned about, I suppose, would be money. There has been no change in that. The money has gone up. Ahead of that, I think I would be concerned about being told what to say. On no occasion since F.P., Max Bell, Sifton, Brigadier Malone, took over the newspaper, have I been told to lay off, or not to say something.

In fact it has been the other way. Mr. Bell is a director of the Jockey Club and I was in some editorial snit at the Jockey Club Chairman, Mr. Taylor, a couple of years ago. I think there was some suggestion to Mr. Bell, "You tell that S.O.B. Beddoes to lay off". In fact he told me this. He said, "He is writing about the way I want him to write and if he is a hard hitter let him go that way." I have noticed no change at all, at my level.

Mr. Fortier: This increased concentration of ownership in the print media, do you see that as a potential danger to the freedom of the press?

Mr. Beddoes: I think a cartel of any kind is perhaps a danger to freedom, per se. I would not want to work in Toronto, or any city, where there was just one owner of three newspapers. I think you have a better product and are perhaps sharper yourself if there is a competing situation. This is what makes the Toronto situation a bit unique and also interesting to work in. I am aware that the two other papers are going to have something I might not have and that makes you sharp.

When you work in a situation like Vancouver, where the two papers are run by the Pacific Press, there is a tendency not to be as good a professional.

Mr. Fortier: Would you equate any cartel with the newspaper cartel—the same rules should apply?

Mr. Beddoes: A buck is a buck is a buck. I've never been in the business field but I think cartels generally are not in the public interest; are they?

Mr. Fortier: How about your column, is there any suggestion by F.P. that it should be published in any other member newspaper?

Mr. Beddoes: From time to time, Mr. Fortier, it is picked up and syndicated through our eight or nine papers. In that respect, the very popular column by Richard Needham, on page six, is regularly syndicated across the member papers.

The Chairman: Yours is on occasion?

Mr. Beddoes: On occasion.

The Chairman: Are you paid extra money when that happens?

Mr. Beddoes: No, I am not.

The Chairman: Shouldn't you be?

Mr. Beddoes: I would like to be, but I am not.

Mr. Fortier: Is that in your contract, that you will not be?

Mr. Beddoes: No; but it is not in that I will be either.

Mr. Fortier: You have to assent before the Winnipeg Free Press publishes your column, do you not?

Mr. Beddoes: If the Free Press requests it, it is sent by wire, and if they publish it certainly I don't get paid any extra money.

The Chairman: You don't even know about it?

Mr. Beddoes: I am told. The sports editor of that paper normally phones me or wires and says, "Will you cover me in this situation", and I do. However, I don't feel too strongly about not being paid. I am going to do it for the Globe and Mail in any case. I would like to be paid of any syndicated party would, but I am not paid for my columns used outside the Globe and Mail.

If I wrote a separate story for the Free Press or the Vancouver Sun, I would be paid, and have been paid when I have sat down and done fresh work for those publications.

Mr. Fortier: It is not in your contract with the Globe and Mail that if another F.P. picks it up, they must give you adequate compensation?

Mr. Beddoes: It is not.

Mr. Fortier: Conversely any member newspaper could use your column at random, at will?

Mr. Beddoes: That doesn't happen. Any time my column has been used by an F.P. member, it has been asked for by the sports editor of that member. It has happened with the Vancouver Sun, infrequently, and the Free Press more often than that.

The Chairman: If there are no other questions, perhaps I could close this particular hearing by quoting from a document, at least in part, which you distributed in Etobicoke when you ran for alderman:

"Why does a guy want anything more than what he has? A job he wants on a newspaper he respects, in a city he admires. It is the best job in Canada. After all, nothing to do except spell one thousand words, five or six days a week, in the toy department. Pretty soft, advising other people how to run their business. Simple stuff, helping Leo Cahill coach the Argonauts, or formerly assisting Punch Imlach, who reached puberty but forgot to touch second base. Why then seek the onerous task of public office? The candidate discovered that you cannot stay in the playpen forever."

Speaking on behalf of myself and the committee, we are delighted that you left the playpen for these few hours this afternoon.

Mr. Beddoes: Sort of an extension of the playpen.

The Chairman: We appreciate your coming and we would be delighted if you extend our good wishes to Mr. Orr if you and he are still speaking.

Mr. Beddoes: We have signed 30, as we say in journalism, to that arrangement.

The Chairman: May I say to the Senators, the next meeting of the Committee is tomorrow morning at ten o'clock, in this room, and the lineup tomorrow is as follows:

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 4, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the meeting to order.

Today we turn our attention for the full morning, and for the first brief this afternoon, to a discussion of the Church Press. After lunch, we will be receiving a brief from the United Church Observer and later this morning we will be receiving a brief from the Presbyterian Record.

This morning the first brief we are going to receive is from the Canadian Church Press.

I should perhaps indicate that in the interest of the ecumenical movement we did ask the Canadian Register and that particular paper asked if they might bow out of an appearance because at the time we requested the brief they were relocating their head office. Of course we acceded to that request. I thought perhaps I should indicate it had been our intention to have them as well.

The first brief is that of the Canadian Church Press and sitting on my immediate right is the President, Mr. Hugh McCullum, who is also the Editor of the Canadian Churchman.

On my immediate left is Mr. Douglas Roche, who is the Vice-President, and is the Editor of the Western Catholic Reporter. He is not appearing in that capacity.

On his immediate left is Mr. Ernest Homewood, who is the General Manager of the United Church Observer and who again is not appearing as a representative of the United Church Observer but rather as the director of the Canadian Church Press.

Mr. McCullum, in compliance with the request and the guidelines we sent to you, you were kind enough to submit some weeks in advance a brief which has been circulated to the Senators. I am sure most have read it with some considerable interest. The format we follow is to now make available to you some time for an oral statement in which you can expand your brief or amplify it or say anything else on your mind. Following that we will turn to the Senators for questioning and question you on the contents of your brief and oral statements and perhaps some other matters as well.

If you wish to pass some questions to Mr. Roche or Mr. Homewood by all means do so. Thank you for coming.

Mr. Hugh McCullum, President, The Canadian Church Press: Thank you very much, ladies and gentlemen, for this opportunity to present to you the brief which you have had in advance.

Before outlining one or two points in the brief which we think are important, I would like to stress that the three of us here present are all laymen in the religious sense of the word. We were all employed at one time or other in the secular media and we are representing the publication association and not in any way should we be considered to be theologians or representatives of any particular religious denomination.

You will note our brief is divided into three parts. The first section Why A Church Press? The second section—Relationship of the Church Press to the General Media. And finally—Specific Problems of the Church Press.

We have tried to stress throughout our brief that we see our role in the mass media as an educational one. To quote briefly from the brief:

"We see our role as educational, with the hope of humanizing our society rather than acting as the 'house organ' for denominationalism."

The Canadian Press is made up of an association of 16 magazines and newspapers having a combined circulation of 888,000 and published in Canada by Protestant, Anglican, and Roman Catholic churches.

In trying to maintain our educational role it has been difficult at times because of the diverse opinions of the editors. It is precisely for this reason the church editors are today finding the air of confusion that exists in the churches. This confusion is the price we are paying for too long a period of self-righteous certainty.

Modern man desires belief but not in a religious spirituality of another age. In keeping with this new mood we do not let theological differences obstruct the unity that already exists among us in our effort to increase the church's relevance in social and moral issues.

Like all mass media we have our problems and since we depend to a large extent for revenue on advertising, we find that there is a certain area of discrimination or perhaps an area where we are not taken in the same context as the secular press.

We have been beset, like all areas of the commercial press, with increased cost in production and editorial expense. However in recent years the largest single percentage increase has been in postal rates. This increase, amounting in some cases to as much as 500 per cent, has forced some of our publications out of business and others into a reduced frequency, smaller size, or fewer pages or less satisfactory quality. We feel that the postage increases were introduced and implemented without sufficient warning.

We believe that the solution might lie there in subsidizing the educational media. We do not want under any circumstances to have a place of particular privilege in our society because we are religious publications but we do feel that as the Crown-owned CBC receives a subsidy from the government that in particular that branch of the media that could be considered educational, must be subsidized. The best way is through postal rates granted to second-class mailers.

In some respects almost all things valuable to society end up being subsidized in some way. We therefore call upon the government to re-open the entire postal situation.

I think that is about all I want to say at the beginning. We would be free for questions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

I think the questioning this morning will begin with Senator Petten.

Senator Petten: Mr. McCullum, in what specific ways does the Canadian Church Press as an association assist its members? Does it, for example, promote religious publications as advertising media? Is there any system in helping the exchange of articles from publication to publication? I realize that is two questions.

Mr. McCullum: Our advertising campaigns are conducted separately by each publication. There is, I suppose you might say, some competition between advertising representatives for space. The Association itself does not conduct any advertising campaign.

There is a free exchange of articles among certain members of the Association, particularly between the United Church Observer, The Canadian Churchman, and the Western Catholic Reporter, which happen to be here represented.

We also supply yearly technical and journalistic workshops and seminars. We have presented a brief to the Postmaster General before the increase in the postal rates.

We supply through the North American Press Association, with which we are affiliated, technical advice to our member publications.

Senator Petten: Then there is a free exchange and co-operation between all the members of your association?

Mr. McCullum: Yes.

The Chairman: What kind of articles would be exchanged? Every kind?

Mr. McCullum: No, mainly the feature type of article. No interchange of straight hard news stories.

The Chairman: Features such as...

Mr. McCullum: For example...

The Chairman: We would be interested in an example, I think.

Mr. McCullum: I personally was in Biafra just before Christmas and I think four or five of the member publications used some or all of my material.

Dr. Forrest, of the United Church Observer, covered the Middle East about a year ago and there was a fair amount of exchange among members for his material.

Senator Smith: Just on that particular point: I read a very interesting article by you in the United Church Observer. Did that particular article appear in other church press?

Mr. McCullum: No, not that specific article. That was an article at the request of the United Church Observer by myself. It was written at no charge. It was not a freelance by me.

Senator Smith: I was not thinking of that end of it at all. I was wondering...

Mr. McCullum: It was written for them although it was available for other publications if they wanted it.

The Chairman: Mr. Roche has just handed me the January 18th issue of the Western Catholic Reporter. I gather that is a variation on the same article. I am sure you recognize the chap there.

Senator Smith: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Petten, were you going to pursue the advertising question or may I ask a supplementary?

Why don't you jointly seek advertising?

Mr. McCullum: Partially because some of our papers are regional and therefore it is more difficult to obtain national advertising.

We did have an association of three or four members of the Church Press who jointly sought advertising and it was unsuccessful due to the varying formats of the papers. Some were tabloid, some magazine, some broadsheet size and in some the frequency of publication differs.

The Chairman: Surely, Mr. McCullum, it would be useful to the Church Press to have someone going into the advertising agencies and extolling the virtues of the Church Press as a medium?

Mr. McCullum: I think our representatives do this. Could I ask Mr. Homewood to comment?

The Chairman: If I may say, Mr. Homewood, this afternoon we will want to discuss your own publication's membership in the Magazine Advertising Bureau but has any consideration ever been given to taking the entire Church Press into the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Homewood: Not as an Association. Membership now in the Magazine Advertising Bureau is on an individual publication basis. The publication has to meet the membership requirements of the M.A.B., the principal one of which is ABC audit. This is one of the reasons we haven't tried to sell co-operatively.

We have promoted co-operatively but one of the reasons we haven't tried to sell co-operatively is because of the varying standards of circulation and circulation audit in the Church Press.

I think there is only one publication that is audited in the Church Press, a number that are CPAB and many more that are strictly sworn publishers statements. This is one of the difficulties of selling co-operatively—the standards in which the advertising agencies and advertising people buy the quality of your circulation.

The Chairman: Senator Petten.

Senator Petten: Mr. McCullum, you say in paragraph 8 that the need for religious press is increasing rather than decreasing yet church membership and church attendance seem to be diminishing in recent years. Does this mean that your readership is declining and with that your influence, or are you turning to other forms of journalism such as television to get your message across?

Mr. McCullum: This would mean I would have to speak on behalf of the denominations which I can't.

In the case of the Association, we haven't had an audited statement recently but I would guess that the circulation is declining due to declining church membership.

Our own publication is holding its own and I believe this applies to several of the others, although in the United States—and I am sure the trend will sooner or later come here—there has been a serious decline in the circulation of the Church Press.

Senator Smith: How serious over there, do you know?

Mr. McCullum: I know one publication lost as much as 400,000 out of about 1,200,000.

The Chairman: Senator Petten.

Senator Petten: In paragraph 22 you say the secular press is guilty of bad taste, sensationalism, and the glamourizing of smut and that the standards of reporting and entertainment are at the lowest level. Would you like to give us some examples of this? Is this true of all the press or just certain segments? Could we have some examples?

Mr. McCullum: We feel that there is a use of sensation or a use of material in bad taste for purely commercial gain. The main reason is for selling papers rather than for edifying or instructing the public or informing the public or teaching the public. I think this has been admitted at times that sensationalism is a valid part of journalism.

I think we would disagree with the statement that sensationalism for its own sake is a valid part. There may be sensational material which is sensational in its own right, but to sensationalize a specific thing...

The Chairman: Mr. McCullum, when one looks through your biography—and I hope all the Senators have because it is most impressive—you have been sports reporter at the Whig Standard, political reporter at the Leader Post, President of the Press Gallery in Saskatchewan, City Editor in Saskatchewan, national news editor of the Toronto Telegram. You have had quite a broad background.

I think, therefore, we would be interested in some specific examples. You make a very sweeping attack on the secular press. I think the answer you have given to Senator Petten I appreciate and understand, but I think it would be useful if you could tell us some specific example of what you mean.

Mr. McCullum: There is one example in the area of a religious publication when the newspapers decline to cover meetings. There is one specific meeting that Mr. Roche can enlarge on better than I. It was one specific meeting where the priests—I believe it was held in Ottawa—the Roman Catholic priests were to talk about many of their various problems.

No coverage of the meeting was given and the reason given was that the issue of celibacy was not to be discussed and therefore it was not of interest to the public.

Mr. Roche may be able to give more specific details.

The Chairman: Mr. Roche?

Mr. Roche: Mr. Chairman, both Senator Petten's question, I think, are somewhat linked. They have to do, sir, with changing positions of the churches in society, the transition of religion.

We are moving, I think, pretty well all churches—not only the Roman Catholic Church, because it has had the spectacular publicity of the Second Vatican Council—but all the churches generally, are moving from one historical era to another. There is much more community-centred approach to religion and much more social orientation.

There are two great movements taking place. The first is the movement of the Christian community and the second is the outward commitment and adherent to the social gospel, the application of it in such specific areas as housing, drugs, pollution, Biafra, Indians and so on.

We feel generally that the general press, although it is alive to some of these changes, are not really fully reporting them in depth to their readers. Rather they tend to focus on the more sensational—and I don't use that in the pejorative sense—the more bizarre and strange aspects of the changing era of religion.

Whereas we feel the public needs to know and have much more background in why religion is changing, why the whole Christian picture is changing. That is precisely why we are in trouble in many ways because many of our readers—and I speak here across the board—the United, Anglican and Roman Catholic—many readers are comfortable with the old style of religion in which the Church was viewed as a place to go for sort of refuge from the on-going concerns of the world; a sort of religious "hot-line" between the individual and God to ensure their own personal salvation.

Great movement now is horizontal in dimension and recognition that in order to follow the second commandment "To love our neighbour" in McLuhan's world of the global village, our neighbour is everywhere. We have to have application of real involvement as Christians in the changing picture of our society. That is what the advance wing in all of our churches are trying to do today.

We meet resistance in our own churches from people who don't want the church to become socially much less politically involved, you know. They say the churches should be apart from this, keep it apart from the changing world.

We have this resistance in our own churches. The advance wing also wants the church to become much more decentralized and de-institutionalized so they can move much faster. There is polarization within all our churches.

In face of this polarization, in face of this need for education and the tremendous need of involvement Christianity in our society, we feel generally the general press is not really interested or concerned with explaining the full dimension of the changing picture of Christianity in our society and are focusing enlarged question of the ministry was examples.

In answer to the Chairman's request for a specific example we will give one. I think it is rather important. Celibacy in the Roman Catholic Church is an important issue today. There is no doubt about that, and I would not at all deny it.

But when you regard the priesthood, the changing character of the priesthood and ministry and celibacy you have to recognize there are far many more things going on in the priesthood and the updating of the ministry.

So when the report came from an editor of a national communications medium in this country to the Reporter, saying that this communication media was not interested in covering the meeting of Central Canada's Priests held here in Ottawa two or three weeks ago because the issue of celibacy was not going to be focused on at this meeting but rather the enlarged question of the ministry was going to be, we feel, sir, this is irresponsible journalism.

The Chairman: May I ask a supplementary question?

Section 22 on page 7, in that section there you are referring to reporting of religion in the commercial press. I took it as a broader statement and you were talking not simply about the kind of example you have given but rather in a more general sense. Am I incorrect?

Mr. McCullum: I think you are correct.

The Chairman: The reporting of religion.

Senator Smith: What has that got to do with the glamourizing of smut to which you have referred?

Mr. McCullum: This has reference to certain areas of bad taste. For example, I think the picture this morning in the Globe and Mail of the censored material in Weekend Magazine is a kind of glamourization of a very serious matter. I don't disapprove of censorship of Weekend Magazine but I think the way it was presented is glamourization.

The Chairman: I am a little bit confused. I don't know if the Senators are or not.

Mr. Roche spoke at some length and gave us an example of the celibacy issue...

Mr. Roche: I have more.

The Chairman: You have now given us an example which has really nothing to do with the reporting of religion. The example you mentioned in response to Senator Smith is an example of the general press behaving, in your opinion at least, badly; in a way which had nothing to do with reporting of religion.

The point I am trying to make clear is: is your indictment in Section 22 a general indictment or an indictment only of the reporting of religious news?

Mr. McCullum: I think specifically of religious news and general comments but not as wide.

The Chairman: Not as sweeping as it appears.

Mr. Roche: I think I could supplement Mr. McCullum's answer because I think we are agreed on this because we discussed it previously.

In answer to Senator Smith's question there are two examples.

Sir, you used the word "smut"...

Senator Smith: I was using the word as it appeared in this paragraph.

Mr. Roche: Really more to the point, two examples would be how certain communications in this country reported the drug problem and what we might call the hippy problem or the generation gap in the beginning stages.

I am speaking of two or three years ago when these were starting to come on the national scene in big issues. They are specific examples of what I would term glamourization.

I can give you one example. There was a wedding took place of what we might call the "Black Jacket crowd" on motor cycle and drugs and all this. They presented this in pictures, a rather enticing way to the juvenile mind—this is the thing to do, this is the kind of modern way to be hip.

I took offense at this kind of reporting.

Now today I think communications generally realize that drugs are a tremendously explosive problem in our society and are treated in a much more responsible way, but in the beginning stages they were given a sensationalized treatment.

I think to the extent of our criticism of the general reporting of religion, which we hold to, we add a glamorization of serious social issues.

The Chairman: I think you mentioned you had a second example.

Mr. Roche: Drugs and youth.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: I have a supplementary question. Could we move this reference to sensationalism over to something that has been current recently, that is Biafra itself.

There has been some divergence of opinion as to what happened and what was happening and perhaps what is happening in Biafra. One, the official position that although there was rape it was not of a degree that is any different from any ending of a war.

Although there was hunger there was not mass dying-off by starvation; and so on through the whole bit of all the things that are associated with war.

On the other hand the media rather countered this with reports of very extensive occurrences of these things and there was a great gap in between the two which left the public in a position of doubting the credibility of both sides.

You were in Biafra, sir?

Mr. McCullum: Yes.

Senator McElman: What in your view is the basis for the great divergence in reporting of the situation? Was there sensationalism involved?

Mr. McCullum: I was not in Biafra at the end of the war. I was there three weeks before the war ended. I can't say what degree of rape there was but it strikes me—and here I would think I would have to come to the defence of the press very much—it strikes me because the last report of the International observer, the military observer team is still, to the best of my knowledge, not available to the press and that most of the people who visited Biafra in the dying days of its existence and in the weeks immediately after the war ended, it seems to me they spent very little time there, and only on the main roads.

The reporters went in and they were only there a few days before they were kicked out again. It was very difficult for any newsmen to get close to the heart of what was left of Biafra.

I don't think the media sensationalized this at all. You see two or three thousand dying children all over the place and it is pretty hard to do anything more than show pictures. That is sensationalism, the actual fact is sensational. It is not an overplaying of anything in my opinion.

I think the reason that there is a credibility gap, or at least a gap between what was said in the news media—and there is precious little being said now—in the dying days of Biafra, the first few weeks after the war was over, is because of the extreme difficulty that the media had getting near any part of what was left of Biafra.

Am I answering the question?

Senator McElman: I don't quite follow your approach. You say the official people who were in were in certain areas only, but the media were there only a couple of days and they didn't get anywhere?

Mr. McCullum: The media got a great deal of information before they were kicked out for filing reports detrimental to the Federal Nigerian line. They said there was extensive rape and looting and there were mass cases of starvation.

The military observer claim in its first report there was no greater amount of rape or looting than could be normally expected at the end of a war... Although how many rapes count for extensive rapes is pretty difficult to answer.

After that I am sure you will recall the military observer team presented a second report which has never yet been released either here in Ottawa or in Lagos and the understanding is this is a much more condemning type of report than the first one, and much more in line with what the reporters saw and wrote about in the brief time they were allowed to visit the central part of Biafra. They could write all kinds of reports from Lagos but that is two or three hundred miles away.

Senator McElman: You say there is an understanding about the second report. What is the basis of that understanding?

Mr. McCullum: I would gather the hassel that existed within the observer team between the Polish member and the Canadian and British members. They admitted it was a more severe report. What that constitutes you can only speculate.

Senator McElman: There have been some reports, quite aside from the observer team, I believe the International Red Cross and others.

One general—I don't recall at the moment the name, a Canadian...

Mr. McCullum: General Drewry?

Senator McElman: No. It supported the report of the official observer team, the initial report.

Mr. McCullum: I am afraid I don't know what you are talking about, Senator. The only Canadian general I knew of was General Drewry who was on the observer team.

U Thant sent a Pakistani brigadier into Biafra who came back and refuted a good deal of what U Thant had said, although U Thant never had gone to Biafra. He only went to Lagos.

Senator McElman: You feel there was no untoward emphasis toward sensationalism in the reporting of this?

Mr. McCullum: No, I don't think so. I think the situation I saw in Biafra three weeks before the war was over was one of the most horrifying things I could imagine and I am quite sure the reaction of any human being, be he reporter or no, would be one of horror at what he saw, and I don't think that is sensationalism for the sake of sensationalism. It was a sensational thing when two thousand kids die in one day.

Senator Sparrow: Where there conflicting reports that came back? They were not all one line. Reports were made in the House of Commons by members who were there that conflicted with some of the news reports. Is that what you are referring to, Senator McElman?

Mr. McCullum: Certainly there was a vast conflict between the information available in Lagos and the information available in Owerri, the last capital of Biafra. They were issued by two conflicting information ministries but there is a pretty severe clamp on free access to news sources in Lagos and in what was Biafra by the Federal Nigerian Government.

I think you have a conflict of what their information ministries report, which are picked up to some extent by the wire services, and what people see if they get a chance to get in there.

I think you will see from reading the papers in the last two or three weeks the sources of news in what was Biafra have pretty well dried up. The priests and the relief workers are out and there are no other sources of information. People are not getting in there.

The relief workers who are in there are not going to jeopardize their position by saying too much.

The Chairman: How accurate was the reporting on the joint church aid programmes, Canaire Relief and so on?

Mr. McCullum: As far as I know it was accurate.

The Chairman: Good full reporting?

Mr. McCullum: Yes.

The Chairman: The Ottawa Citizen—like Senator McElman I don't have it here—the Ottawa Citizen carried a front page story at one point saying that the television network film people had thrown pennies into the air and watched the children scramble for them and then photographed the scramble and used that. Was that done?

Mr. McCullum: I was not there. I read about it.

The Chairman: You couldn't comment on that?

Mr. McCullum: No.

The Chairman: Go ahead, Senator Petten.

Senator Petten: In paragraph 29 you say:

"As part of the mass media we, the church press, have a responsibility to regulate ourselves, without 'managing' news. It often seems that the secular media are unwilling to do this."

Would you like to expand on this.

Mr. McCullum: We feel that there has to be some standards, ethical standards and standards of reporting and writing and editing set up, and it has to be more than just self-regulatory by the individual publications.

We feel that this is something we have to do and we feel it is something that the so-called general media should be willing to do.

Senator Petten: That leads me to the next question. In paragraph 30 you advocate the establishment of a press council with authority and power. What kind of press council did you have in mind? Would you exercise a censorship? Would it have the powers of court?

Mr. McCullum: Hopefully the media would set up its own press council with some teeth in it. If they are unwilling to do so or are unwilling to set standards—I don't think I would use the word "censorship"—unwilling to set standards of reporting and writing and editing and so on, then I think that perhaps there would have to be a government regulations such as are imposed on the so-called electronic media by regulatory commissions.

I would hope the so-called linear media would be willing to do this voluntarily on their own.

Senator Petten: You would support the same thing as they did in Britain?

Mr. McCullum: Yes. I think it needs a little more teeth in it than the one in Britain has. Hopefully self-imposed teeth.

Senator McElman: What type of teeth?

Mr. McCullum: I would hope there could be perhaps through the use of the wire services some sanctions either by a method of fines or publicity or perhaps refusing to allow a specific publication to use a wire service. That would apply mainly in the case of daily newspapers.

This would be the sort of thing—sanctions of some kind against that particular publication.

In Britain the only thing they can do is publicize the fact that such-and-such a paper has violated the code and they can sort of thumb their noses at the press council after that. I think it has to have more than just the opinion of the particular press council that a violation has occurred.

Senator Smith: Mr. McCullum, you seem to suggest from the words you use that you would like to see a national press council rather than a provincial or regional one?

Mr. McCullum: I think probably there would have to be two kinds. Perhaps national to set up broad standards but regional press councils to specifically deal with matters in an area.

I don't know how many there would need to be. I haven't thought about it that extensively. I think there would have to be regional councils as well as national.

Senator Smith: Reaching back into some of your interesting years in another form of press, particularly when you were an editor on one of the Toronto papers, can you recall some rather important happenings which you would like to have had a press council bring its weight to bear to prevent those from happening again?

Mr. McCullum: We have dealt with that a little bit in another area of the brief. I think in particular of where people's reputations or family backgrounds can be delved into to such an extent that innocent people such as children or wives or husbands, can have their reputations ruined for life perhaps. And if per chance the article happens to be wrong, still within the legal grounds, we put a small correction very often on a back page which really doesn't do anything to redress the harm that may have occurred to individuals.

The Chairman: Mr. Roche, I think, wants to add something.

Mr. Roche: May I give an example? In a province of this country an official of the government who holds a high place in the provincial government was arrested and charged with a sexual offence, quite a serious kind of sexual offence.

His name was published in the paper and the radio stations and so on. Please don't think I am accusing them of sensationalism; not at all. The name of the man was published and the crime and so on, long before he was brought to trial. There were several postponements and every time there was a postponement there was a resume of the case came up again.

Now I would question the integrity of that kind of journalism in which this man's reputation in the community in which he lives is now irredeemably lost. That is a bad thing.

Senator Smith: What happened to the case in the end?

Mr. Roche: It is still coming up. It has not come to resolution yet. Maybe he will be proven guilty, but if he is proven innocent his reputation and job will be in great jeopardy in the community.

I am sure it is a vague example but believe me it is in Western Canada and it is a hot case.

Senator Smith: I take it you would appreciate the recent change, which I am sure Senator MacDonald as a lawyer knows more about than I do, but which I believe now makes it illegal to publish anything until a preliminary trial is over.

Mr. Roche: Yes, indeed. The details of this case have not come before the judge and therefore not yet reported. In fact, the judge may elect to hold the trial with a ruling that it cannot be reported. I don't know yet.

Nonetheless, what I am addressing myself to is the publication of this man's name in such a way that his reputation in the community is gone.

The Chairman: Senator MacDonald, would the Criminal Code Amendments prevent this from happening?

Senator Macdonald: I am not sure about publishing the man's name. The preliminary hearing is not published.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: May I ask a supplementary? Do you think it any worse for a man who is a politician or a leading businessman in a community and that he should receive the kind of treatment we all think he should receive. Are we not going to care so much about the fellow who is a carpenter's helper with no particular community reputation, good or bad?

Mr. Roche: No, I think the law is equal.

Senator Smith: Of course. I wanted you to say that. I knew you were going to.

Senator McElman: I would like to have comments from Mr. Roche and Mr. McCullum on this reference to a press council with power.

We have had a few from Mr. McCullum. Could we have a few from Mr. Roche of what type of power should be given, what teeth?

Mr. Roche: Mr. Chairman, I think the only thing to do is give you an honest response.

As in the churches we are not all agreed theologically, we are not in total agreement in the church press.

Mr. McCullum holds a view that I respect. I am of the opinion that the press council given too much power could also be injurious and could lead to censorship which I personally would oppose.

Nonetheless I feel we have to have more responsibility enforced on the media if they will not enforce it themselves.

I am really more in favour of stronger laws preventing the kind of example I have given—the publication of a name—rather than tossing it over to a press council to deal with after the fact. Here I am dealing in the area of character reputation in a community.

The Chairman: Mr. Homewood?

Mr. Homewood: I think I would agree with Mr. Roche on this.

Personally I am not familiar enough with press councils and I don't know that there has been a great deal of study or many recommendations regarding press councils, that I am familiar with, for Canada.

My concern would be with persons, with individuals, and with character damage, character assassination and prevention of this by law.

I am not personally convinced, I am not familiar enough with press councils to know that is the answer. It is one of those possible alternatives that requires some study, I think.

I am not convinced at this point it is the answer. It is one of the answers to the problem.

Senator McElman: Could I ask a supplementary?

We have had much testimony and many definitions concerning freedom of the press by witnesses before the Committee. One of those that is often mentioned in freedom of the press is freedom of access to news sources.

Now you are suggesting perhaps cutting someone off from the wire services. Would that not be a very distinct infringement of such freedom rather than simply a punitive action against one who didn't meet the code established?

Mr. McCullum: It would be an extreme penalty. I think in any press council with any teeth in it there would have to be a schedule of penalties, if you like. I think this is one area that could be considered in extreme cases.

It is not uncommon, if I understand the by-laws of the Canadian Press, to fine members. It is not uncommon and within the rights of fine members or withdraw their membership on certain grounds. I am afraid I cannot specify the grounds but I know this is within their power—that is limiting their access.

I don't think that is an impossibility. It may be extreme but it is not an impossibility.

Senator McElman: Would you not feel this would in fact be a rather strong infringement upon the freedom of the press?

Mr. McCullum: Yes; but if the violation was extreme enough I think it would be warranted.

Senator McElman: There is one other aspect of this. We have had testimony from some that if a press council were established, that only those who agreed to participate would be involved in any disciplinary or other action by such a press council.

It seems to me your comment goes a little further than that. You say that if they will not regulate themselves they should be regulated, presumably by the state, in some fashion.

Would you recommend compulsion that all must belong and be subject to the press council?

Mr. McCullum: Yes. It is just as the electronic media are governed by certain regulations by the CRTC. If the press will not govern itself or regulate itself, all of it, then I think it would have to be under some formal government supervision.

I suppose all my friends in the newspaper business will cease to speak to me now. I think it has to be done, and I would hope that they would be responsible enough to do it themselves.

Senator McElman: You would not think it would be workable if it were only something by choice as to whether they would belong or be governed by a press council sanction?

Mr. McCullum: No; not any more than a doctor could practice without being a member of the Canadian Medical Association.

The Chairman: Senator MacDonald?

Senator MacDonald: On page 8, item 25, you mention that since the church press is not primarily committed to commercial gains, it has been able to take unpopular stands.

Are you implying that the lay press is only interested in commercial gains and because they are only interested in commercial gains, their news coverage is slanted?

Mr. McCullum: I am not saying it is only committed to commercial gain. I don't think the brief means to imply that at all.

I do think that there are economic pressures or commercial pressures which make it difficult and which may influence a person's thinking, an editor's thinking.

It probably is not on orders from the publisher or advertising manager or general manager but it may influence his thinking.

I think the example of the Middle East crisis where there has been pressure from one side as opposed to another—I am sure you will deal with that this afternoon—is an example. I would not suggest it is necessarily solely commercial.

Senator Macdonald: But you do feel that there has been some pressure of some kind on the lay press in their dealings with the Middle East crisis?

Mr. McCullum: Yes, I do.

Senator Macdonald: Would you care to expand on that as to what and how?

Mr. McCullum: Having read the United Church Observer's brief I know they are going to expand on it this afternoon.

Senator Macdonald: We will leave it at that then.

Senator McElman: Is there any conflict between that and what you suggest on the previous page, page 7, paragraph 20:

"Let it be quite clear that we solicit our share of advertising, and we readily concede that without advertising none of us, neither the religious nor the secular press, could survive."

Mr. McCullum: I don't think we could survive. We couldn't.

Senator McElman: And through the necessity of advertising are you subject to some sort of pressure?

Mr. McCullum: We are not in the business to make money, any of us. If at the end of the year we break even, it is the cause of great jubilation.

Mr. Homewood: I might comment on that. In the consumer magazine industry—and I presume this would hold true of the newspaper industry—advertising revenues represent about 75 per cent of the total revenues. Advertising represents 75 per cent and circulation and subscription revenues—about 25 per cent.

With us it is the other way around. In the religious press in our own publication, the circulation revenues are about 78 per cent and subscription and advertising about 22 per cent. This is true of all the religious press, so we are not that bound to advertising revenues. They don't dictate that much of our policy; this is contrary to what is prevailing in the industry as a whole.

Senator Sparrow: How many dollars a year would be spent in the religious press in advertising? What would the revenue be?

Mr. Homewood: In total?

Senator Sparrow: Yes.

Mr. Homewood: I don't think...

Mr. McCullum: Some publications don't accept advertising and some accept a limited advertising from within their own denominations and others will accept almost anything.

The Chairman: Mr. Homewood, could you make a guesstimate?

Mr. Homewood: Within our Association we have two large publications, the Churchman and the Observer. In those two I suppose there would be close to $300,000. All the rest would not total much more than that. Not more than half of million dollars.

The Chairman: Is there a national-local break-down on that?

Mr. Homewood: Not national-local. I couldn't give you that. A large portion of that comes from church sources so the national advertising of the publications would be relatively small.

The Chairman: Would it be 10 per cent?

Mr. Homewood: Oh, it might amount to 15-30 per cent of the total revenues.

Senator Sparrow: Do you as an association have a code of ethics for advertising or does each publication set its own standard? You refer to certain types of advertising you don't accept. Do you set this as a guideline, as an association?

Mr. McCullum: No, we do not. Each publication has its own standards of advertising that it will accept and I don't think there is unanimity in any of them.

Senator Sparrow: You refer to commercial firms or industrial firms being somewhat reluctant to advertise in church publications from the standpoint that if they do it in one they have to do it in them all. Does that statement mean that the advertiser feels it is just donation and that there is in fact very little advertising value in the church press as such?

Mr. Homewood: I don't know whether I would be able to interpret what the advertiser means or what he is thinking but they don't apply the same criteria to the religious press as they do to the other media.

We can produce authentic readership reports and demographics to show that our readers are not in square boxes. They are average Canadian citizens and they do buy as other citizens and they do travel as others do and we have a viable medium for them.

The advertising industry as a whole does not apply the same criteria. In other words, for instance, if the Observer endeavours to sell to an advertiser he may say "If I go in the Observer I have to go in all the other religious publications." He thinks of maybe 40, whereas he may have only five viable alternatives in the religious press industry.

When he is buying advertising in Maclean's, he does not apply that same criteria. He doesn't say that he has to go into Saturday Night, Chatelaine, or Time. He buys in Maclean's on the audience and the demographics it produces and this is the only criteria he uses. It is going to reach the audience he wants to reach.

He doesn't buy us on the same basis. He doesn't bring an honest approach to the audience.

Senator Sparrow: What about the government advertising in the church press? Is it the same basis of thinking there?

Mr. Homewood: The same applies in government advertising.

Senator Sparrow: Does the church press get very little?

Mr. Homewood: We do get some but very little.

Senator Sparrow: Certainly no comparison to your circulation?

Mr. Homewood: Not in comparison to the circulation, the audience, the purchasing potential of our audience, the investment potential of our audience which is not vastly different than any other publications.

The Chairman: Would you say half your national advertising is from the government?

Mr. Homewood: No.

Senator Peitten: There is a pretty fair one here. Do you get many of these?

The Chairman: That same full page ran in the United Church Observer.

Senator Smith: That is advertising promoted by the Unemployment Insurance Commission.

Mr. Homewood: We feel we are a medium for that. Our people become unemployed as well as readers of the Toronto Star or any other publications.

Senator Sparrow: Do many publications belong to the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Homewood: Only the Observer meets the requirements for membership.

Senator Sparrow: We could ask that question later. I suppose I should ask it later. Is there advantage in the church press belonging if they could meet the regulations?

Mr. Homewood: I can only speak for the Observer and perhaps we should deal with that this afternoon.

The Chairman: I think we might. I think, Mr. Homewood, you would be answering in your capacity with the United Church Observer, as a representative. Perhaps we could deal with that this afternoon.

Senator Sparrow: I suppose I could guess, but what type of advertising does the church press not take? The church press is restricted in what types?

Mr. McCullum: This varies from publication to publication. Some will not accept alcohol or tobacco advertising and others will. Some are more restrictive and accept only what might be called in-church advertising—religious books, religious hardware, that kind of thing.

Senator Peitten: Some will accept liquor advertising?

Mr. McCullum: Oh, yes.

The Chairman: In the opening paragraph you mention that you have 73 per cent of the circulation in Canada. What kind of papers would be in the 27 per cent who don't belong? That is on page 1, the first paragraph:

"73 per cent of the estimated total circulation of Canadian religious periodicals known to us."

Who would be the 27 per cent who don't belong?

Mr. McCullum: Small parish papers, small diocesan publications, some of the more conservative or fundamentalists denominations or sects.

The Chairman: I notice, Mr. McCullum, that none of your members are French Canadian? Is there any reason for that?

Mr. McCullum: Yes, they are. Credo is a regional publication in Montreal.

The Chairman: I am sorry. It is the only French publication?

Mr. McCullum: There were one or two others which have gone out of business which were members.

The Chairman: We want to turn to the brief from the Presbyterian Record but perhaps I could ask you a final question, if it is all right with the Senators.

I will put this question to each one of the three of you to comment on.

The Reverend Leslie Tarr, who is the Administrator of the Toronto Baptist Seminar, wrote a column which appeared in the Toronto Star just this past Saturday.

The lead on the story is "Minister Finds Radio Religion Just Turns Him Off." Perhaps I could quote the first paragraph and the last:

"If the state of health of religion in the Toronto area is measured by the local religious radio broadcasts the outlook is grim.

A bout of laryngitis kept me in the house on a recent Sunday and I thought I would taste what was available in religious radio. Fortunately I am a believer, for the experience could produce agnostics.

Not all programmes are hopeless, just nearly all."

He concludes by saying:

"Some good radio listener polls would deflate the ego of those preachers who fondly imagine that they are addressing a vast unseen audience out in radioland. They would discover not only is the audience unseen it is also non-existent.

I would be interested in the comments you might make on religious broadcasting in Canada.

Mr. McCullum: I personally would go along with Leslie Tarr pretty well all the way. I think there are some fine examples which would refute him but certainly on a Sunday morning I don't think I have ever listened to one for about five years but they are pretty appalling. There is one CBC Radio programme called Concern, I believe it is, which is an excellent programme. It is I think on a Monday or Tuesday night and really takes a good look at social and moral and religious issues in life today. On the whole I would agree with Mr. Tarr's assessment.

Mr. Roach: Mr. Chairman, I think this touches on some of the basic things we are concerned with as religious journalists. That is the categorization of religion. I am sure without taking any two day listening stint there are some bad religious programmes but there are also some good ones. Let us look at Man Alive on TV. On radio there is one carried nationally, at least in the Western part of Canada, at ten to eight in the morning. The Reverend Foreman, an Anglican from Saskatchewan, who gives a two or three minute talk. These are in my judgment very good religious programmes, the two I have mentioned.

I think that this ties in with some of the line of questioning that Senator Sparrow was on. What we are faced with is religious journalists trying to get across the idea that religion is more than just a compartment of life and those religious programmes that do treat it as overly denominational, the very hard sort of line, I think this does give credence to the belief that the religious programming, or the press for that matter, is narrow and old fashioned. In trying to be aware of the changing world there is a segment of religious communications both electronic and print that is trying to help people to lead a better life and contribute to our society.

This comes back to the question of government, when I was asked about government advertising. I think we are penalized, especially in the provincial and national Governments. They do treat us as something compartmentalized, like little old ladies in tennis shoes running around on a Thursday afternoon putting out our little sheets—rather than as professional journalists committed to making a contribution in a social sense, by being aware of the ecumenical dimension of religion today and all that is for a much better Canada.

The Government hurts us on advertising in not giving us what we deem to be a fair share and then compounds it by giving an exorbitant postal rate increase—in my own case double. My budget was $12,000 and it was doubled at a stroke of the pen, despite our pleading with Mr. Kierans about what he was going to do. I am sure you are aware it was across the board and not only the religious press.

This kind of thing we have to face with government is a real obstacle to the enlargement of our work which we feel is not, in the best sense of our association, denominationally orientated or protectionism or ghettoism or old-style; but is really making a contribution to modern Canada. We rest our case on that.

The Chairman: Mr. Homewood, do you want to comment on that?

Mr. Homewood: On radio programmes—this is perhaps in line with the changes going on in the churches in the worship itself. Many congregations are experimenting with new types of worship in recent response to the express need, particularly on behalf of youth, that the type of worship at 11 o'clock Sunday morning is not relevant to them. So the churches are responding by experimenting with new types of worship and perhaps in radio broadcasting of religious content it very often has not caught up with this. There are exceptions and very often unless it is a broadcast of a sermon or meditation, it is not religious. There are exceptions.

The Inter-Church Radio, which is an agency of the Anglican, Roman Catholic and United Churches, is producing programmes that are religious in a very broad sense. For example, the Nancy Edwards programme deals with many things such as poverty, race and so on, which you cannot pinpoint as being religious and yet it is a religious concern of church people. There are programmes such as the Hot Line programme that Professor Harpur has on CKGM, the Country Music station north of Toronto, which is a religious programme but contrary to the old-style format.

Leslie Tarr has a valid point that many only regard the broadcasting of services and the sermon as a religious programme but there are other experiments and diversions going on that are significant and perhaps should be developed more than they have been.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. McCullum. On behalf of the Committee I would certainly want to thank you for coming and your views have been relevant and they have been worth while. Perhaps I can expand my appreciation later today when we complete all the hearings from the representatives of the church press. We were particularly interested in hearing from you people as a federation. Perhaps you might wish to inform your membership that if any member paper, including your own, wishes to send separate briefs we would be delighted to receive them. Thank you very much.

Senators, we will now adjourn for five minutes and then we will receive the brief from the Presbyterian Record.

BRIEF FROM THE PRESBYTERIAN RECORD

• 1125

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the session to order. We are going to receive a brief from the Presbyterian Record. Sitting on my immediate right is the Reverend Mr. T. Melville Bailey, who is the Acting Editor of the Presbyterian Record.

On my left is Mr. C. Alex Culley, who is Business Manager of the Presbyterian Record.

I know, Mr. Bailey, that you were here at the earlier brief so perhaps it is not necessary for me to repeat all the things I usually say. Why don't you proceed with the oral statement and we will then proceed with questioning.

The Rev. Mr. T. Melville Bailey: Acting Editor of Presbyterian Record: First of all I want to thank you for the opportunity of being here. Coming on the heels of the brief which was just presented to you I am sure a lot of the points will coincide and therefore I don't want to make a long preamble.

I want to highlight a few facts. We consider our role as being educational and we have, in the editor's office, a complete freedom of expression. Part of our mission is to awaken the church conscience and this takes place even though we must adopt views upon very unpopular stands. It is a ministry in communication. I say "ministry" because we believe, being a religious publication, that we must listen to what Christ is saying to the church and then in turn we must make this relevant to the people: what do the people need to know about church and the activities in the world? Therefore we are acting in sort of a family way. We have to keep the family informed and be in touch with them even though they are in a backwater spot in a remote part of Canada.

Secondly, costs are increasing faster than income. This is always making us look towards some kind of subsidization.

Thirdly, there are ideas that we believe must be promoted in such a magazine as our own. New ideas such as were touched on in the last summation and that the young people must be led in certain ways of expression of worship. We feel we want to be alive to these causes as much as anyone else.

Briefly those are a few highlights. I would be interested now in answering questions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think Senator Kinnear is going to start the questioning this morning.

Senator Kinnear: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Your brief is short so I thought I would ask questions from it and I know others will also.

I have two of your latest issues of the Presbyterian Record and I want to ask some questions about that too.

First of all, you say in your brief:

"Another function is to challenge and stimulate our members, both by presenting a vision of what might be and by looking beyond our limited boundaries to what is transpiring elsewhere."

What are some of the latest visions that you have been using so people will know what is going on?

Mr. Bailey: Well, I think that in the Biafran situation, there could be a certain apathy since there is such a long distance between our country and that country. Therefore the lead which our denomination took through Dr. Johnson gave the people a vision to which they responded in a magnificent way. This is an example of some of the things that I believe.

Senator Kinnear: That you had in mind?

Mr. Bailey: Yes.

Senator Kinnear: I would like to elaborate a little more. You touched on a subject I was going to ask later. In this one issue in January you gave a great deal of coverage to Taiwan. Apparently you do a great deal of missionary work and sometimes devote a great deal of space to it. Would you include this in the vision of what you might be looking for beyond the limited boundaries?

Mr. Bailey: No. I would say that was a point with which most of our people are quite familiar because we have had a ministry in Formosa for practically a hundred years. So over the years our people are quite familiar with it. Our people are not familiar, for instance, with the emphasis now being placed on Old China and we have received comments both good and bad against running not only a cover but also material inside which asks our people to look sympathetically to these unknown people far off. We are all God's children.

Therefore in many of the letters in the March issue we have received complaints about being communistic and this kind of thing.

Senator Kinnear: Just to get back to Biafra, you were here all during the morning and heard what was said. What would your comment be on the reporting of the Biafran situation?

Mr. Bailey: I think that is the kind of reporting that comes out of a region and from my limited knowledge there were men who went into different territories at different times. If you are only exposed to certain things then you come out and report on what you are exposed to.

Mr. Alex Culley, Business Manager, Presbyterian Record: May I comment? I was very much disturbed about the team's report that there was not starvation in Biafra but malnutrition. I made it my business to go and talk to Dr. Johnson, the moderator of the church, who had been there several times. He said they had not gone far enough into the hinterland to find out because the people were hiding in the bush. He said "We have two or three hundred reporters who are giving us information and this is how we get our information." There was no intention to make it sensational. I think what Dr. Johnson said several times, I have heard him and he wrote it, was quite unsensational. He was reporting what he saw.

Senator Kinnear: Certainly the situation was terribly serious and as I say now we are hearing so little. Have you people heard anything recently?

Mr. Culley: I haven't.

Mr. Bailey: I understand that the relief agencies there are being helped by some of our missionaries who are in the Lagos area. They are endeavouring to get stockpiles of medicine and food into the hinterland as quickly as possible. I don't think there is going to be any stoppage of this. I think there would be a cooperation between the Government's attitude and the missionaries' hopes.

Senator Kinnear: You have outlined in your brief, I think, ten subdivisions. In subdivision number 1 you say: "Unlike the secular press, our purpose is bound up with truths that are everlasting in an ever-changing society."

Well, I think that is fundamental. You go on to say: "While supporting the tenets that are age-old in their worth, we believe, also, there is an 'other' body of people beyond church walls who must also be recognized as God's people; and, therefore, they must be reached, too."

Well, I think a great majority now are not within the church walls; so how do you plan to reach them?

Mr. Bailey: As an example, there is a church closed in Toronto and rather than just tear it down and sell it, they have given it over to a number of groups within our church who are endeavouring to reach this other type of people. As the people come by the church, they are hesitant to come in because they feel they are going to get the old-fashioned traditional response—are you saved? etcetera, etcetera. They are surprised to know when they come in they can talk with a group of young people who have an entirely different concept of the present-day approach to religion. In this way we are endeavouring to draw young people into the church because we feel the message is the same from year to year but it has to be phrased in a different manner and this is how we can reach the people.

Senator Kinnear: You are thinking of young people there?

Mr. Bailey: Yes. The preponderance of population in a few years is going to be 25 and under.

Senator Kinnear: So I understand but now that the population is declining then you are going to run into another era where they are going to be all old.

The Chairman: Are you leaving that point, Senator Kinnear?

Senator Kinnear: Yes.

The Chairman: Could I ask one supplementary question? This is the next line following the part Senator Kinnear was reading:

"There, the religious press always should evangelize."

I think I know but what does "evangelize" mean? In this context.

Mr. Bailey: I think probably I meant there we are not just interested in getting a body of material over to people; such as whether there is going to be a church merger in the United States or what we are doing in Australia as far as change of ministry; whether we are going to ordain women. The church press should be slanted towards people as church people, that is to bring them to a higher understanding of churchmanship and to their christianity. In other words, to get them out of the box which was mentioned in the last summation.

The Chairman: The reference is not to the kind of activity Senator Kinnear was referring to? It is people beyond the church.

Mr. Bailey: I think that would be included in it. "Evangelize?" could mean a hundred things but it is uplifting of people.

The Chairman: The point I was coming to, Mr. Bailey, was in the broadest sense it seems to me, it must be difficult for the religious press to evangelize because you are (no pun intended) preaching to the converted?

Mr. Culley: Except this does go into families. We have a programme in the church. The Record goes into something like 80,000 homes. Now what we might be talking about there is the children in those homes. That is a type, I think, of evangelism.

The Chairman: I don't put it forward critically. I think you see the sense of the observation.

Senator Kinnear: Senator McElman has a supplementary.

Senator McElman: To go back to what the church and the church press did with respect to popularizing public sentiment in the Biafran situation, to the point I believe you said they came forward with great assistance; that was your general intent of the comment?

Mr. Bailey: Yes.

Senator McElman: There has been a good bit of suggestion that more people die in India each year than were affected in the Biafran situation. This is the external aspect of it. Within our own country the disenfranchized, the poor, and most particularly our native people live in rather desperate circumstances and there is the suggestion that the media, all inclusive, including the church press, have not done their job.

Do you feel that if you were moving into this area that you could bring about the same sort of response from the Canadian people that you did in Biafra in support of our own native people? Let us get it into the Canadian context.

Mr. Bailey: The areas in which you touch upon would not perhaps be as dramatic as the conflict in Biafra.

Senator McElman: Sensational?

Mr. Bailey: We have been bandying that word about. "Dramatic", I think, is probably a little more my own word. I do believe if men and women could be released to do this kind of investigating and reporting... For instance, in our own case our editor has a staff, including business, of just three people, and he has to attend interminable meetings. He cannot get into the source of information just by sitting behind his desk. He has to be freed to go and search out this material. I think this all comes back to cost factors again. I don't know whether that answers the question but that is the way I see it.

Senator McElman: Well, the church and the church press were able to find resources apparently to move into the Biafran situation. Surely their mission in Canada is equally important; or was it simply because of the dramatic aspect of it?

Mr. Bailey: Yes. The hand was out there pleading in that moment. We all know the Indian situation demands some kind of solution but it has been going on for so long some people have become apathetic or taken sides; but suddenly there bursts upon us the great need—children dying, mothers being deprived of families, etcetera, etcetera. It is sensational, if you want to put it in that way.

Mr. Culley: May I say, sir, at the present time there is a national development fund being raised with a goal of five million dollars. They have raised about three and a half million dollars. In that figure, there is a fairly substantial amount to do something in the Indian area, for instance; Our church is already working in this area. We have one place in Manitoba and another one at Kenora. There is a great deal of work done over the years to rehabilitate those people. The church is helping advance the present thinking that non-segregation should take place—but how you do it—We find that is not an easy task. Anyway there is quiet efforts, shall I say, (and the Record has publicized this from time to time) going on and this is an ongoing work of the church, and it is growing. Does that answer your question, sir?

Senator McElman: Not entirely.

The Chairman: I am sure Mr. Culley wants to answer. Will you put the question again?

Senator McElman: You speak of the changing temper of our times, the changing values and the changing attitudes of people and society and you, sir, spoke and said it has been with us for a long time. Is your approach one that has been with us a long time or is it evolving?

Mr. Culley: Yes, I think we are trying to evolve it. We have learned some things about the Indian work, for instance, that we feel now are not relative and we are trying new things at Kenora. The experiment today is that you bring the Indian children in and educate them, not in Indian schools—you put them through the public school system but they are looked after in that sense.

Then, of course, you have the adult problem which is extremely difficult. I think I can say in all sincerity that the church is saying that it has done some of the things that are wrong and are now trying to do some things that are relevant to this particular time and age.

Senator McElman: Associated with matters of government we always hear in any matter that is suggested to be a crisis about "crash programmes" and so on. The church had some thing of a crash programme on Biafra and it got through. Do you think that the church press could undertake sort of a crash programme with respect to our native people? Could you create a real impact upon the Canadian people?

It is suggested here that the religious press actually did the job in Biafra and others followed through. All right, if we accept there was a joint effort of the religious church press, do you feel that you could again give leadership to the media and create within the Canadian people an awareness, an urgency to help?

Mr. Bailey: I would say that assuming that you see a newspaper doing a good piece of reporting on some kind of injustice and bringing that to the people's attention, I think we can do the same piece of work. Perhaps we could do it more effectively if we did it in a cooperative way with the other denominations. There is a movement now where certain articles are being written with the help of maybe three different members of different churches and then this is released to their publications as being the voice on that subject. Perhaps some kind of crash programme could be undertaken in a cooperative way going through all the major periodicals. It would be a real catalyst.

The Chairman: Do you relate that specifically to Senator McElman's question?

Mr. Bailey: You were using that as one example, were you not? Poverty was another?

Senator McElman: I have been addressing it to the native people.

Mr. Bailey: First of all we would have to be very informed.

Senator McElman: We assume you are, sir. You say the problem has been with us a long time.

Mr. Bailey: Yes, but there is a variation of opinions as to what is right, what is the right viewpoint and the right attack. I do think a combination of forces would be very beneficial.

Senator Kinneer: I am following along and I am going to ask you something about paragraph 2. The complaint we are hearing all the time is about the increase in the postal rates. You have a circulation of about 89,000 and at 2 cents a copy that will be $1,780. Now do you find you are suffering greatly from that? They say that there is a serious decline in circulations. Are you affected that way?

Mr. Bailey: We are affected by the trend in the decline in circulation and we are also affected by the rise in postal rates. For instance, in March 1969 our postal bill was $434 and in the following month in 1939 $1,788. So that is quite a jump.

Senator Kinnear: Yes. You also say "Whether cablevision in the TV field will tend to draw readers away from the printed word is yet to be seen."

Are you more worried about cablevision than ordinary black and white television or do you mean both?

Mr. Bailey: Yes, I think I mean both.

Senator Kinnear: Do you think it is drawing people away from you? We heard this morning that it is not worth listening to.

Mr. Bailey: Well, children will look at something where they probably won't take the time to read it. This is the thrust I was trying to make. If there is a so-called competitor drawing us away with something to look at rather than read, it is a danger.

Senator Kinnear: Are you really thinking along that line or is there such a great change in the way we are living today that something very new has to be found to get the attention of people and bring them back, the way we think they are going back to religion rather than away from it?

Mr. Bailey: I agree with you, yes.

Senator Kinnear: In your brief you state: "The editor of the Record has complete freedom of expression." Everyone says that, I think. How true is it?

Mr. Bailey: The only way by which the editor is bound is by the voice of the Assembly, which is the highest court of the church, if there were enough people thought that way, which could say "We want to hear nothing more about Biafra or nothing more about poverty." I cannot conceive of the court saying that but that is the only way in which I could see his hand being manacled; otherwise he might just as well retire.

Senator Kinnear: They don't say to you "Here is something I think you should stress". They don't give you leads?

Mr. Bailey: Not too much, no. I think the editor is aware of the needs or should be.

Senator McElman: Are there any strictures on what type of advertising you can run?

Mr. Culley: Yes. We do not take cigarette or liquor advertising.

Senator McElman: Do your people not drink or smoke?

Mr. Culley: They may.

Senator McElman: What is the reason for not taking such advertising? Where does the decision come from?

Mr. Culley: There is no written rule that I know of and no policy that you cannot take it but possibly in so doing you might give offence to some segments of the church and I think that we would not want to do that.

Senator McElman: Does that indicate, sir, that the editor of the Record has complete freedom of expression? Doesn't that indicate that there is some pressure, if you will, some presence that is felt?

Mr. Bailey: No. Mind you I have just come into my particular job since the first of the year. I am on a second career now. I have been associated with the Record for many years and I have never seen any statement of the General Assembly of the church not to run cigarette ads or liquor ads or so on. This is a decision of the editor but on the other hand I think we are talking about freedom of expression, in the editorial content. I think this is what is intended in the brief.

Senator McElman: Let me carry it a step further. Would it be acceptable, having in mind these people who might be offended by advertising, would it be an acceptable article, for your editor to do an in depth study, to take an approach, very hypothetical, that people do drink, many in excess, but stating there are ways in which drink can be helpful if used in moderation and so on. Now I am not going to go through an article—but this sort of approach. Would there be the similar feeling that this would offend certain people within the leadership and it should not be touched?

Mr. Culley: My own feeling would be if he felt so inclined to write an article like that, that there is nothing that would inhibit him from doing so.

Senator McElman: You were speaking earlier of your mission. Well, liquor is a problem. Do you have a mission to your people in view of the fact that some undoubtedly are going to have drink at some point in their life. Do you have a mission to suggest to them there are ways to use the evils of our society?

Mr. Bailey: If we are going to categorize something as good or bad in our conduct in relation to drinking or smoking I would say we don't intend to moralize or evangelize on that score. I have an article which was submitted to me recently on not smoking and I don't wish to publish it. I don't think this is what we want to get across to our people. There are many more issues that are alive and will touch the whole constituency. This would probably only please or displease a small minority.

Senator McElman: Perhaps I have pursued it far enough.

Senator Smith: I am interested in the last aspect that Mr. Bailey touched on. Why would you not participate in a campaign? Certainly the national government is presently in the midst of a campaign to convince people that smoking is very dangerous for their health. Senator Macdonald and I haven't smoked for some years, not because someone told us not to but because we have great willpower! I learned mine from him. I feel like getting up and telling people about it. My friend back here smokes all the time and he is going to die of cancer.

Why don't you get in on this? I think that it is something that has real validity for any section of the press.

Mr. Bailey: If we were to pursue it along the idea of a health problem, fine; but if you try and equate religion with smoking or drinking I think you are doing a lot of harm.

Senator Smith: Well, of course that was done in my case when I was a boy. When I was a boy growing up we were obliged to sign a pledge not to smoke. I smoked ever since until last year. This is the old-time religion and certainly not valid today. I am questioning your attitude towards running an article that is of terrific importance in the field of public health, I think.

The Chairman: I think what Senator Smith is driving at is you have a sort of "inverted inhibition" if that is the right phrase.

Mr. Bailey: If we were to pursue it farther how could we work with young people. We would have to say if you want to come in the church put your cigarette out. That is the kind of rigid attitude and we are not accepting people if we have to preach at them first in that regard.

The Chairman: What is your attitude to the so-called "permissive morality" which is becoming, I think, part and parcel of our everyday life?

Mr. Bailey: My viewpoint?

The Chairman: As an editor, I am sorry.

Mr. Bailey: I would not promote it. You are saying would I write articles to lead along this line of thinking? No, I would not. It is a trend.

The Chairman: In your March issue which I have been glancing through you have a question and answer column and I assume from the note at the bottom that these questions are not handled by yourself but by Rev. Dr. Fowler in Aurora. I am sure you don't censor his material. He does what he wants?

Mr. Bailey: Pretty much.

The Chairman: And this is the last question, someone writes in and says: "Why must we be bombarded with sex and nudity from every direction, especially on television? Can't something be done?"

I would like to read you Dr. Fowler's answer and ask you to comment on it:

"Not much, I fear. These things have been known before, and were found in ancient Greece. They will doubtless be known again in the history of literature, the stage and the screen. There may be a public revulsion. Citizens can express their displeasure to the television authorities, and if enough of them do so they may effect a change. I am confident that when they do so the cries of the smear words, "puritanism" and "prudery", will not upset them."

Could you comment on that?

Mr. Bailey: I would agree with the statement. I believe that there are cycles that civilizations seem to go through and when you pursue some of these trends to the ultimate then there has to be a going back to the original. I think this is what the article is saying—that we can make our views known to the different types of media. We don't want to remain silent. If we speak out, we are going to be classed as goody goodies and puritans but there will be perhaps a trend back to the good old times.

The Chairman: Do you think that the public generally are distressed by this "bombardment with sex and nudity"? Is this a real problem in the minds of people of Canada today in your opinion, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. Bailey: Well, we have changed so much in so many things and we ourselves have not been able to catch up to this acceleration. I think people are in a quandary to know what to say in most cases; whether to say to the young people "This is the vogue, go ahead". What do you do? Do you rely on the things you are brought up on in the scriptures? Of course, as you know, the scriptures can be interpreted in many ways. That would be my answer, I would take my answer from what I believe the scripture is saying in this particular instance.

Senator Kinnear: I would like to belabour the smoking bit. It would seem to me that you should be able to inform them, without driving them away, that it is a poor thing to do because of health reasons.

Mr. Bailey: I think so; but once having said that you can't beat the dog.

Senator Kinnear: You can drop it because they know you think they shouldn't smoke because of health reasons.

Now Paragraph four of your brief says:

"The Record is one way of increasing knowledge among Christian people. This kind of understanding brings more support for the Church's mission."

This is the kind of education that you are trying to give to the people. Is that what you mean by that?

Mr. Bailey: I would think so, yes.

Senator Kinnear: You inform them by articles on what? Everyday affairs or biblical affairs?

Mr. Bailey: Both.

Senator Kinnear: Number 2:

"To interpret. This is a way of holding a mirror before our readers..."

Probably we don't want a mirror. We would rather not have it in front of us. We see ourselves as others see us there. Probably if you put that a different way and try show them an image of somebody they greatly respect in religion instead of themselves.

Would you like to comment on that? I don't know why you put that in there?

Mr. Bailey: I think that the basic doctrines of the church are difficult to understand and that how we interpret these gives people an opportunity to see which road they can take and at the same time they are holding up a mirror to themselves. They have to make some decision and in that decision-making they are making themselves more complete people if they are making the right decision.

Senator Kinnear: We were talking of advertising. What percentage of advertising do you have in your magazine?

Mr. Culley: About 20 per cent roughly. I figured it out the other day, Senator.

Senator Kinnear: That compares almost with what they said this morning—78 per cent-22 per cent. You are about 80 per cent-20 per cent?

Mr. Culley: Yes. Would you mind if I gave you the figures at the end of December, the fiscal year. The advertising was something like $27,000 and our subscription income was $95,000, so that would give you an idea of the ratio.

The Chairman: What is the reference to 60 per cent-40 per cent ratio in paragraph 10.

Senator Kinnear: Why did you put in 60 per cent-40 per cent?

Mr. Culley: I think what that is put in there for is because I happen to know that the 60 per cent-40 per cent ratio is the Government regulation. You cannot have or should not have any more than 40 per cent advertising.

The Chairman: I don't think there is any Government decree or edict or legislation regulating the amount of advertising that I am aware of.

Senator Sparrow: The postal rate.

Mr. Culley: This is so.

The Chairman: That is why you put it here?

Mr. Culley: This is to inform you this is the ratio which we would...

Senator Kinnear: You would not go above that?

Mr. Culley: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: You are talking about editorial content. It is two different subjects.

Senator McElman: The terminology should perhaps be "We stay within the bounds of the 60-40 per cent radio."

Mr. Culley: I would agree to that.

The Chairman: We were talking about two different things.

Senator Kinnear: I want to ask about the phrase "social gospel". I am not sure what that means. What does "social gospel" mean?

Mr. Bailey: I think in modern terms it would be men relating his interests to men in their everyday work. We are applying the teachings of Jesus to man and his every day.

Senator Kinnear: "Without being labelled..."

Mr. Bailey: There was a movement of social gospel that had some unchristian points to it that was popular, say, in the last century. This is why we put it in quotes.

Senator Kinnear: Again I took a different meaning. I thought you were hiding the fact you were a religious person or something.

Mr. Bailey: No.

Senator Kinnear: That is not it?

Mr. Bailey: No.

Senator Kinnear: In your brief, paragraph 5 you say:

"In church publications the readers look for direction, without feeling that they cannot think for themselves."

I had the feeling that if you put a "period" at the end of "direction"...

Mr. Bailey: I am sorry. Put a period after direction?

Senator Kinnear: And leave the next part out: "Without feeling that they cannot think for themselves." Do you think there are many people today who don't think for themselves?

Mr. Bailey: I would think there would be a lot of people.

The Chairman: A lot of people who take your papers that don't think for themselves?

Mr. Bailey: I don't think it was meant that way. Do you mean a lot of people generally?

Senator Kinnear: You say "In church publications the readers look for direction, without feeling that they cannot think for themselves."

Mr. Bailey: I wanted to get across that we are not giving them a party-line and they digest it. They take it because it is printed that way. They must be aware of the directions in which we would like them to think but they have to make their own mind up on it.

The Chairman: I would like to ask you about paragraph 6. You say: "If there are cartels in the secular field, this has no effect upon the religious press."

I therefore put this question to you. Do you think that there are cartels in the secular field as related to the media?

Mr. Bailey: Only by what I have heard could I base an opinion. That is why I put that there. I am not saying there are.

The Chairman: You have no opinion on it?

Mr. Bailey: No, I have no opinion whatsoever.

The Chairman: Are there any Senators who have questions?

Senator Macdonald: Is your circulation of 89,000 wholly within your church membership?

Mr. Culley: Yes; with a small percentage going outside, maybe a thousand or so.

Senator Macdonald: It is not on sale at newsstands?

Mr. Culley: No.

Senator Macdonald: To your knowledge was there ever any thought given to say, the four papers mentioned here—the Canadian Churchman, the Western Catholic Reporter, the United Church Observer and the Presbyterian Record—amalgamating and forming one publication, one national religious publication rather than all these small ones which have grown up over the years?

Mr. Culley: No, I haven't heard of any, sir.

Senator Macdonald: Do you think it might be a good idea.

Mr. Culley: It might be worth investigating, yes.

Senator Smith: Do you intend that your publication reflect the Presbyterian thinking on matters concerning religion? Would that be an objection that you might have if such a thing as Senator MacDonald suggests should be up for discussion by all of the congregation?

Mr. Bailey: Well, I assume if we had some opinion on gambling...

Senator Smith: If the Presbyterian Church in Canada had particular views on any social problems or with regard to religious services and beliefs, if you had strong views would that prevent you joining in a cooperative way in publishing a first class religious-based magazine?

Mr. Bailey: If you are going to touch on such issues as gambling, you would have to iron out all these things before you even thought of coming together, wouldn't you?

Senator Smith: The Presbyterians have quite different attitudes on Bingo, I know that.

Mr. Bailey: Much.

Senator Smith: You don't think the fact that the Presbyterians have quite different religious beliefs as to methods of services and so on, you don't think that would be a hindrance?

Mr. Bailey: No.

Senator McElman: On this particular subject of gambling there has been a good deal of discussion before the Committee that in the society that we are now living in, there is need for dissent, dissenting voices to reach through to the masses. Great efforts are being made by the media today to provide avenues for dissent so the public can get all viewpoints and presumably, as in the church, reach for truth. What is truth?

Would this not be a positive approach, as suggested by Senator Macdonald? In such a publication there would be opportunities for dissent. You would have one viewpoint expressed and in the same publication another viewpoint expressed and therefore general public discussion within the Christian Church. Would this not be positive?

Mr. Culley: I would say in the tradition of freedom of the press there should be and there has to be. We have it in the Record. For instance we have a very conservative group who will dissent very violently on something that is written by a more liberal theologian or layman and we get all kinds of letters (we don't print them all) almost to the point of "Please cancel my subscription."

The Chairman: Do you get the reverse kind of letters when you have very conservative theological writing?

Mr. Culley: Oh, yes. A lot of these are printed in the Record so the people may see dissent and disagreement. This is the policy of the paper—to give expression to all various shades of theological thinking and various shades of Christian thinking within the church, and there are many.

The Chairman: Do you have a question, Mr. Spears?

Mr. Spears: Yes. On this question of dissent and varying opinions I would like to go back to the question of editorial freedom, which was mentioned here. Mr. Bailey in his earlier remarks said that one of the functions of the church press is to awaken the conscience of the people in the church and to do this it is sometimes necessary to take unpopular stands in the magazine. He mentioned one article on China which had aroused considerable reaction. I wonder if you could give us further examples of the kind of areas which the Record has found it necessary to take unpopular stands? This again is in the whole area of arousing dissenting opinion in the church and airing opposing views.

Mr. Bailey: If I had a little more time perhaps I could. I have to plead a certain amount of ignorance as I was brought out of a pastorate to fill a three month vacancy and I don't have a great deal of experience behind me to give you an answer.

The Chairman: Perhaps in view of the fact that both of the witnesses are relatively new we will leave that.

At number 9 on page three you say: "There is strong objection to slanted reporting." This is in the mass media. Could you give us some examples of slanted reporting by the mass media?

Mr. Bailey: Not specifically but just from what I have heard when I asked people before I came to the Record if they thought there was slanted reporting and they said they thought there was. A number of people said what they would like first is to have the facts presented and then the periodical, the newspaper or the TV could comment on it but then leave the decision to the people. As I say, I cannot give you anything concrete but this is the kind of thinking I picked up from people.

Senator McElman: None of those people gave you facts?

Mr. Bailey: No, they didn't.

Senator Kinnear: I think that I could ask about your joining in the ecumenical movement. I see that there is a good example of joining the ecumenical movement in the January issue of the Presbyterian Record, on page 6.

In that issue you show where two congregations, you take your own congregation into another, I believe a Ukrainian one, and found it a very fruitful experience. Do you want to continue doing that?

Also in Hamilton in the Presbyterian Church in one area—Pinelands in Burlington (Burlington is not going to go with Hamilton so I better make the distinction) at the first part—the United Church went to the Presbyterian to the number of about 15 per cent and now it is up to about 50-50. What happens there? Do you have administration difficulties or how do you manage? Do you take it all into the Presbyterian?

Mr. Bailey: It is the Presbyterian congregation.

Senator Kinnear: And their communicants are 50 per cent now.

I want to ask about the Ross report. You had them do a survey something like the Anglicans had in the "Comfortable Pew"—and we found it was the uncomfortable pew. Because we are short of time I am going to ask you about some of their findings. They say that there are indications of an orientation to people and communities and a de-emphasis on buildings. They say there is also strong support for more cooperation with community groups and with other religious denominations." Would you like to comment, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. Bailey: What they are pointing out is the fact that instead of little groups working in denominations, there is a great need now to speak with one voice and to join hands. Whether you do it as one big church or whether you do it as a number of communities speaking together is another matter but we cannot continue the Church in its present form unless we do turn to these new types of ministry.

Senator Kinnear: I would like you to speak about the de-emphasis on buildings. Where do you think this will be done and how?

Mr. Bailey: I don't know whether they mean there that people relate church to building and this is how we operate—anything done in this building is what is known as Church; or whether that means we should get out of the walls of the church into the society where we properly belong and where Christ wants us to be.

Senator Kinnear: Of course that is what you say. I wondered how you thought you would do it if you wanted to get out of the walls.

Mr. Bailey: I think to train many, chiefly young men, to do this.

The Chairman: Mr. Culley, do you want to comment?

Mr. Culley: I happen to be in a downtown church which is in a poor section and has high rise apartments and there are two things we are going to do. The first is find out if we can get the use of a room in a high rise and possibly hold services there. This is being done in London, Ontario. This is what is indicated the Church has to do—one thing they have to do.

Another thing that is happening is churches are considering in the periphery of the metropolitan areas what they call ecumenical complexes where they build one building and have one worship centre where two or three or four denominations would worship, a Christian education centre which would eliminate all this competition. I attended a meeting the other night was at a church in Northwest Metro Toronto where the United Church is considering going in as a congregation and joining with the Presbyterian. The United Church is not particularly interested in going in on the property that costs about 80 to 90 thousand dollars. These are the things that are happening, Senator Kinnear.

The Chairman: I hesitate to intervene in the discussion. I don't want to interrupt a most interesting discussion but I cannot help but observe that perhaps we are straying a little bit from the terms of reference of the Committee, as interested as we are in both Senator Kinnear's questions and in your answers. I don't mean to be rude.

Senator Kinnear: That is getting into the magazine content.

The Chairman: I stand corrected. Senator Kinnear, do you have other questions?

Senator Kinnear: I did have something. Do you think that religious services will continue to change? How and where do you expect they will take place?

Mr. Bailey: They will continue to take different form. I think in time there might be two types of services, one for the older and one for the new generation at different hours or maybe greatly changed eventually to become half old and half the new type that will please everybody.

The Chairman: On behalf of the Committee at this point I would like to thank you, Mr. Culley, and thank you, Mr. Bailey. Given the information that you are both, if I may use the term, new men, we are particularly grateful.

I am sure you are very busy and it is good of you to come and assist us in this way.

If I may say to the Committee the remaining brief from the Church Press will be received at 2.30 p.m. from the United Church Observer and 4 o'clock the witness is Mr. Dalton Camp. There will be two very interesting witnesses this evening. At 8 o'clock Professor Thelma McCormack, associate professor, Department of Sociology, York University. At 9 o'clock, Mrs. Una MacLean Evans, Alderman of the City of Edmonton.

The Committee adjourned at 12.30 p.m.

Upon resuming at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I might call this session to order.

This afternoon we are receiving a brief as you probably know from the United Church Observer.

On my right is the editor of the Observer, the Reverend Alfred C. Forrest.

Sitting on my immediate left is Mr. Homewood who you will recall was here this morning with the Canadian Church Press group. Now however he is here more directly in his capacity as the director of publicity services for Ryerson Press and I gather one of your functions more specifically is to be the business manager of the United Church Observer.

Mr. Homewood: Yes.

The Chairman: Dr. Forrest, the brief you prepared in compliance with our request and our guidelines has been received. It has been circulated to the Senators and has presumably been studied by them and now we are able to put about 15 minutes at your disposal to comment orally on your brief.

You may expand, explain and amplify or take away from it or add anything else that you may wish to say and then we would like to question you on the contents of your brief and perhaps on your oral statement and perhaps on other matters as well.

Thank you and welcome.

Dr. Alfred C. Forrest, Editor, The United Church Observer: Thank you Senator Davey.

I am not going to say very much in the way of an introduction as I think it might be more profitable if the members of the Committee question the things I have presented.

I should comment first that we made a mistake in the circulation figure on page 1a—couple of letters were transposed which increase our circulation by 81,000. That figure should be 309,000 or approximately that.

I would say the first is more or less general with some background.

The second part, at the beginning of paragraph 18 is quite personal, and as a matter of fact it is written in the first person and I am definitely speaking for myself and expressing my own opinions at that point.

I make two comments or observations generally on the mass media based on my observations through the years as an editor of a church paper; firstly, I have expressed some criticism about the coverage generally of religious matters by the mass media. I would like to perhaps say right there that I have been negative in this. For many years I have attended church councils and conferences and I must say that from the time of my youth I was always tremendously impressed with how good a good journalist is. I have particularly noticed this with well-trained men of the Canadian Press who have moved from covering some event on a church council and in a few hours or in a day he had a tremendous grasp and reported well.

My criticism is more about policy and management, in that so often the young, immature and inexperienced reporters will be put on the church story, and if they do well they are promoted to sports or other things apparently more important.

So my criticism is more of the basic habit of editors and publishers of sending their less competent, less experienced people to something which I naturally think is extremely important.

The second observation I have made out of the mass media is a very special one. (Out of my own experience in most areas of their work I am not competent to judge or criticize. However, I have criticized rather sharply and documented my reasons for it). It is the general coverage of the mass media in this country on the Middle East; I have personally come to believe this is the most serious and threatening international situation in the world today.

That I have summed up in the latter part of paragraph 57 when I say:

"The Canadian people, on the basis of information they have received from their newspapers and the CBC, cannot be expected to make competent judgment on the most serious international crisis in the world today."

I think after making those comments to point out some of the things which I think are of more significance in the brief, I would ask you to ask me questions, and I must say that Mr. Homewood is more competent in business administration, though he has done a great deal of writing for The Observer as well and for many years was our managing editor.

The questions regarding the business and advertising and so on—we can share them, and I think perhaps Mr. Homewood would be most competent in that area.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Dr. Forrest. I think we will turn right away to Senator Everett who has the first question this afternoon.

Senator Everett: Dr. Forrest, dealing with this matter of the reporting of the Arab-Israeli conflict, would you say that you are prejudiced in any way in favour of the Arab cause?

Dr. Forrest: Well, I try to be objective but I suppose I might be faulted professionally in one area in that I have tried to correct what I felt was an imbalance, which of course is always a very dangerous thing. But in order to keep myself objective I have relied very heavily on the reports of the international and more objective observers, reports of the United Nations. I have talked extensively with people who have been in the area and who have never visited the Middle East. I have gone to both sides and I spent ten months there last year in which I travelled extensively in both Israel and the occupied territories and in several of the Arab countries.

I can say this with some reasonable confidence, that I think you will not be able to find an international observer, a foreigner—an internationalist, who has worked for any length of time in the area on both sides who does not agree basically with my findings on the Middle East.

I could quote—I wouldn't say that Arnold Toynbee agrees with me, but I have read a lot of what Arnold Toynbee has written and I find I don't disagree with Arnold Toynbee.

Well, I will make that boast that you cannot find a really informed observer on the Middle East situation who disagrees with my findings in basic things.

Senator Everett: What are those findings, Doctor?

Dr. Forrest: Well, one, the important thing, regardless of the faults in the past—I have found many faults on both sides actually but the important thing is to achieve some kind of a just settlement.

I have, for two and a half years, urged that we seek to achieve such a settlement on the basis of the November 22nd resolution of the United Nations, which you may recall was passed 15 to 0 by the Security Council.

That will be my main thing and I think for the sake of the people in the area, both Arab and Israeli, that this is the thing we should press for.

Now, I have commented on what I think is a very serious mistake on the part of Israel in refusing to permit the refugees in 1967 to return to their homes and camps as they were asked to do by the United Nations in a vote of 102 to 1.

Senator Everett: These findings are of independent observers. Do they apply in any way to the press reporting that you allude to here?

Dr. Forrest: Well, I would really covet for the press a more serious coverage of the issues and the things that might be done to ease the situation rather than the spotty reports on this incident and that.

There are naturally incidents on both sides every day. Now, I will say that I think there has been an imbalance in reporting from Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. It is very rare that you get any kind of competent report in our press for example from Damascus and not too often either from Amman or Beirut.

Senator Everett: You seem to base your claim on the fact that the correspondent is just not there—they are mostly in Tel Aviv?

Dr. Forrest: I don't impute motives to newspapers or correspondents, no. I have said here that the Arab public relations and their treatment of the press generally is inept. The Israeli treatment is excellent. It is a lot easier to get your stuff out of Israel—to get into Israel, to get a story and get out.

I think there are more reasons than this but I do not impute motives.

Senator Everett: Not at all?

Dr. Forrest: Maybe I have been known to.

Senator Everett: You make a statement on page 18, item 56:

"Then there is another reason which I hesitate to bring up but it was attributed to one editor when he rejected a series of articles on the Middle East in which he showed some sympathy for the Palestinian cause. There aren't many Arabs in Toronto."

Could you give us more definite information on that?

Dr. Forrest: Well, I give that general illustration and frankly I don't like to name the reporter of that one but it is the sort of thing that one hears and one suspects.

The Chairman: Did you write the series of articles yourself?

Dr. Forrest: No, this was not mine. As a matter of fact this was a series of articles written by a former moderator of the United Church of Canada, Dr. E. M. Howse.

Senator Everett: In item 53 you say:

"... and the astounding inadequacies of our mass media in reporting and commenting on the Middle East problem sometimes shakes my confidence in their competence and their courage in dealing with other issues."

That would indicate that you do believe...

Dr. Forrest: That would indicate that I do impute motives—the motive of spirit?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Dr. Forrest: Well, that is true. I wonder how the press was reporting Vietnam 15 years ago. I wonder how the press reported Germany in the 1930's I wonder about those areas of the world in which I am not informed, where I am not competent, and I wonder for example how the press reports South Africa.

Now, I am anti-South African. I know how I have reported it—I have given imbalanced reports—I am against apartheid and I didn't think about this until I started to write this, but I suspect that the press in this country has not given a completely objective report from South Africa.

I certainly haven't, and I don't think I have found it, but because I am with the press in this one, I have not been critical. In other words, the reporting does follow I think somewhat inevitably, the subjective feeling of not only the reporter but the public opinion in this country, and I suspect on the Middle East we have tended to be influenced by a number of factors, one of which is the Israeli point of view which is popular and the Arab point of view which is unpopular.

Senator Everett: Dealing with the Toronto papers, do you think they have suffered from this?

Dr. Forrest: I think the Globe and Mail is the best. I think the Telegram must be an embarrassment to most of its news reporters. I think the Star is becoming more embarrassing to its staff.

Senator Everett: Taking the Israeli line?

Dr. Forrest: Right.

Senator Everett: In an article in the Star—I think it is dated February 25th of this year—taken from a meeting that took place at the Timothy Eaton Memorial United Church and I believe you probably followed the meeting.

Dr. Forrest: I was there.

Senator Everett: I am reading from this article ..

"Forrest told the meeting that since he began writing about the Arabs, I've been smeared at your Zionist meetings and slandered in your synagogues."

Has there been a great deal of pressure put on you?

Dr. Forrest: Well, the Jewish press, which I don't see much, has been libellous according to my lawyers. Scurrilous in some cases, according to my opinion, but when I say Jewish press I will qualify that again; although the name is sometimes Jewish it is the Zionist press. There is a great deal of very liberal and enlightened opinion in the Jewish community which has not joined in this, but there is extremism in certain quarters and it has been rough.

The type of thing that calls me an unreconstructed, medieval bigot, that creature—that type of thing.

Senator Everett: Do you believe then that the mass media has not been giving this fair coverage based on the pressure of the Zionist group?

Dr. Forrest: I wouldn't say based on pressure. I think there is pressure and many editors have told me that there has been pressure. I don't blame people for pressing. The Zionists have a point of view and the Israelis have a point of view and they both have a right to press.

I fault editors if they bend to such pressure. I certainly have been pressed and I think being human some editors are going to bend.

I do think the things that I have specified here are probably more significant in this matter of bringing about an imbalance.

Senator Everett: And you refer to that in your list of items on page 17?

Dr. Forrest: Yes. I think probably one of the most important thing is the basic decency of the journalistic and editorial community in that we have abhorred above almost all things the bigotry and race bias and that type of thing. I think the average newspaperman is a liberal who would consider race bigotry or bias or religious bigotry a much greater sin than some of the sins that maybe the Pope deals with more especially. If you criticize Israel or Zionism in this country you will be called an anti-Seminite.

Now, let me quote from the speech—if I may sir?

The Chairman: Yes, by all means.

Dr. Forrest: I would hope that our full time isn't given to this, but just let me quote from Mr. Aba Gefen, the Israeli Consul-General the other night, under the title "AntiZionism is AntiSemitism." He was dealing with me specifically. This is a copy of the Speech as it was sent to me, as it was given, and as it was carried on the CBC. He says:

"It is true that the word anti-semitism is no longer popular, so our enemies invented a new name for their hatred of Jews: AntiZionism, which is Anti-Semitism of a new style only. Those who hold today in their hands the flag of anti-Zionism are saturated with the same ideologies which caused the genocide of six million Jews."

He was questioned on this by a very able Jewish professor whom he called a traitor.

Now, this I say is in the context of me. This is what you risk in this country and North America if you criticize Israel or the policies of the Israeli government which I have criticized, or questioned the philosophy of Zionism itself.

May I just deal with this a little bit further...

The Chairman: By all means. Didn't Rabbi Rosenberg go further than that?

Dr. Forrest: I don't take Rabbi Rosenberg seriously.

The Chairman: Okay.

Dr. Forrest: He has been rough.

Let me comment on another item. We have been charged with giving unmitigated support of the Arab terrorist commandos on the CBC and in his speech. Under the heading "The United Church Observer supports Arab Terrorism", he supports this by saying:

"An article in the Observer of December 1, 1969, called for the support of the Arab terrorists, who carry out daily terror activities in Israeli supermarkets, apartment buildings, parking lots, university libraries and cafeterias."

Now, Dr. Bennett who wrote this is the Associate Secretary of the Canadian Council of Churches who was a Canadian representative to the Cyprus conference on the Middle East, and he brought back a news report and this is the paragraph on which this is based—unmitigated support of the Arab terrorists. I quote:

"A factor of some considerable importance is the new Palestine Liberation Force. No longer a group of dispossessed peasants, it has in its membership a whole host of intellectual elite. In one college of a well-known university of the Middle East, 19 out of a graduating class of 35 went straight into Al Fatah."

Now, I would say that that was news reporting and it is pretty familiar to anyone who has been in the Middle East.

His last sentence is:

"In turn this—terrible as it may sound—has brought a new sense of dignity and national identity to the Palestinian whether in or out of Israel."

Now, that is interpreted publicly through the media as unmitigated support of the Observer for Arab terrorist commandos. Dr. Gefen goes on to say:

"In its December 15th issue the Observer called openly to send in donations for the terrorists who throw grenades into crowded Jewish stores, who kill men, women and children..."

You may look at these publications sir, if you are interested.

This open invitation for the support of Arab terrorists was a public service announcement which was requested by some women in Toronto who are Canadians, and I had put them in touch with the Red Cross, and the notes read:

"Urgent. Clothing, boots, donations for medicine and foods for Palestinian refugees. Send to the Red Cross Society" and we give the Toronto address...

"and for further information call."

Now, the boots and donations et cetera were left at United churches to be sent.

Now, this is interpreted as calling for donations for the Al Fatah terrorists. Now, this is the type of thing you deal with when you try to discuss this subject in this country.

Senator Everett: It would seem to me—I don't want to pursue the point any farther than this, but it seems to me that some of the statements you have made in here—the press in this country is overwhelmingly pro-Israel and pro-Zionist.

Dr. Forrest: That by the way is a quotation from I. F. Stone, editor of the Stone's Weekly, who is probably the leading Jewish intellectual on this continent.

Senator Everett: And you were quoting him?

Dr. Forrest: I don't know whether I attributed it to him or not, but I probably should have.

Senator Everett: Then you go on to say:

"I don't object to the editorial bias, but it is reflected in an imbalanced and partial news coverage."

The Chairman: Where is that, Senator?

Senator Everett: That is at the bottom of page 14, item 46, and then in dealing with the question of Syria being closed to the British, American and West German reporters, and you say that the Canadian newsmen should be put in there because they would tell a story which you say "would shock the world."

It seems to me that what you are suggesting in all of this is that for one reason or another, whether it be Zionist or Jewish pressure or whatever it is, or sympathy towards their cause, there is a real clamp in the Canadian media on either pro-Arab news or even I suppose you could go so far as to say telling the story straight.

Dr. Forrest: Yes, I make this charge.

Senator Everett: You are making a really serious charge?

Dr. Forrest: I make this charge very seriously.

Senator Everett: Would you exclude any part of the media? Would you exclude part of it at all?

Dr. Forrest: Well, the CBC and the radio broadcasting companies. I am just saying that Syria from personal knowledge is one of the most significant stories in this whole thing.

It is a big country; it is a fascinating story—it is a tragic story of those who have been uprooted contrary to the Geneva Convention and indeed out of their villages. 739 applications were made through the International Red Cross for the rejoining of families, and when I was there I researched this story very carefully and none had been reunited.

Now, I am just saying that a press that is alert, a broadcasting company that is alert, gets into Syria and gets that sort of story out to the Canadian people. I wrote it and it was rejected by one newspaper...

The Chairman: Which newspaper?

Dr. Forrest: The Toronto Star. It was carried in the United Church Observer, and the only comment that appeared in the press was a statement that I must be the most biased Christian in Canada for reporting these things like Mr. Roland de Corneille who had just had a free trip to Israel.

The Chairman: Where did that statement appear, Dr. Forrest?

Dr. Forrest: That statement appeared in the Toronto Telegram and was carried by religious news services around the world.

Senator Everett: Who is Mr. de Corneille? For whom does he work?

Dr. Forrest: He is an Anglican priest and he works for Christian-Jewish Dialogue. He is paid in part by the Council of Christians and Jews and part by the Anglican Church of Canada.

Senator Sparrow: Now, what do you mean by the free trip you mentioned? Who paid for that?

Dr. Forrest: El Al and the Government of Israel. This is very common among the clergy. About 27 or 29 editors had a free trip to Israel a year ago and this is a very active programme of the Israeli Government—it has been for over 20 years.

They take the clergy to the Holy Land but usually they get only to the one side. A recent trip took about 60 editors of the church press and it was advertised as a study tour and indicated that it would probably go to both sides, but it didn't; it went to Israel.

Senator McElman: Have any representatives of the Observer ever taken such a trip?

Dr. Forrest: Mr. Homewood went after we talked it over. He has been there many times and he is a pretty informed person, and he has been there on the one trip.

Senator McElman: It was free to him as well, was it?

Dr. Forrest: That is right.

The Chairman: You have never had one?

Dr. Forrest: For some strange reason or other I have never been offered one!

Senator Beaubien: But you were there for ten months you say?

Dr. Forrest: Yes, but I never received a free trip.

Senator Beaubien: Who paid for that?

Dr. Forrest: The United Church. As a matter of fact, if you want me to go into this, my expenses for that tour, for that time abroad—my salary was paid by the United Church Observer, my expenses were paid by the Presbyterian Life, the United Church Herald, and syndicated Protestant church papers, including the Lutherans, Anglicans, et cetera. This was the arrangement that was made. There was no government interference and I was very jealous of this thing.

I think in this area under such controversy church editors have to watch this very carefully.

Senator Everett: I would like to leave this subject, Mr. Chairman, but if there are any other supplementary questions...

The Chairman: Are there any more supplementaries on this subject?

Senator Beaubien: Just on something Dr. Forrest said at the beginning.

Dr. Forrest, you said that you think the Middle East is the worst danger spot. Are you thinking of war now?

Dr. Forrest: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: That is what you were referring to?

Dr. Forrest: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: You were referring to an all-out, full scale war?

Dr. Forrest: Senator Davey, I have given sermons on this, and I don't think the Committee would like to hear one now, but yes, that is what I was referring to.

Senator Beaubien: Do you think it will spread?

Dr. Forrest: Well, if you want my opinion, I think when it breaks out Israel will win it again quickly. However, the Arabs will keep on and this will go on for decades, and I personally think it would be a disaster if the Arabs were to win in their present mood. It will be tragic if Israel wins again because there will be more refugees etc.

It is a disaster anyway because people are being killed all the time and a tremendous part of all the national income from all those people is being spent on armaments and the young people are being brought up in hatred in the preoccupation of war.

On the main claim I have made I am not competent to assess this. I am not a competent military person, but I know that Mr. Nixon and Mr. U Thant have said words to this effect, that it is the most threatening or most explosive situation in the world today.

If you know the whole business of Africa and Africa's relation to the Middle East—the Middle East oil and so on—you will appreciate some of the threats.

Senator Smith: I would like to ask Dr. Forrest why is it that Syria hasn't tried to induce newspapermen, politicians and clergymen to come into Syria and see this story that you have described?

Dr. Forrest: Well, Syria is tough and they have changed their governments at least 20 times or so.

I talked to one of their senior officials and he would correspond I suppose to an under-secretary of state who is a church man and friendly and one day he said "You know, I don't know what goes on right now myself." And he gave me a message to give to John K. Cooley of the Christian Science Monitor—and I must say that I think the Christian Science Monitor is the most competent newspaper in North America on the Middle East—to say that he was trying to get him in.

Now, let us put it this way. Syria is difficult. If a newspaperman arrives in Beirut, if he is an American, British or German he can't get into Syria, he may wait six months, but a Canadian can get in but he can't get in tomorrow. Most of us are in a hurry.

I remember the first time I got in since the June war—I could not get a visa at the United Nations or in Washington. I was advised to go to Egypt and fly in in the middle of the night. So I went to Egypt, with a little help from our own department, and with some difficulty I got a visa and I flew in in the middle of the night. But if I had tried to cross a border even with a visa, I probably would have been stopped.

In other words, it is a tough assignment to get to Syria and to do your job. To me this should be a challenge to the great newspapers, broadcasting corporations and wire services of this country to get their top men into that country instead of going over and just whipping into Jordan and sitting around Beirut or going to Jerusalem.

The Chairman: Perhaps if Senator Everett will allow I just have a couple of questions on this same subject. They are very short and will come to the point.

Dr. Forrest: Well, I thought you would be on tobacco and liquor and a few things like this morning.

The Chairman: Well, we may come to that, Dr. Forrest.

Why do you say the Telegram is more embarrassing than even the Star when it comes to this kind of coverage?

Dr. Forrest: Well, I will say this for the Telegram and Mr. Basset. Mr. Basset is an out and out pro-Zionist. That is his privilege and this shows in the editorials.

Senator Smith: That is his bag.

Dr. Forrest: The expert on the Middle East is Rabbi Reuben Slonim...

The Chairman: Who writes for the Telegram.

Dr. Forrest: Yes, and he is the Middle East expert.

Now, that itself—I think it is better to have a Protestant for example being the expert on the Vatican than a Cardinal. I think it is better to have an expert on the Middle East who is an atheist or agnostic or United Churchman.

Now, it is my observation that the Telegram reporting has toed too much to the Telegram editorial line.

The Chairman: Have you in any of your trips to the Middle East ever filed a story or a series of stories on your trips to the Middle East to any daily Canadian newspaper?

Dr. Forrest: Yes.

The Chairman: Which paper?

Dr. Forrest: Well, in '67 I did a series on the refugee camps. I saw a lot of the refugees and I talked to top Israeli and Arab officials and I did a series for the Toronto Star when I came back.

I was very pleased with the way they handled it. It was syndicated and carried in a lot of Canadian papers.

The Chairman: Did they carry the full series?

Dr. Forrest: Yes.

The Chairman: Everything you wrote?

Dr. Forrest: I have no criticism whatsoever. I have only praise for Mr. Sykes, who was managing editor of the Star at the time, and how they carried and syndicated that story in 1967.

The Chairman: Well, you mentioned a story that the Star did not run—when was that?

Dr. Forrest: Well, I always believe in answering questions forthrightly and I am being put in a situation where I...

The Chairman: Well, if you prefer not to answer, please say so. We are not trying to embarrass you.

Dr. Forrest: Well, I have made my peace with the Star, but for certain reasons I do not impute motives and I don't think it was because of incompetent reporting that my series of 1968-69 did not get published in Canadian papers.

The Chairman: Dr. Forrest, has the United Church or anyone in the church—I suppose I should exclude lay people—ever asked you to soft pedal this, or suggest that you soft pedal or low-key the issue?

Dr. Forrest: I guess indirectly I was advised and not—I don't think for any wrong motives but for something to which I am very sensitive myself.

I was advised by advisers whom I respect—"Look, you have made your point. You have told your story. Don't let the Observer become a bore by pounding this all the time or you will be like somebody who is always on liquor or tobacco or dancing or Jehovah Witnesses or something."

This advice was offered to me semiformally I suppose I would say. I haven't followed it. I don't have to follow advice.

The Chairman: Well, I have perhaps just one other question and then we could go back to Senator Everett.

Has the Observer in your opinion made a conscious and successful effort to put forward the Zionist position or the Israeli position if you will?

Dr. Forrest: I have here certain issues that some of you might be interested in looking at, but this was an issue that had a great deal of material on it.

I don't want to defend myself but just let me...

The Chairman: Well, we don't ask you the question in the sense that you have to defend yourself, but I think we would be interested in it.

Dr. Forrest: Well, I thought I had a pretty balanced, objective report in that issue, but certain of my Zionist friends thought I had been very unfair, so in the following issue I carried a long piece from the Israeli Ambassador who told me I had made the Observer an adjunct to the Arab information office or something, and a very long piece by Rabbi Plaut who disagrees with me very strongly, but he is a personal friend and I have always respected his views.

I carried these two long articles in the subsequent issue without comment—I would have liked to have commented, but I thought I had an unfair advantage of them.

Now, I certainly haven't gone out to solicit articles propounding the Zionist philosophy.

The Chairman: No, but you think there has been an attempt at some sort of balance?

Dr. Forrest: Yes. I think if you don't try to do this you will lose the confidence of your readers.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: On that same subject, if I could just quote from the brief we received this morning from the Church Press, at page 8 it says the following:

"At a time when the news outlets of Canada concentrated so heavily on the Israeli side of the Middle East crisis, it was the church press (often under heavy criticism and facing utterly baseless charges of anti-semitism) that attempted to present another side of this confusing and dangerous situation."

Would that suggest another side, that it wasn't an attempt at balanced reporting but rather to present another side?

Dr. Forrest: Now, of course, this is a different bag from mine, although they probably had me in mind.

I may say that the experience that I have had has been a fairly common experience for the church press in North America. The CCP would be thinking in much larger terms than the United Church Observer but yes, I plead guilty on this count. Maybe not guilty but I certainly have left myself open as one does if he seeks in any way to correct what he feels is an imbalance. I have sought to do that.

And I see reports coming day after day from Israel and nobody has been in Jordan or Syria. I went to Jordan and Syria and I reported on what I saw there. I don't try to report everything which I know people have already read and heard just in order to give the impression that I seem fair.

It would be very easy to win friends and influence people by repeating things which had already been published but yes, I am aware that the Observer, and probably other church papers, have exposed themselves to a charge here, and we have likely done this in other areas.

For instance, quite candidly, I would like to get to Hanoi. Now, if I go to Hanoi I can be charged that I didn't go to Saigon. However, I have been muttering for a number of years that there have been far too many clergymen—especially years ago—who took free trips courtesy of the American military, to Saigon.

Now, this is the danger. If I went to Hanoi, probably I should to to Saigon too. I don't know whether I will get to Hanoi or not but I don't see any point in the United Church Observer making any more whatsoever to go to Saigon.

It has been written on too often, but who has really done Hanoi? I am not very much interested in going to Hong Kong, but I would very much like to to Peking.

Senator McElman: Would it be fair then to suggest that the assumption has been drawn that the Observer is not endeavouring to present a balanced picture of the total situation?

Dr. Forrest: I would object to the assumption but I have seen people making that assumption and finding some evidence for it.

Senator McElman: The reason I asked the question is I read from this that the church press itself draws such an assumption, not necessarily of the Observer...

Dr. Forrest: Yes, I draw the assumption of the mass media generally in this country that they have been imbalanced on the other side.

Senator McElman: And again, the assumption is that you are not trying to present the balanced picture for your readers but another side to equate perhaps what you believe the mass media have been doing. Is that a proper approach to it or not?

Dr. Forrest: If it is put in that terminology, yes. I think that is a fair point to make. When you are called anti-semitic for doing it, I object.

Senator Everett: Do you then as an editor for a church magazine believe that it is appropriate to present to your readers unbalanced reporting of that nature?

Dr. Forrest: No, but let me give you an analogy or another illustration. I attended the opening of the Vatican Council and I put Pope John on the cover of the Observer. There were a lot of Protestants and Orangemen who thought that I was unbalanced—that I was giving the other side. I don't think I reported much about what the Orangemen had to say about the Vatican Council.

Now, that has been given at such length by so many. I must say, if we were a 48-page daily paper, I suppose we should cover more facets of things, but we are a periodical and rather slim. I felt that this was a helpful way to do it, to try and correct some certain imbalances.

At that time we lost many thousands of subscriptions for being imbalanced. We were trying to give for the first time in our history a sincere statement from the point of view of the Catholic community.

I did the same with the Russian Church when I went to Russia.

Now, do you still give equal space to all the anti-Communists in the country to keep balance?

Now, this is an art or an attempt at the skilled and sure, you may make mistakes as artists do. I do not measure the lines or count the stories on one side or the other. Balance is something we try to achieve and it is one of our principles but I will say that people certainly, depending somewhat on their point of view, will find us at times not balanced.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Would you tell me what the Observer's policy is, Doctor, on junkets or free trips?

Dr. Forrest: Well, I wrote an editorial on this a while ago, and this is the one in which I was called a medieval bigot, saying that there were lots of trips to the Middle East and we recommended that people go. But for churchmen or anybody who is in a position of trying to influence public opinion, two things we should keep in mind when there is a controversy is to go to both sides and pay their own way. That sums up my policy.

Senator Everett: But is that the policy of the Observer with all of its editorial staff?

Dr. Forrest: Generally, yes.

Senator Everett: Do you take free rides or free trips of any kind?

Dr. Forrest: Not big ones. For instance, in Israel I had a fellow with a car taking me around. I have done a lot more of this type of thing in Israel because they are better at it. I accept the usual courtesies accorded to the press in this situation. I don't think we have taken any trips outside of the one Mr. Homewood had when he went along, and it was a carefully thought out one, and we thought it would be a good idea if he went.

Mr. Homewood: We did some years ago when the military had some stories, with the Bomarc...

Dr. Forrest: Oh, yes, up to North Bay, and I had one with the international affairs and I went to Norad and Nato one time with some kind of an international affairs thing.

I take a ride with the Air Force—I am an Air Force veteran and I take a ride with the Air Force every chance I get.

Senator Everett: I notice that you don't derive much advertising revenue from travel advertising.

Dr. Forrest: No, we think we should get more. We think we are legitimate for them and we actually run tours.

Now, our staff people have gone along on conducted tours, so they more or less get a free trip, but they work for it and that I don't consider a junket.

Senator Everett: These are travel tours?

Dr. Forrest: Well, we promote a tour somewhere or other, and maybe one member of our staff or someone we choose will conduct the tour—there again according to the way it works they receive their ticket for the tour.

Senator Everett: From whom?

Dr. Forrest: It works out from the travel agency or the air line.

Senator Everett: Do you have a travel page in the Observer?

Dr. Forrest: No.

Senator Everett: You don't do any touring on...

Dr. Forrest: Well, we have a lot of travel in there and we sell some travel ads. I have always felt that the Observer was a very good medium for travel. Church people like to travel.

Senator Everett: You say at the bottom of page 6, item 13:

"We have, for example, a strict policy against advertising tobacco, alcoholic beverages and certain patent medicines, or gimmicks and gambling devices for raising money for charitable purposes. Mink coats and Cadillacs aren't for the Observer either."

Now, do you class Cadillacs...

Senator Beaubien: Now, Senator Everett, you are a Ford dealer and that is not fair!

Dr. Forrest: I would take a Lincoln ad any time we could get it, but you would sell more Mustangs.

Senator Everett: In other words, what you are saying is that as far as mink coats and Cadillacs are concerned, you have no policy against them?

Dr. Forrest: Oh, no. However, we would not say to our advertiser—well, we know that we would be dishonest if we tried to sell—well, let me put it this way.

I remember our advertising manager coming in one time and saying he was talking to a big executive who was smoking a big cigar who said "Look, the Observer puts people out of a buying mood. I can't even enjoy a good cigar after I've seen all those poor little starving kids."

Now, I think there is something in that. I would say that we need to sell within the general policy of the church press. We are a better medium for modest things and not a good medium for luxury ads.

Senator Everett: But that is not because of your readership?

Dr. Forrest: No, it is not the kind of people we have, no. They drive Cadillacs and Lincolns and so on.

Senator Everett: But by the time you have read the Observer they are out of a buying mood?

Dr. Forrest: Well, they are out of a mink coat buying mood.

The Chairman: Are you leaving that page because I have one question on it.

Senator Everett: Well, I have one question on that page, but it is on postal rates.

The Chairman: Well, mine is on advertising. You say you have a strict policy against advertising tobacco, alcoholic beverages and certain patent medicines. I am curious to know which patent medicines you are against?

Presumbaly, Preparation "H", which I see advertised on page 36 of this issue and which is reported to have great healing qualities apparently is okay. What kind of patent medicines wouldn't be okay?

Dr. Forrest: I have wasted more time on this—I don't have much to do with this—but once in a while we have cleared the decks and I have said "All of it goes out."

I can give you a lot of illustrations and testimonials from church elders on Preparation "H" but...

The Chairman: Well, I don't think that would be necessary!

Dr. Forrest: Well, let us say that we are slightly inconsistent from time to time in those little ads at the back.

The Chairman: I wonder why you accept them?

Senator Smith: What is wrong with them?

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask him that.

Dr. Forrest: Well, when I became editor of the Observer I was going to tee in on three particular ads.

One was trusses, one was unwanted hair and one was "do your false teeth slip"? Now, I am not going to deal with all of these...

The Chairman: Well, the false teeth is right above Preparation "H"!

Dr. Forrest: The chairman of our advertising committee took me out to lunch at the Royal York just about the time I became editor, and he started telling me what an awful time he had had with his teeth for years until he got this stuff.

And I really thought, do I have the right to tell these people that we don't like the looks of their ads.

I do have some other illustrations, but I won't impose them on you.

The Chairman: Well, we are pulling your leg a bit, Doctor, but still on advertising, and I think a little more serious type of question is about your membership in the Magazine Advertising Bureau.

Perhaps Senator Everett will be dealing with this.

Senator Everett: I am.

Dr. Forrest: I suggest you go to Mr. Homewood on this.

The Chairman: That is fine.

Senator Everett: On the part of the postal rate changes—were you paying a special religious publication rate?

Dr. Forrest: No, I don't think so.

Mr. Homewood: Second-class rates.

Senator Everett: Second-class rates?

Mr. Homewood: Yes, there was no special religious rate. Pardon me—I think there was a quarter of a cent per pound difference between religious publications, and not only religious but public service or non-profit publications and others.

I think the rate was 1½ cent per pound for the others and we were paying a cent and a quarter I believe.

Senator Everett: Your rate right now I gather is 5 cents a pound and 2 cents a piece?

Mr. Homewood: We don't get the benefit of the 5 cents a pound. Ours is straight 2 cents per copy.

Senator Beaubien: Is that a big increase?

Mr. Homewood: 500 percent.

Senator Everett: What effect on your revenues did that have? Not on your revenues, but on your postage?

Mr. Homewood: Well, the increase in postage alone was from $30,000 to $150,000.

Senator Everett: $150,000?

Mr. Homewood: Roughly $150,000.

Senator Everett: So that increase was $120,000?

Mr. Homewood: Yes.

Senator Everett: Could you not compensate for that in your subscription rate?

Mr. Homewood: We couldn't, because it came in suddenly and we had just adjusted the rates the previous year anticipating an increase of some proportion, but not to the extent that it was.

I think the extent of the increase was far greater than anyone anticipated, and in the January of '68 we had increased our rates.

Senator Everett: I notice in your submission that you say you will likely become in the very near future a monthly publication instead of bi-monthly. You blame that on the postal rates. Is that a fact or could you indeed compensate for the rates?

Mr. Homewood: There are a number of factors. The postal rate increase is perhaps the principal one, as it is the largest block of money involved in our budget of major increase.

As of the 1st of April this year there will be an increase in paper costs, which has been announced, and this will cost us another $9 to $10,000 alone.

There are many factors here and the postal rate increase is the largest single factor in the rising costs.

Dr. Forrest: I could say quite candidly there would be no consideration of going monthly if it hadn't of been for the $120,000 increase. By raising our subscriptions and holding our circulation we were in a position then where we could absorb these rising costs at a reasonable cost for some three or four years, at which time we could have put another subscription increase in without losing circulation.

It is that $120,000 which we can't absorb. We either have to do something drastic like go monthly, or get a subsidy from the church, and for certain specific reasons I prefer not to be subsidized by anyone.

Mr. Homewood: I might add on this that we might conceivably come close to carrying the additional cost of postage if we had the benefit of the pound rate—if we didn't have the 2 cent minimum. That is if the postal rate increase might have gone—I am just quoting from memory here but it might have gone from $30,000 to $81,000 instead of $150,000. With this amount of an increase, we likely could have covered, but with a 2 cent minimum per copy this is what really hit us hard.

Senator Everett: You say that you don't want to be subsidized by anyone. Is Ryerson self-sustaining?

Dr. Forrest: Yes, Ryerson has always made money until recently, and there is a sense in which that isn't quite correct. They always picked up our bills.

Now, they printed us and made some profit out of the printing, and that always seemed to me to be dignified. There was absolutely no suggestion, no interference whatever in editorial. It was quite clear. It is still clear with the church, but Ryerson is now unable to pay the deficit.

There is a new reorganization in our setup, and I would prefer not to be subsidized out of the givings of the people.

Senator Everett: On page 1 you refer to official, semi-official and independent religious publications, and you class yourself as semi-official.

If you were subsidized would you class yourself as official?

Dr. Forrest: No. I have confidence in our church that they would jealously guard the freedom of its editors and that would mean that, although I am an official of the church, what I say is not official.

Senator Everett: Who is picking up the tab for Ryerson now that you are losing money?

Dr. Forrest: Well, there is a reorganization going on and Ryerson has certain assets and nobody has picked up the tab.

Mr. Homewood: And they have an under-standing banker.

Dr. Forrest: Yes, and after all Ryerson Press is owned by the United Church, so if it doesn't come through this and become profitable again, the United Church—at the moment it is being carried by the bank and guaranteed by the church.

Senator Everett: How far ahead are your subscriptions negotiated on the average?

Mr. Homewood: Our renewal lapse time?

Senator Everett: At the moment they brought in the postal rate increase, how locked-in were you in terms of average time on your subscriptions before you could make any adjustments?

Mr. Homewood: Well, it varies because we have renewal dates all through the year but at the most about 18 months.

Senator Everett: And on the average?

Mr. Homewood: About 9 months on the average.

Senator Everett: So your decision then to reduce your publication frequency from bi-monthly to monthly is more on the size of the increase rather than the suddenness?

Dr. Forrest: Well, if we had more warning—and I don't think—I suppose you are right, the size, but the suddenness was very embarrassing to us as it made it impossible for us to make other alternative arrangements that we might have made over a period of 2 or 3 years.

Mr. Homewood: Unlike other magazines, we don't sell a larger number of three and five year subscriptions. Most of our subscriptions are for one year.

Senator Everett: You said at the top of page 3:

"Readers must not be manipulated even to support a good cause."

Why not?

Dr. Forrest: That is the eleventh commandment.

Well, I think basically just about the most important thing that an editor or writer or publisher can do is to come clean with his people, be honest. I think that that is a principle, whether it pays or not—and secondly, it doesn't pay.

Right, you sell cars—pardon me, Senator, I didn't mean to...

The Chairman: Well, I don't think Senator Everett would take anything that you say as...

Senator Smith: He hasn't sold any here yet!

Dr. Forrest: It is a matter of integrity.

Senator Everett: Well, is it the use of the term manipulation that you would be against? I assume the Observer does support causes?

Dr. Forrest: Yes, but let us put it this way. Say you are spending $100,000 in a certain part of the world to do educational work and five thousand dollars of that is going to feed hungry children.

Now, your advertising campaign should be 95 per cent for the education and 5 per cent for the children. There is a tendency trying to raise the money for this to play up poor little children; for me to write a weekly editorial on feeding the poor little children.

Now, this is a fault of the church and I have been guilty. I have distorted the Arab situation, unintentionally, and sincerely tried to help by playing up the poor refugees through the years. Until you get into this country, you have an idea that every Palestinian is half-starved. Do you get my point?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Dr. Forrest: So you shouldn't play on the emotions of people. I don't mean to say that there isn't a place for emotions but before anything else, it is honesty and integrity in reporting the facts.

Senator Everett: On the top of page 5 you say:

"The increase reflected the revived interest in religion and rapid expansion in the United Church of Canada in the post-war period."

I was just reading this other brief from the Canadian Church Press—I may have misread it but I get the impression that the churches are in dire trouble.

Dr. Forrest: No, you get this from the mass media.

The Chairman: Well, in fairness to Senator Everett—I think you may get it from the mass media but I think you also get it from that brief.

Dr. Forrest: Well, the word "dire" is far too strong.

The Chairman: Well, Senator, would you like to quote the part?

Senator Everett: Well, I don't know whether I can find it.

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask somewhat of a similar question.

Dr. Forrest: Well, if you follow statistics and if you study the statistics you will learn that church activity, membership and finance have had a very rapid rise and reached their peak in 1959 in attendance and membership. Probably a peak for all time on this continent.

It levelled off about '65 or '66 and now there is a decline. What it is going to be I don't know, but it does mean in areas where they are over-extended—That little crack about the mass media was probably unfair, but at Christmastime I noticed a picture of a downtown church in Toronto that was almost empty. The two churches I went to were packed.

Now, the membership has dropped a little bit, and our finances have dropped a little bit, but about a year ago in the United Church of Canada the givings had reached an all-time high, so it is not dire.

There has been a levelling-off and it may become very different.

The Chairman: Now, I have found the quotes that I wanted from the brief with regard to the decline in denominational memberships and revenue. That is on page 10 of the brief and on page 3 of the brief there is mention of the crisis of belief in the world.

Dr. Forrest: Well, I think there is a crisis of belief and there is a decline in membership but I don't think the churches are in dire straits.

The Chairman: Well, isn't a crisis of belief a dire situation?

Dr. Forrest: Well,...

The Chairman: Well, maybe it is just a play on words, and maybe I shouldn't do that, but I think Senator Everett's question is a fair one.

Senator Everett: Well, I don't make the point to discover an inconsistency. I run across this conflicting opinion all the time.

On one page it says that the world has never been more religious and on the next it says that the churches are falling apart...

Dr. Forrest: Well, I am a little defensive on this because I think that we tend to—in the church itself and the reporting on the churches we tend to be a bit sweeping.

I noticed a Canadian Press story on the General Commission on Union in Winnipeg which reported that the Anglican and United Churches were coming together because they had such a problem with declining membership. This is just not the reason. This is not the reason that United and Anglican churches are coming together.

This decision was made when they were at their peak of prosperity.

Now, they are facing problems and this may become a pressing thing, but it is not the fact now.

Senator Sparrow: May I just comment from the Presbyterian Record of February in which there was an article which stated:

"It is no figment of the imagination, then, to suggest that there is a deepening crisis within the American church—a crisis of purpose."

In the P.S. Ross and Partners study, which you will be very familiar with in regards to the Presbyterian Church, it says:

"Among the laity there is a disturbing lack of involvement and sense of mission. The 'average' member and adherent, particularly in younger age groups, is not involved in church activities. Census statistics clearly indicate that Presbyterianism has not retained the allegiance of as large a proportion of the Canadian population in younger age groups as in older age groups. The church is not communicating with youth and young adults."

Would you agree with those findings in the church generally?

Dr. Forrest: I wouldn't make them as general as they are there. The census of statistics in 1961 showed something like this—that the Presbyterian Church had something like 7 per cent of the number of Canadians over 55 or 60, but only 3 point something per cent of the children, so the children are growing up.

Now, that was not the situation for the United Church and it was the very reverse for the Catholic Church. The census of statistics in '61 indicated what is now happening.

You see, you get areas of Toronto for example where the ethnic—the neighbourhood has completely changed and the United Church constituency has gone and the area is now solidly Catholic.

Now, to jump from there—that is just one illustration—to jump from the particular to the general, I think there is a tendency for many of us—maybe in the pulpits more than in the press—but it would be in my judgment true to say that we reached a peak, we levelled off, and we are now in decline.

There is a crisis in faith, there are problems of communication and so on. I consider this a challenge and an opportunity. Maybe it is threatening but it is no disaster. I think it could have been predicted.

I would personally predict that this is going to keep on for some time. For example, in the religious press, as was pointed out this morning, Presbyterian Life dropped from 1,200,000 to 800,000. We are bucking a trend all over the continent with the Observer and our circulation. I hope to buck it successfully, but it is almost eerie because you will find the same thing happening in California and in Ontario.

The Chairman: Dr. Forrest, could we put this thing into perspective this way:

You say in your brief at page 8, number 20...

"There is no doubt that there is a great, possibly increasing, public interest in religious matters in North America."

Is it not possible for me to agree with that statement as I do while at the same time observing that the formal structure of the church has all kinds of problems?

Dr. Forrest: Yes, I think that is the thing that needs to be said. The institution is threatened. The youngsters have left the senior departments of Sunday school and they are crowding into the courses in the universities. I don't know quite what it means, but I think what you have said is correct.

The Chairman: It seems to me—we have the underground press coming here next Tuesday I think, and it may be a strange thing to say but maybe in some ways some of these things in the underground press may have something in common with religious publications, although neither group I am sure would admit it.

Dr. Forrest: Well, I think they could edify us. Yes, I would admit it. I think we could probably learn more from them than from our elders.

Senator Everett: In your points on the shortcomings of the mass media reporting on religious subjects, would you feel that the mass media are doing their job if you lost your constituency to them?

Dr. Forrest: Yes, probably. I think this might be.

Senator Everett: Do you then only fill a need because they are not filling it? This is the sort of thing we have heard from the underground press—the only reason the underground press exists is because the mass media are failing in their job.

Dr. Forrest: You know, I have been rough on the mass media, but at the same time I must say—I think I have said it here—that I have lived in other parts of the world and travelled enough and I have great admiration and respect for the good professional journalists and the good papers in this country.

Yes, at the moment I can say to people, you can't get all your religion from the mass media. You need to read my paper as well. It probably would be a good thing for the world and for Christians if we were made superfluous.

Senator Everett: It would be?

Dr. Forrest: I have never been asked this question before...

Mr. Homewood: Or it may be that the role of the church press would be vastly different than it is now.

Senator Everett: Well, there is quite a difference between the two viewpoints, isn't there?

Mr. Homewood: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: You weren't suggesting that their publications were underground press?

Dr. Forrest: No. There probably would be still a role for the parent pump which we try to stay away from. In other words, the men's club met at the lake last weekend, type of thing. We have neglected that role and tried to be more general and more secular.

Senator Everett: There is just one statement which fascinates me here, on page 12, item 37:

"We rely on clergy, and generally those who have something to say don't know how to say it, and those with nothing to say say it well."

I don't know how long you are going to be editor of this magazine. I think it is a fascinating statement for you to make. Is this a general condemnation of the United Church?

Dr. Forrest: No, but I know so many professors of great insight and great understanding and among them are close friends, and you get them on a panel on the CBC or writing a piece for me, and I really don't know what they are saying.

Then, there are the glib people who are good communicators—they are my friends too. I think we need them, but I think we have all heard and seen this—the learned preacher where the people go to sleep and the superficial preacher where they are entertained.

Senator Everett: You say on page 13, item 41:

"Editors and publishers are convinced, I believe, that religion sells papers."

That seems to run counter to everything you have said up to that point.

Dr. Forrest: Well, I am sorry if I did because I do believe that there is a tremendous interest in religion. Maybe not so much in the institution or the activity or how much the church costs, but in the meat and potatoes of the religious faith and the great problem for all of us is to be able to communicate in simple understandable language the profundities of the thing.

I think you were saying this, Senator Davey, that there was a great interest in religion in these times...

The Chairman: Yes.

Dr. Forrest: To meet this interest helpfully and positively—well, that is a great job, and we are trying to do it and it is not easy.

Senator Everett: Well, you say that the press are doing it but not doing it properly; is that correct?

Dr. Forrest: Well, I think some are doing it excellently, but I mention there in that same section—well, I mentioned some names, somebody like Grattan O'Leary, and the late B. K. Sandwell.

There was a time when you could go into an editor's office in this country or read his editorials and you realized that this man knew his theology. I don't know too many like that now.

Claude Ryan is one. I think he is the best example that I know of and there may be others or other humbler men in the smaller places who are doing this. But generally speaking an educated layman doesn't pride himself in this generation in being an informed theologian.

Senator Everett: But you make the point that religion sells newspapers and publishers and editors understand that. Does the Observer-type religion sell newspapers?

Dr. Forrest: It sells the Observer.

Senator Everett: Well, do the publishers and editors believe in the Observer-type, or is it a different type that sells newspapers?

Dr. Forrest: No, I would really like to have you answer that rather than me answer that. I guess I just don't know. This is what I keep trying all the time to give that which is helpful and informative and also give it in such a way that they want to pick it up at the coffee table and read it.

I would rather reach the person on the fringe of the congregation than the minister and the leading elders.

Senator Everett: Well, the point I couldn't understand is this. If the publisher believes that religion sells his newspaper, why is he guilty in your mind of doing such a biased job?

Dr. Forrest: I don't know.

Senator Sparrow: You refer again that there is no doubt that there is a great increase in public interest in religious matters in North America. What is creating this interest then? Is it communications—the television mass media?

Isn't Senator Everett's question what is increasing the interest, and you are answering to a question what is the increasing interest. Is it criticism of church beliefs—that type of interest, or is it a deeper faith in people, or what are the reasons for it?

Dr. Forrest: It was a post-war phenomenon that was not predicted. I remember reading that there would never be another Billy Sunday, people would never turn to that type of thing again, and then Billy Graham came along.

It was predicted that people who turned to prayer during the war in their fear would desert the churches after the war—it went the other way.

I was surprised, and I don't know if I have ever read any good analysis of what happened. I dare say it is the sort of thing that historians will deal with with more competence.

I always felt it was an interest in religion and in the faith more than in the institution. It was reflected in the tremendous growth of the churches in the suburban communities, and often it was the young person out of the war, with his first home and this sort of thing, who wanted this for his children perhaps more than for himself.

There was a general acceptance that religion was a good thing for people. It stood for the best and many sociological as well as religious things contributed to this post-war religious boom.

We are over it. What is going to happen, I don't know.

Senator Sparrow: Well, in other words, you are not giving credit to the media?

Dr. Forrest: Well, McLuhan probably has more intelligent things to say on it than I do. I don't know. The radio may have and later T.V., but it was reflected first in the sharp increase in church attendance followed by a rapid growth church circulation of church periodicals and for many years—I remember discussing this with a New York Times book editor once, and he pointed out that for 10 years there had been a religious book at the top of the top 10 in their list.

At that particular time there wasn't one and I asked him why and he said he didn't think it meant anything—that there hadn't been any good religious books published in recent months.

I am more of a reporter than an analyst at this point.

Senator Everett: What do you mean at the top of page 2 by editorial and prophetic freedom?

Dr. Forrest: Well, that is a word we use when we don't want anybody to interfere and tell us what we think.

I suppose the old congregational church had a phrase "The freedom to prophesize" and it didn't mean the freedom to predict. It was the right of a man to say we think this is wrong, or this is right, this is good or this is bad, and he was left to say it.

I guess it is almost a cliché with us, but it means—well, I think it would be true with the editor of the Globe and Mail or the Star as well to pronounce on issues in the sense of this is right or this is wrong in our opinion.

Senator Everett: Well, really then it does not have a great deal more importance in your mind than the term editorial freedom?

Dr. Forrest: Yes, I will accept that. It is a religious thing. When Ray Horde, as a man with his collar on, secretary of our church, said against unpopular public opinion in this country Vietnam is wrong, most of us thought Ray Horde was wrong. However, because the church gave him prophetic freedom, his right to say that was not to be interfered with.

Now, that is a little bit more than editorial freedom.

Senator Everett: Are you the only religious paper that is a member of the Magazine Advertising Bureau?

Mr. Homewood: Yes, that's right.

Senator Everett: As I understand it, you have an ABC rating?

Mr. Homewood: Correct.

Senator Everett: Which means that 70 per cent of your circulation is paid?

Mr. Homewood: 99 per cent of it is paid.

Senator Everett: 99 per cent?

Mr. Homewood: It is all paid circulation.

Senator Everett: Has the Magazine Advertising Bureau been good to you, and if so, what has it done?

Mr. Homewood: Yes. There are two principal reasons why we belong to the Magazine Advertising Bureau.

The Chairman: How long have you belonged to it?

Mr. Homewood: Since incorporation which I believe is about three years. We were with the charter group of magazines that formed the association as it is now constituted, but principally we felt that our potential for selling national advertising is in direct proportion to the extent to which we are accepted as a consumer magazine, and so this is one of the reasons that we want to be identified as a consumer magazine.

Our readers are consumers.

Secondly, we feel it is important to support and maintain the existence of the magazine industry as represented by the Magazine Advertising Bureau, to give corporate strength to the industry and to the counter-groups selling in a very competitive field.

We have competing against us in selling advertising the efforts of the T.V. Bureau for television, the Magnamedia for weekend supplements, the CDNPA for the daily newspapers, the Radio Bureau and various associations for radio. This gives us a counter-selling group for the magazine industry, of which we want to be a part in the consumer field.

A by-product of this is the value of research to us that the Magazine Advertising Bureau carries on. Being a small publication financially, we could not attempt to do parallel research on readership audiences etc. That is being done and has been done continuously by the Magazine Advertising Bureau from which we benefit.

We do have instances of direct sales results from our contacts through the Magazine Advertising Bureau.

The Chairman: What would be some of the accounts that the Magazine Advertising Bureau has attracted for you?

Mr. Homewood: I don't have a list of all these. However I know that one account, the Canadian subsidiary of a cosmetic firm that we sold last year on a trip to New York with the Magazine Advertising Bureau, placed ads and the sale to that particular company covered our fees for the entire year to the Magazine Advertising Bureau.

The Chairman: Is it realistic to think that the Observer can attract a great deal of national advertising?

Mr. Homewood: It is realistic to hope but I don't know whether it is realistic to achieve it. We have peculiar problems that the other consumer magazines don't have in selling advertising, some of which we mentioned this morning. The reluctance on the part of agencies and advertising people to identify to the religious press, to use the same criteria buying religious press as they do in other media.

The Chairman: Mr. Homewood, does the Observer carry more national advertising than any other religious publication?

Mr. Homewood: I think this would be true, but perhaps the Canadian Churchman might be close to us, but I think The Observer would carry more national advertising than most other religious publications.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear?

Senator Kinnear: On page 3, Dr. Forrest, you say the following:

"The news must not be managed to make it acceptable to the reader or comforting to the establishment."

I am willing to accept that after having heard you.

Over here on page 7, item 14, you say:

"Readers do exercise considerable influence on the editors, as to what kind of ads are legitimate for a church publication."

Now, are you softening a little there?

Dr. Forrest: No. The first dealt with articles and editorials and the second is advertising.

I must say that I think you probably caught me out there. If I were re-writing this I would word that slightly differently, but what I have found is that our readers take our ads very seriously.

Senator Kinnear: What I wanted to ask was if you put in what you wanted to put in, your readers might not like it and you might lose some of your subscribers?

Dr. Forrest: Well, if somebody is going to try and cancel their subscription we are not going to hinge on that.

On this subject of patent medicines which came up here today—if I found that our readers found that some of the stuff was offensive, I would send a note I think to the advertising manager.

But another more specific thing I spoke of was the gimmicks. Advertisers who have used something say clip coupon, or your church group—collect coupons to raise money for the Lord. Now, this is offensive to a few of our church people who say this isn't good stewardship.

If they can convince me that this is wrong, that we are defeating our purpose by carrying this sort of ad, I will drop the ad.

If somebody from the establishment came in and said he didn't like it, I am more likely to be difficult.

Senator Sparrow: What do you call the establishment?

Dr. Forrest: Oh, my close friends or my brethren around the building or Dr. McClure, the moderator.

Now, I must say that he would be the last person on earth to ever tell the editor what to do. I mentioned somewhere that one's friends are more difficult than one's enemies in editing a church newspaper, because they have their work to do and it means a great deal to them, and maybe they feel that what you do makes their work more difficult.

So they are your friends and you have lunch and they say couldn't you lay off that. This is the temptation.

Where there are two principles that clash; you see theirs and they see yours; you still have to do your thing.

Senator Sparrow: Well, that is a very narrow establishment then that you are referring to.

The Chairman: You are talking about a church establishment?

Dr. Forrest: Yes. You see, maybe you should have pushed me on this. You see, I wear two hats. I am the secretary of the church. There are times when I am privy to information which I don't publish. I hope you don't press me on this but I am aware of this. It is a thing which you inherit and you have to be an editor, that is a loyal opposition, and then you go over here to a meeting and you are meeting with your brethren and you are right there in government.

Senator Sparrow: Have you tried and would there be value in having The Observer distributed on newsstands?

Dr. Forrest: We have tried and I think its chief value would not be economic. It would probably be costly and I think its chief value would be the effect it would have on the editors. Especially when an issue didn't sell.

If it didn't sell on the newsstand we would probably look at it again because it would probably mean that it didn't get picked up off the coffee table.

We have tried once through Curtis, which I think is one of the leading ones in the country that handle Maclean's and some others, and the management were ready to do a pretty thorough experiment on this and we were ready to budget for it but the scheme was turned down in their Chicago meeting.

I recently approached Curtis again for another possible experiment on this, to test it, at certain choice spots—as a matter of fact it is before the new manager at the moment, but he said the decision would have to be made in New York.

Senator Sparrow: Why would it be turned down?

Dr. Forrest: I suppose in their judgment it would not be a profitable undertaking and maybe we should be grateful that it was turned down because we might have found if we put 100 copies in the Lord Elgin Hotel and they only bought 2—this would be good for us to know but sad for us to learn.

I would assume they turned it down simply on the basis in their judgment it would not make money.

Mr. Homewood: Also on this we get the same argument we get from advertisers—if we put The Observer on the newsstand we have to put all the others on the newsstand.

Dr. Forrest: We were dropped from one private newsstand where we were doing fairly well because certain other religious publications went to management and said they should be there too.

Senator Smith: What does it cost to put The Observer on the newsstand if Curtis or some other company were willing to look after you?

Mr. Homewood: I have forgotten.

Senator Smith: We probably have the information somewhere.

The Chairman: I think we do.

Dr. Forrest: I have it in my files but I have forgotten. Certainly it wasn't something that we were undertaking from the point of view of making money.

Senator Smith: Why would that decision have to be made in another country?

Dr. Forrest: Because it was an American company that was doing the work in Canada and their head office was there.

Senator Quart: I have a little question here which confused me a little bit when I opened your brief. Unfortunately, I had to attend other meetings and wasn't able to be here and maybe you have addressed this already.

You answered Senator Kinnear on her point on page 7 as to what kind of ads are legitimate for a church publication. When I first opened this brief, I opened it at page 6 and this last sentence caught my attention.

The Chairman: Well, Senator Quart, before you go on, we have discussed the mink coats and Cadillacs.

Senator Everett: You and I are in agreement, Senator Quart!

The Chairman: Why don't you say one more thing about mink coats and Cadillacs Dr. Forrest, for Senator Quart.

Dr. Forrest: Well, the paper with its emphasis on feeding the world's hungry and this sort of thing discourages its readers from buying luxury items.

Senator Quart: Well, supposing they are old, what are you going to do—throw them out?

Senator Beaubien: The readers or the coats!

Senator Quart: I am sorry.

The Chairman: Well, as interesting as this session has been, I am afraid we must close it, but I would like to say...

Senator McElman: Could we have one comment from Dr. Forrest on the proposition put forward this morning about one strong church publication.

Dr. Forrest: Well, I would like it but I would have to confess this, however—I don't like to confess this about the church, but this would be true at the moment—there is a substantial denominational loyalty from which we benefit in our circulation which would be lost in a united publication.

I think Canada and the church community would be served better if we could have a publication in which there were Catholic, Protestant etc., where we united together and turn out a public circulation of 800,000 or a million.

But I am aware, or at least I suspect, that we would more likely end up with a circulation of a few tens of thousands at this point in our history.

The first move you are going to see—this I would expect, would be the Churchman and the Observer go together. We have already made certain steps toward this, but we are holding off because we were advised frankly by people who oppose church union. They said 'you are making a great big tool to overwhelm us with your ideas of church union, and we don't want the opposition to church union to ever feel that they got pushed'. So that will be delayed for some time at least.

The editor of the Churchman who is still here, I think he will nod agreement with what I am saying.

The Chairman: I am going to exercise my prerogative and ask the last question. I don't often do this, Dr. Forrest, but I would like to ask you about the coverage of religion by the mass media generally.

You say in section 24:

"If a young reporter does well on the religion assignment he is likely to be promoted to better things."

You say then in section 40:

"I suppose it is true to say that in English-speaking Canada, the most influential commentators on religion are Pierre Berton, Charles Templeton and Gordon Sinclair. They are respected friends of mine; much of their contribution has been valuable; they speak as unbelieving critics, and while atheism certainly does not disqualify a man from making profound and helpful comments on religion, it would be helpful if the media produced more men of equal competence in communication but greater profundity of understanding."

How can that be achieved?

Dr. Forrest: Well, let me tell the editors and publishers how to do it. I really think it would be helpful if on the big dailies particularly, instead of the cub reporter coming on and given religion until he knows he has some talent as does happen—that it be one of the best paid jobs on the paper—how you do this I don't know, but I would like to see the best men becoming experts in this area and writing on it in the church paper. It makes it tougher for us in our field to have that sort of thing.

That is one little practical thing. Train them better, pay them better, give them bigger offices, and keep them on the job longer.

The Chairman: Well, on behalf of the Committee, I would certainly like to thank you both.

Mr. Homewood, you have been a very patient fellow. This is the second time we have had you here and we are particularly grateful and thank you for your many helpful and useful comments.

Dr. Forrest, as well as being a useful witness may I say that you have been a most engaging witness. We are grateful for your contribution; this will be valuable information for us I am sure. Thank you so very much.

May I say to the Senators, I would like to have a 5 minute adjournment and I would like to reconvene quite literally in 5 minutes when our witness will be Mr. Dalton Camp.

(Short recess)

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call this session back to order. The witness is perhaps someone, of whom it can honestly be said before this particular audience, that really needs no introduction and so really there won't be any introduction.

I would simply say to you Mr. Camp, this is a change of pace. We have been dealing since 10 o'clock this morning with the church press, with all its ramifications and manifestations and very often it was difficult as Chairman, because I found the questioning straying a little bit from the mass media and getting into pure theology.

I am hopeful that this session might not get into pure politics. However if it does I am sure it will be most interesting.

I, as Chairman of the Committee was most anxious to have Mr. Camp appear before us. As you know, we have invited a series of nationally known communicators and I certainly think he qualifies by those terms. I think regrettably there aren't enough nationally known communicators in Canada. So with that introduction I will simply say welcome. As your brief, which was not requested three weeks in advance, arrived only today, I am afraid the Senators have not had a chance to read it. I would suggest, Mr. Camp, that perhaps you read it now. Then following that we would like to ask you some questions on it and perhaps on other things as well.

Senator Sparrow: Are there copies for distribution now?

The Chairman: I don't think there are.

Mr. Spears: No, there are not, I am sorry.

Mr. Dalton K. Camp: I was always told never to begin with an apology but I will begin with an apology.

For the first time in my life, I left my brief case in Toronto Airport this morning so I will try and skim this as much as I can. I have given it a misleading headline "Another Way of Looking at it", and amended that to read "There Has to Be Another Way of Looking at It." In terms, you know, of such a subjective and personal appraisal of the media.

First of all I would like to say by way of an opening that I think the Committee has served a purpose by providing a forum and focus for critical analysis of Canadian news media.

At the same time, as a result of many of the things that have been said and raised here, it could have created in the country an awareness in the media itself as to the great concern there is among the general public right now, more than ever I would say about the media. A public concern for reasonable and accurate objectivity and fair comment.

It is also possible to believe that as a result of this the relations between the public, journalists and management may ultimately be improved. But anyway, I think it would be unwise not to recognize in North America if not elsewhere the subtly growing adversary relationship between the critical public and the news media.

However, it is also possible to exaggerate, to the point of sanctimony, the degree to which a newspaper holds a public responsibility, or indeed a responsibility of any other kind, to satisfy the standards of a group, even as esteemed as this one, or indeed any other group, as to its performance, although I would like to make a distinction between the print media and the broadcast media in that context.

A daily newspaper is, as it has always been in a free society, a privately-owned property in which the owner or owners have historically possessed an unquestioned right to operate it at a profit, or, if they will, even at a loss. A daily newspaper, as a result, or a natural consequence has always been, and will continue to be, an expression of reportorial caprice, presumption, opinion, bias, misinformation, high editorial winds, and news, most of which is bad.

Notwithstanding, there is no product in our society which provides so much to the individual citizen for a dime. I wrote this before readin the Globe and Mail this morning. Indeed, at today's prices, a newspaper is better value than anything, short of remedial medicine, and it is even cheaper than fresh air.

The genesis of most complaints against newspapers is in the historic mythology which attributes responsibility to the press for which there is no historic example, such as the responsibility to be fair, or objective of factual. A daily newspaper reflects only a hundred or more subjective judgments. I don't know where the phrase came from here, whether I read it or what. However I think it was a story talking about 50,000 men going into the battle and 50,000 different views as to what happened in the battle. Its opinions as expressed in its editorial pages and feature columns, all this is taken together. In view of this subjective commentary, it has always been astonishing to me that the public and politicians have such a touching faith in the effectiveness of the news media. It is an example of the degree to which the illusory power of the printed word leads to unshakable faith.

Most editorial opinion, in the North American press (with the distinguished exception of the press of French Canada), is unsigned. The conventional justification is that the editorial is the centrifuged product of the opinions of the editorial board and not the product of an individual judgment, or that the editorial reflects the view of the publisher, or owner, which, regardless of who writes it, is invariably true.

The fact remains, however, that an editorial written on Biafra, for example, has most likely been ghosted by someone who almost certainly never has been there, and knows nothing—or may know nothing or next to nothing about it—where it is or whose knowledge of the issues might not bear examination.

It has been said before by others, of far greater prominence than I, that you would not trust some publishers and editorial writers as babysitters, much less as authorities on the Middle East, strategic arms limitation talks, or the motivations of American foreign policy.

It is nevertheless difficult, and it is the source of a good deal of the anxiety and complaining to dislodge from the public mind the superstition that newspaper editorials are created by prescient minds of limitless intellectual grasp and expertise.

There are some I think general observations to be made about newspapers, which struck me as a faithful reader for many years, which lead me to the essence of my conclusion about newspapers.

I do not understand why newspapers don't sign their editorials. They zealously identify the opinions and actions of others in their pages to inform their readers more precisely as to the validity of the opinion.

For example, a critic of the tax policy is always recorded as "a stockbroker" or a critic of the Department of Consumer Affairs is "an advertising executive," or a critic of the management of the post office is merely "a housewife".

Newspapers have a passion for this, being convinced that the relevance of what is said or done is overwhelmingly enhanced by parenthetical descriptions of who said or did it. In the result, there is sometimes artificial coloration and latent innuendo, which allow a number of ad hominem editorial asides.

In the 1962 federal election campaign—the Senator may remember this—in an entirely accidental circumstance, an automobile and a child riding on a bicycle collided. No critical injury or damage resulted, no blame was assessed to the driver, and no charge was laid.

The headline as I read it in the Toronto Star, read "Tory Candidate's Car Strikes Liberal Worker's Child." The driver of the car was Mr. John Bassett and the child on the bicycle was the daughter of a Liberal campaign worker. This profoundly convoluted version of the "dog-bites-man" school of journalism offers example of the swift judgments readers are obliged to make as their eyes roam the pages of their newspapers, and the degree to which headlines serve not only to synthesize events, as to story leads, to a point of danger, but they may also suggest hypotheses which are irrelevant.

I think if the newspapers were as zealous in providing the bonafides to the authors and their editorials, for example, and their opinions there could be any of two possible results.

One would be that the editorials would be better assessed as to their true value and the other one might be that the public minds today might be better able to make a judgment which was valuable and less impressed and even less suspicious.

Now, there are a few other examples in this area that I have mentioned which do lead me to make a point. Maybe I will read just one.

Those who deal with the press in their public roles, as politicians or as members of their staff, struggle to determine in the phrase of nuclear strategists, "the maximum acceptable damage" they can endure when they are victimized by sometimes errant and other times malicious reporting.

What redress, or retaliatory capacity can public figures be allowed when, for example, something happens like this.

I am going to read a Canadian Press dispatch dated May 17, 1962, published throughout the country during a federal election campaign:

"By the time Diefenbaker's caravan neared Halifax, it had grown to eighty from ten cars. A truck carrying cables passed 79 cars and tailgated the Prime Minister's car before RCMP cut it out of the procession and arrested the driver, who was in military uniform. Any charge to be laid would be placed today the RCMP said.

"A party official travelling with Mr. Diefenbaker said he was worried by the closeness of the truck. He said the Prime Minister was unaware of the incident."

An alert reader might wonder at the overview of a reporter who could see, from whatever unique vantage, "a truck passing 79 cars" but, as a result, the Canadian Press story triggered at least one editorial, which appeared in the Charlottetown Guardian the following day, May 18:

"...Will the haughty be humbled and brought low on June 18th?...And what about the truck near Halifax which caught up with the motorcade and passed all the cars except Mr. Diefenbaker's? It rode close behind the Prime Minister until a RCMP car cut it out. Two constables pulled the driver from the truck and arrested him.

"But was that the right thing to do? This driver may have been no mortal at all but none other than Nemesis who, in Greek mythology, personifies divine retribution. Sometimes the Nemesis is represented as winged and with the wheel of fortune; or born in a chariot of griffins. But she could very well be driving a truck these days disguised as a man.

"Her special function is to see that no one becomes too fortunate or too much uplifted by his prosperity. "This could bode ill for Mr. Diefenbaker's prospects but it is a theory only."

However, while the Canadian Press story found its way across the country, on the back page of the Halifax Mail-Star, which is the afternoon Halifax paper, this story appeared:

"A truck driven in a peculiar manner followed right behind Prime Minister Diefenbaker's car in Fairview—noted police. The truck was stopped; the driver was arrested. He was identified as Canadian Army Private So and So. This morning he appeared in Magistrate's Court on an impaired driving charge. He pleaded guilty to the offense.. "

In a more recent example, a report in the Globe and Mail of the resignation of a Provincial Cabinet Minister, whom I shall describe as Mr. Blank:

Mr. Blank's departure comes as no surprise to his cabinet colleagues. Informed sources said the Minister requested to be relieved of his responsibilities 10 days to two weeks ago.

"He took a month off, then returned to his duties. Cabinet sources say Mr. Blank had not had a drink since last February 7."

These are not, obviously, unique examples, and in some other opinions they may not even be good ones. But it is the sort of example which many have in their minds when they consider the suggested antidote, a press council.

I would hope the press of Canada will consider this forum as only a sounding board which might produce some evidence as to whether or not, in the self-interest of the press, such an instrument as a press council might be useful.

The laws of libel do protect the private citizen against outrageous attack upon his reputation, personal or professional. Indeed, in our society, the only man who may libel individuals at will is the politician, using the instrument of parliamentary privilege.

The evidence suggests, to me, at least, that a body such as this might consider, in this day and age, the wisdom of allowing politicians this peculiar immunity against the laws of libel.

Perhaps it has become an anachronism. But, so far as the press is concerned, at least to me, there has been some evidence that the law of libel is sometimes a greater inhibition to the press than the public interest might warrant.

I am not suggesting any reforms in the law of libel. What I am suggesting or saying is I would fear that a press council could be another inhibition which would further clutter the judgment of editors and reporters as to the propriety of news and comment.

If there were to be a press council, it must surely be a voluntary undertaking by the press itself. As such, it is difficult to determine which of the two most likely results it would produce—that of being overzealous in its duties, or of being indifferent to them.

I think we tend to examine the problem of print media from the wrong end. I do not believe newspapers need reminding of their responsibilities, as they might be defined, but I do believe that the consumer needs instruction in how to read them.

Surely this is becoming an increasingly apparent need in regards to all the news media: there needs to be a considerably greater public awareness, understanding and scepticism in the common interest of both public and media.

In a society in which children are taught to tie their shoes, wash their hands, look both ways before crossing the streets, and not to touch hot stoves, it is at least as important that they be taught more about the means by which they will acquire information and form opinions which, to a substantial degree, will shape their lives.

Instead, the educational system tends to romanticize the communications media, as the media itself tends to propagandize the young. They come from the school system admiring the technology, awed by the technology, and accepting its product.

One notices, at the university level, young people who have an almost total dependency on the media, yet who suspect much of the information it offers. But it is not suspicion we ought to be producing, but intelligent understanding and a reasonable scepticism.

The harshest critics of the news media are the working journalists themselves. Apart from very realistic complaints as to the salary limits of their occupation, they too complain of the lack of professionalism, of the chronic shortages of news staff on urban dailies; of the growing isolation of their editors from the reality of the news environment; of the unfair working agreements they are obliged to accept which limit their scope and the practice of their craft; of the expanding content of the daily press which is U.S. produced and U.S. oriented; of the lack of lead-time given them to produce meaningful reporting; of the discernible distinctions in professional pride, and in simple competence, between practicing journalists who love their craft and many of their contemporaries who see it only as a way-station to higher incomes in public relations, or higher status as government propagandists.

It is easier to see the Dalai Lama than it is for some reporters to see their own editors, (much less editors to be seen by the public) and this estrangement between the working level and management adds to the problems of working newsmen.

When it is recognized that at least one Toronto daily newspaper has today the same number of reporters in its newsroom as it employed ten years ago, one recognizes the increasing difficulties in covering the news, much less finding and interpreting it.

This is not to say that there are not editors of awesome competence and of high professional standard, nor competent reporters to serve them. As a commercial insert, I think it could be said, if anyone were to stop and think about it that no press in the world serves its readers as well considering the size of our country and the population and so faithfully.

What it all comes down to is the fact that the newspaper serves a very special role in Canada. It has been sheltered I think in Parliament from takeover or alien influence; it is the only media in Canada which is judged by its consumers in purely Canadian terms, in that the criteria of a good newspaper is judged by Canadian standards or by Canadian criteria. For other media, the criteria are international, or continental.

There has been a tendency, at least until the advent of competitive news media, for the press to be smug, intolerant of criticism, resentful of private complaint to the point of sanctimony. Perhaps that day is past. The press needs critics, as does any institution of society, not to threaten its freedom but to serve as someone said, as "the eel at the bottom of a fish barrel: to keep them all awake."

As a Maritimer, I have been interested in the Committee's close examination of media in New Brunswick. For a time, I suspected that the Committee might not have any other purpose.

The daily newspapers of New Brunswick have improved more in the past 10 years than the press from any other comparable region. The Daily Gleaner, prior to its purchase by Brigadier Wardell, was an outrage to journalism. It was probably the only newspaper in Canada in which the disinterest of the publisher was fully matched by the boredom of its readers.

After Mr. Wardell assumed responsibility for the Gleaner, it began to acquire a resemblance to a daily newspaper. It manifested a lively interest in the community, embarked on a number of editorial crusades reflecting the special interests of the province and the Atlantic area. If its opinions were often stringent, not to say asserted, at least they were opinions and as such invoked community interest, involvement, discussion and debate.

Fredericton had never known a newspaper like it or, more properly, Fredericton had never known what a newspaper was like. The Gleaner became a reasonable facsimile.

Like his former employer, Lord Beaverbrook, Mr. Wardell believes in personal journalism, and in the inalienable right of newspaper owners to use their papers to advance their personal interests and views.

Some of Mr. Wardell's views are constant—a nostalgic fondness for the British connection, Maritime Rights, and New Brunswick potatoes, for example—and none of these are likely to be alien to the opinions of the majority of his readers.

Other of Mr. Wardell's opinions are less fixed and the basis for them more difficult to fathom, and perhaps more controversial. It has been said that one could determine the editorial policy of the Daily Gleaner in many areas of dispute by taking a slow walk through the printing plant.

There is, of course, a familiar question of the chicken and the egg—whether it was, for example, the Conservative Government's orders for expensive travel brochures in the printing plant which were the eggs that hatched the editorial chickens in the Gleaner supporting the Government. Perhaps it was the other way round. But we do know that when the Government was defeated, much against the Gleaner's advice, the printing orders ceased to flow while the editorial criticism against the Robichaud Government escalated to astonishing heights.

Even so, I must argue, the Daily Gleaner is, or has been, Mr. Wardell's to do with as he sees fit, which means he may keep it, sell it, raffle it off, or raze it to the ground. This is precisely what I take to mean "a free press" in that it has the singular right to exist subject to the sufferance of its subscribers, advertisers and bankers, and to be as serviceable in the community as its publisher would interpret such a duty, subject to the cavil of a body such as this Committee, the complaints of others, and the degree to which these might bear influence.

Newspapers, least of all among our institutions, can be measured against perfection. What the critics of Mr. Wardell's version of the Daily Gleaner have forgotten, or never knew, was the deplorable quality of its predecessor. In short, while the Daily Gleaner could, by the judgment of some, become a "better" newspaper, it used to be, by any judgment, a good deal worse.

The worst that could happen to the Gleaner would be that it revert to its former self, and the next worse that it would be sold off to one of the chains where, one would fear, the crusading zeal of its publisher would be replaced by the ordered passions of a bookkeeper. Should the Gleaner become a part of the newspaper empire of Mr. K. C. Irving, if it is not already, it would at least retain its New Brunswick essence. It might also be liberated from Mr. Wardell's concern—the obsessive financial demands imposed upon him which have so closely bound the Gleaner in some instances, I believe, to his printing enterprise.

Even so, the Gleaner is not the only publication in Canada, nor Mr. Wardell the only proprietor, who must bear the burden of considering the consequences for better or ill, of his paper's policy where, in the world of politics and journalism, vengeance and retaliation are no strangers.

The Telegraph-Journal does provide in New Brunswick the most complete coverage of provincial news, as such, and its coverage of provincial politics is measurably greater—and better—than it has ever been.

Senator McElman will recall the newspaper's editorials of past years, of unsurpassed vacuity. It is now possible to read editorial opinion in the Telegraph-Journal, sometimes vigorously stated and unmistakably declaratory.

There were many who deplored the Irving Press for its lack of opinion, once it began to express some, and there were many who found its opinion not merely hostile but monopolistic. This is the case with medical schools or television stations. The criteria for a good daily newspaper is not simply the need for one, but the economics of providing one.

Newspapers to be economic, not to say efficient, today seem to need to co-exist with other enterprises, or as part of a media complex, or as a member of a chain. They rarely exist in themselves, and their owners are seldom paupers. If horse racing be the sport of kings, publishing has become the sport of tycoons.

The presence of a newspaper monopoly in New Brunswick, at least in the English-language market, is held by some to be sinister. I suspect this concern is excessive. It is remarkable to find, anywhere on this continent, much less in New Brunswick, a population of 620,000 people serviced by six newspapers. New Brunswick may have perhaps more daily newspapers per capita than any state or province on the continent, other than an obvious exception, Prince Edward Island. The economics apparently allow for it, and perhaps it is only the monopoly which perpetuates it.

It should not be held that monopolistic growth in newspaper ownership is less hazardous to the public health if it is very thinly spread. If men are allowed to own more than one newspaper, they must be allowed to own them wherever they wish to acquire them. As to their reasons and purposes for doing so, we can only mark the growing affinity between newsprint, oil, money and monopoly and accept the constant possibility of a conflict of interest between the publisher and those of the public as a natural phenomenon.

Criticisms of Mr. Irving's monopoly are late in coming and some may say better late than never. However, curiously when his newspapers had no opinions he had no vocal detractors and now that he has opinions he is a monopolist and a pollutant.

Mr. Irving achieved his media dominance in New Brunswick through a combination of his own initiative and in cooperation with the Government of Canada and its agencies. As regards the latter, the public interest was present and presumably considered. Thus, the Government of Canada has been either an accomplice or accessory.

It is worthy to note here that the two provinces of Canada, New Brunswick and Newfoundland, in the greatest need of national broadcast media such as the CBC, were the last to get it and the reasons for it may intrigue this Committee as much as they have others.

Most important in all this, is that no one should create the impression—it would be unwise I think to create the impression—that there is a challenge to the right of a free press as a private property. For Government to abuse it, or muster public opinion against it, or subsidize any competing interest would be, in my view, a dangerous and insupportable regression.

I know the argument about freedom of the press and a free society but there is no example where there is a free press and not a free society. Where there is a free society, there is a free press. In a free society, the free press is the creation of the free society. It is not the other way round.

A few words about magazines. I hope that the decision as to the special status conferred upon Time and Reader's Digest which in one industry or one activity or another I have known a good deal about will be declared finally and irrevocably irreversible. The tribulations of the Canadian magazine industry have not been substantially influenced by the presence of these two publications. The difficulties, in my experience, have been created by competitive media, not by competitive magazines.

One might put the problem inversely: a substantial portion of the advertising revenues enjoyed by Canadian magazines are produced from liquor and tobacco. Liquor advertising has been subject to random provincial strictures, which diminish the usefulness of newspapers, and by the limitations of television, where it is not permitted at all. Magazines have been the beneficiary, as they will continue to be.

There has been a shift of cigarette advertising, except to the Reader's Digest which will not accept it, to the magazine media which except for Time and Reader's Digest have had the least to say of all the media about the relationship between cigarette smoking and cancer. It has found a temporary haven, so to speak.

The real point is, unfortunately, that Canadian readers are so catholic in their interests and tastes that they judge magazines in the context of a North American market. It may be unfair, but inevitable. The newsstands of Canada are like a window proclaiming the foreign dominance of the magazine industry.

Advertising regulations will not solve the problem, nor will subsidies. Instead, I suspect a Canadian magazine industry can best survive, as do the newspapers, by serving exclusively local markets and special Canadian interests.

The Committee may, however, and it may have already done so, wish to inquire into the related matter of newsstand distributors who make fateful, arbitrary and discriminatory decisions to the detriment of Canadian publications. The marketplace as anyone can see is flooded with American periodicals, many of them of the worst kind. American publications of a similar breed bury from sight Canadian magazines, periodicals and publications.

The Americanization and cartelization of this aspect of the publishing industry appears to have escaped public notice and perhaps it should.

As with Canadian magazines, Canadian television, to a substantial degree exists in a continentalist environment. Even if there were no solutions to the problem of Canadian content, it is important that the Canadian viewer understand the very real difficulties in this circumstance, especially as they apply to public affairs and news.

The problem with Canadian public affairs is content, which is a way of saying the problem is talent, which is another way of saying the problem is money. There must be a reason why public affairs television presents so much that is trivial, so much that is an echo of American events, so much that is shallow, or that is a mystery of irrelevance.

One reason, of course, is that public affairs rises out of news, and news is not a national property, but international. With very rare exceptions, the Canadian television networks lack the personnel for such a purpose as, of course, they lack the means. Anyone within range of the American television networks and in the habit of watching their network newscasts will, of course, note, if he also watches the later Canadian national newscast, the redundancy of material, in fact the identity of much of the material. Television is perhaps singular in that it reproduces substantial segments of American news, but provides no accommodating commentary to give it Canadian relevance as do newspapers. Canadian coverage of American events is, of course, painfully thin and, even without economic considerations, there are substantial difficulties.

Canadian public affairs programming tends to be imitative of similar programs in the United States, but in a particular way and for a particular reason. Black panthers, overheated student activists, flat-worlders, and other kindred spirits find their way into Canadian public affairs broadcasts precisely because they are so easily available, so highly visible, and so economically feasible. Because they are, a special relationship develops between those in the North American community with extremist views who need media attention and those in the media who need program material. They are, so to speak, made for each other.

Similarly, if one cannot conveniently or easily find an American extremist, one can at least find a Canadian counterpart. In the rush and pressure to fill a public affairs program to entertain if not to enlighten, or to provoke if not to inform, the values of confrontation, and sometimes simple rudeness, overcome the need for objectivity and the presentation of issues in some reasonable depth.

Public affairs has been, I think, or is a suspect for a great deal of regional alienation that exists in this country. Because budgets are so restrictive, it is obvious to the discerning viewer of Canadian public affairs broadcast that in frequent desperation the producers must broadcast their mistakes, their failures. To an alarming degree, it is not the audience which is primarily the consideration, but the accountants.

The networks have dutifully allocated prime time to public affairs and news. There is no question about the task that has been awarded. In that context, of course, it has been their clear responsibility to the public to do so because no part of their programming can be considered any more important. They have not, however, committed the funds nor the personnel to the enterprise.

One has a legitimate fear that with the irrepressible growth of cable, Canadian television audiences—which is almost everyone—will develop the same appetite for American news and public affairs programming that it now has for American magazines.

In the struggle to maintain Canadian content, the line ought to be drawn here in this area of public information. While I believe the competition in television news between the two networks has been in the public interest, certainly the CBC has removed a fair percentage of the paranoia about the bias or the alleged bias of the CBC. This competition is going to be illusory if, in the end, the audience for such programs becomes fragmented by the multiplicity of channels and, as well, by an inferior product.

It may be best to hope that the public network, the CBC, will command sufficient national concern and interest to allow it to produce public affairs programming of a standard to satisfy public acceptance in a highly competitive medium.

Money is simply the first imperative. Canadians have a right to know what is going on in their own country and they must also of necessity know of events elsewhere. In this latter regard, more and more Canadians are finding this information through the American media. This need not be so and ought not to be so unless, of course, we are to offer up by default yet another responsibility of public programming on the public air.

The Chairman: Thank you. That is a very thoughtful presentation and one which I think will lead to any number of questions. I will only ask perhaps one or two and then I would like to turn to some of the Senators. But if I might ask a couple which perhaps don't relate directly to the brief and yet, I suppose in a sense they do.

You are a columnist—I think you write weekly in the Toronto Telegram and I am not sure of other papers as well but I think you have one of the Toronto papers...

Mr. Camp: And the Halifax papers...

The Chairman: Well, in any event, in your January 26th column you began thusly and I quote:

"The press has taken the freshly anointed Quebec leader Robert Bourrasa to its ink-stained bosom."

What precisely did you mean? Were you attributing Mr. Bourrasa's election to the press?

Mr. Camp: No, far from it.

The Chairman: I don't mean the election...

Mr. Camp: No, I think it is easy to tell, Senator, when people are involved in politics long enough and therefore are obsessive readers of the press when a bandwagon begins to move. I think the coverage, for example, of that event, particularly by the television networks was not very good coverage, not very informed coverage. However, there is no question that feats of prowess were attributed to Mr. Bourrasa—who I want to say I personally find attractive and intelligent and a welcome addition to the political field—that were completely undocumented by evidence.

The second thing on this, and I think the reason I was provoked to say it, is that one of the problems with the media is that it makes the Union Nationale alien to everyone in Canada. I don't know the reasons for this; I can think of a lot of possible reasons. However, it seems to me that where you have a two-party system in Quebec that the same tolerance and respect, and let's say on questions of doubt, ought to be allowed both parties.

I think it is true to say that Mr. Lesage was not any less adventuresome in terms of the confederation issue than was his successor. In fact, in many ways he was more so. But one of the difficulties which I think is creating a great deal of attention in Canada is the way in which the press seems to me to be incessantly critical, even paranoid, of the Union Nationale. The benefit of all doubt is always given to the other side, I really don't know—I don't say this in a partisan sense at all—I say it in terms of a concern in western Canada where very little is known about the politics of Quebec.

One thing they do know is that the Union Nationale is bad and labour is good. That I think is the genesis of that statement.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps I could come from there to a more general statement which I think bears on the discussion and perhaps you could look at this with me. This was a column which appeared in the Globe and Mail in Toronto some time in January by J. Patrick Boyer, who is the 24 year old son of an Ontario Conservative Cabinet Minister. And he said in part and I would like to quote him to get your comments...

"First, effective opposition is being played by the news media. That is so because the media have speed, have information and have a publicly accepted objectivity that political parties don't. Since we are not the majority party in Canada, we have been spending most of our time as the main opposition party and not the governing party. Now, with the primacy of communications and the ascendancy into active politics the news media, we are losing our traditional role, our rationale even as an opposition party. We are being displaced."

Then he goes on to say...

"A similar situation exists at Queens Park, not surprisingly, where we are the majority and the governing party. The opposition parties are frequently overshadowed and outdone, in terms of providing effective opposition, by the news media—which upset some of our members when they watch TV or read page 7 interpreters which are strongly critical. They simply don't recognize that, at the same time, opposition in the Legislature is fragmented, superficial and desperate—as at Ottawa."

Do the media have that kind of power?

Mr. Camp: Well, I think the media have enormous influence in the shaping of popular political issues. I don't think there is any question about that. I don't think we could have made pollution an issue without the press. The press these days of course, covers issues or reports on issues and develops issues in almost a cursory sense.

I was concerned for example, talking to editors of Canadian newspapers—I struck a common chord. For example, Claude Ryan said that Le Devoir was withdrawing its permanent gallery representative and others told me that they detected among their readers a decline of interest in news coming out of Parliament.

That the hot news so to speak was news triggered by local issues, local committees, local groups of citizens and so on which is outside the optical system. That is not quite Mr. Bauer's point...

The Chairman: Not quite, no.

Mr. Camp: But I think that an opposition party to a considerable degree responds to issues which it finds response to in the press. I don't think it is the other way round.

For example, the White Paper—took it down to cases. The leader of the opposition in Ottawa has made a number of statements critical of the White Paper but, you know, there seems to be a need to hang something on it like a crusade and to embark on a national tour before what he said in the House of Commons some months ago could be fully reported in the press. You have to, it seems to me, with regard to the issues these days put a show on the road because putting it in Parliament doesn't seem to produce the results.

As far as public attention is concerned, public attention solely relies on the media.

The Chairman: Is the Parliamentary Press Gallery more interested in personalities than issues?

Mr. Camp: Well, they are certainly interested in personalities and I think their readers are. Now, maybe their readers have been shaped that way. There is no question that television, for example, responds more to the accident of personality than to issues. Hopefully you can combine both, but where that is not a prospect then there is a response to what I would say would be the accident of personality in television.

The Chairman: Which comes first, the issue or the personality? Or, is that a chicken and egg situation?

Mr. Camp: It is a chicken and egg situation. I think most of us feel that issues can be escalated now and be more and more rapidly advanced to the public attention, but they are accompanied by personalities that satisfy the demands of the media.

I think it is not too far from evidence that has been given here.

The Chairman: Yes. Do some of the Senators have questions that they would like to ask? If not I would like to proceed just for a moment to your section on magazines.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, before you do that I wonder if Mr. Camp would like to comment—do you believe that the Parliamentary Press Gallery gives an adequate report of what goes on in Parliament?

Mr. Camp: I think it has to make two kinds of judgments. It has to make a simple news judgment or an editorial judgment and it has to make a judgment as to what will interest the public.

The essential thing here, I think, is the fact that the media has grown in its reach faster and is stronger and more influential than the public capacity to measure it. I think the degree to which you have a more critical public and the public more aware of professional journalistic standards is the degree to which you get a better media. As a result, a simple answer to the question is hard to come by. I depend on them for my understanding of what goes on in parliament the same as anybody else does, except you. By what you read in the paper, I get the impression that it is a pretty quiet place.

The Chairman: Off the subject—it is on the subject but somewhat off the subject of our discussion or study—you don't read Hansard on a daily basis?

Mr. Camp: Yes, I do.

The Chairman: Does that, Senator Macdonald, answer your question?

Senator Macdonald: Well, I can say...

Mr. Camp: Well, for example, the reporters—not in the gallery here but elsewhere—tell me they would rather not come here. These are metropolitan daily newspaper reporters in the metropolitan areas and they don't want to go to Queen's Park either, because they think there is more scope for them in general reporting and more satisfaction.

Senator Macdonald: Well, you must have noticed many times, say in the House of Commons, that once the question period is over there is an exodus of press gallery reporters and perhaps just one or two remaining.

Mr. Camp: I do it myself.

Senator Macdonald: You infer from that they are only trying to dramatize something and they are not trying to get at any general issues, just something which would dramatize a particular point.

Mr. Camp: Senator, let me answer that question by not answering. I think it would be helpful if television were allowed in the House of Commons. The public today can see almost any thing in the world that is happening from the crowning of a monarch to people being butchered in Vietnam. The only thing they are not allowed to see is what is going on in their own parliament.

The Chairman: You would think for example that the hearings of this Committee should be televised?

Mr. Camp: Certainly.

The Chairman: There are some of us who agree with you and there are others that don't.

Senator Macdonald: Just to carry the step a little further...

Mr. Camp: I think that is where television ought to be, if you are asking an opinion, in the Committees. The difficulty is that everybody knows private members of parliament live a very unhappy life.

Senator Macdonald: What about the news report that say that the CBC should televise from Parliament?

Mr. Camp: Well, it has changed, hasn't it. It has become highly personalized and it has moved into the corridors or whatever it has moved to—it is hit and run—30 seconds. I think people ought to be entitled to something better than that, some greater depth in coverage.

I think on balance I would have to say that the coverage of issues that you get out of Washington, because you often get into the environment of the event itself, involves listeners more and interests viewers more than does this present sort of ad hoc silence that we have.

There is more depth to it; there is more texture to it. On the other hand, I would think that as a rough guess that Parliament is undercovered. I don't think the regional members get enough voice. I think that television creates the impression that there is only a couple of people here—the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Camp, do they do a better job in Washington than they do here. They don't cover congress, do they?

Mr. Camp: No, but they cover the Committees.

Senator Beaubien: They cover Committees?

Mr. Camp: Yes. I think you get as a result of that greater focus, greater depth, more variety of comment, more balanced views if you like. It is a darn sight more interesting...

The Chairman: I think it should be said in fairness here that the fault is more with the politicians than with the media. Would you agree with that?

Mr. Camp: I think the politicians should be aware of it.

Senator Beaubien: But the media is always keen on it?

Mr. Camp: I don't think there is any reluctance on the part of the media.

The Chairman: No, I think it is the fault of the politicians.

Senator Macdonald: You mentioned unsigned editorials so the reader can't judge who wrote it. Would you go further, Mr. Camp, and say that a news story should be signed? It was stated here many times that there is no such thing as objective reporting. So if there is no objective reporting, don't you think that the reader has the right to know who wrote the story so he can draw his own conclusions?

For example, you write a column and I know what your political views are and some of the others—I know what their political views are, but they try to say they are objective and they are not. Don't you think all news items should be signed by whoever wrote it?

Mr. Camp: I think there is an added thing. I think in terms of foreign news, in terms of, as the previous group were talking about, religion and education, I think there are reporters who require—who acquire and deserve a reputation in these fields and I think they are entitled to the distinction of their by-line.

Now, I am not suggesting that they don't get it because as far as I know they do. All television journalism is of course personalized as with the pure reading of the news.

Certainly a by-line does help one reading a metropolitan newspaper, a home newspaper, to make some assessment of the value of the story because you become familiar with the author and some of them have a familiarity and knowledge of a subject which earns your respect.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: Not having a copy of the brief which you referred to or remarked from, you seemed to infer that newspaper publishers should in no way be interfered with.

They should have entire freedom and they should be able to do what they please and to what they wish regardless of what they do.

You continued to say that rather than doing anything with them you educate the reader to look at it another way. First of all the time element of educating the reader would appear to me to be almost an insurmountable problem.

You inferred also that a publisher has some public responsibility to the people. We expect it in other corporations with good corporate citizenship and this type of thing, but from your remarks it appeared that you didn't think this was true from a publisher's point of view.

Mr. Camp: Yes, that would be a correct interpretation of my own position, Senator. We all know, I think, or some know the degree to which in the broadcast field there are political pressures on the owners and operators of that media. There are some cases, and could be in other cases and I have known them to be politicized.

Now, I think you have to live with that evil or the prospect of that evil and recognize it for what it is because indeed the error belongs to the people. Therefore, Parliament has a responsibility. Therefore, there is a political responsibility.

I wouldn't like to see that, anything resembling that in newspapers. I would rather have some bad newspapers and some wicked publishers. But the thing that concerned me in the magazine industry, when there was political pressure and perhaps there still is, was the degree to which I felt the magazines were being politicized.

For example, a magazine which was under pressure of the government was gauche enough to send a cheque to a Cabinet Minister as a contribution to his campaign which startled him and he sent it back. Now, I don't think that that was a singular incident but I think it is an example of the kind of thing which can happen with the print media.

I think it is very dangerous and I would like to avoid it at all costs. I think it is safer to take the view that a free society can stand a free press and the degree to which it is responsible or irresponsible is a matter of their judgment and not a political judgment.

Senator Sparrow: Well, I don't want to disagree with you, but I will ask this question. Are you saying that in a particular publication for a particular publisher in a particular city, let him go off half-cocked for whatever the case may be, but following it further, with the ownership being restricted to a few, if it was restricted on a national basis to this type of publisher that you are referring to, can you not foresee a danger in that and perhaps a greater danger in some political control or governmental control or pressures?

Mr. Camp: I think I would be inclined to wait for the danger. You see, the fact is, that despite all the talk about the free press, it is free on sufferance as is everybody else.

If the Parliament of Canada decides that everybody who has blue eyes has to pay a higher tax than everybody with brown eyes, that is the law of the land. But in the present circumstances I think that it is safer and wiser to allow the press its present freedom. I think it is very dangerous to threaten it in any way.

The Chairman: Well, let me follow up Senator Sparrow's question and put a hypothetical question to you if I may?

Mr. Camp: Yes.

The Chairman: You used the phrase that you could tolerate and I made a note of your words, bad newspapers and wicked publishers. Now, I want to underline and stress that this is a hypothetical question but suppose in a city the size of Edmonton...

Senator Prowse: Which has a good newspaper.

The Chairman: And which has a good newspaper. In the Edmonton retail trading zone, I think there are approximately 800,000—and there is only one newspaper in a monopoly situation, in a big market—supposing that newspaper were owned by a wicked publisher, to use your words, and was or has become a bad newspaper. What would you do about it?

Mr. Camp: I wouldn't be excessively concerned.

The Chairman: You would be if you lived in Edmonton, I would submit.

Mr. Camp: Senator, I think the situation is far safer, far less open to peril because of the competitive situation of the media.

The Chairman: But I have used the example...

Mr. Camp: Well, I am sorry, I don't want to interrupt. It is the only newspaper there, but it is not the only source of news. It is not the only media that provides the essential service of news and information.

Fifty years ago when the situation was much worse oddly enough, perhaps by coincidence, so were the newspapers.

The Chairman: It strains my imagination to think that you...

Mr. Camp: Of all people...

The Chairman: Of all people, right. You, of all people, would do nothing about a bad newspaper with a wicked publisher in a large city. I think you would.

Mr. Camp: As a government?

The Chairman: Well, all right, as a government. I am asking as a person, of course, but either way?

Mr. Camp: As a person, I would cancel my subscription. I would mount the platform and demand as much public attention as I could against it and I would get a mimeograph machine in the basement. But as a government I would find it difficult to act in a situation which you allow the press to be free within the laws of libel and so on.

Then, you reserve the judgment to say that you are a bad publisher and so on.

The Chairman: I don't want to paint myself into a corner incidentally of advocating some kind of government activity in this situation.

I would point out to you that you have made the point rather eloquently in your brief that one thing that should be done is the upgrading.

Senator Sparrow's question about educating the readers of the newspapers. The very fact that you mentioned the point indicates to me that you think those readers need education.

Sure, you, Dalton Camp, might mount the platform and start a campaign, but I would suggest to you that perhaps the average reader would not.

I suggest to you that he might just suffer. Is that a fair comment?

Mr. Camp: Not talking about wickedness and so on, but I think there are some newspapers in Canada who are suffering right now.

The Chairman: I was going to ask you, do you think there are some bad newspapers in Canada?

Mr. Camp: Not in the wicked sense.

The Chairman: No, I didn't say wicked publishers. I said bad newspapers.

Mr. Camp: I think there are some standards which could provide a better service.

The Chairman: You think the standards are uneven across the country?

Mr. Camp: Yes, and they have to be I am afraid by economics.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to ask you about that, but perhaps we will go to Senator Everett's supplementary question.

Senator Everett: Well, I am not so sure that it really follows...

The Chairman: Please go ahead.

Senator Everett: I was just wondering in this situation of a bad newspaper and/or a wicked newspaper, owner or publisher—One of the things we are told time and time again is that there is no way of starting a competitive newspaper because there just isn't enough money available.

Now, I suppose there is an example in Quebec—one in Montreal and one in Quebec City where newspapers have been started with particular emphasis on the sports scene and I suppose the unions in Vancouver started a newspaper, but is there anything in your mind that should be done to correct that situation in the case of a bad newspaper?

You say that you would go out and get the mimeograph machine, but can you think of anything you might recommend?

Mr. Camp: Well, Senator, the only thing I wouldn't recommend is that the decision be left to government because I think that would be establishing a precedent that the society might come to regret.

Not only would you have the possibility of wickedness with the publishers, but you have the possibility of wickedness with the government.

The Chairman: That is an equally hypothetical observation!

Mr. Camp: Of course it is. I didn't mean to discount the degree to which people outside the Committee would encourage competition and quite legitimately. But, for example, if the government of Canada were to say in the event of an unsatisfactory newspaper, "We will subsidize competition", I would consider that to be government intervention in regard to freedom of the press.

I would consider it in that regard to be a dangerous precedent.

Senator Everett: And you feel that is true no matter how general that subsidization is? Some people have suggested that there be a form of a three year tax holiday on new newspapers and that sort of thing?

Mr. Camp: Yes, I would consider it so, Senator. I would consider it potentially for allowing for possible intimidation. I think it is intimidating in itself.

You know, the tradition of the free press, without sounding to rhetorical about it in my opinion and in our society is something that deserves to live on, that the isolated or hypothetical example of the bad publisher simply won't, survive, being mortal. I think you have to run some of these risks. I think you have to entertain the prospects of some risks like that.

Senator Everett: And in your mind competition is not an element of the assurance of a good press?

Mr. Camp: I think the competition, Senator, now is multi-media. It isn't necessarily newspapers. The media have reacted on one another in a competitive way. When you consider the number of newspapers that can survive in New York City you wonder at the number of newspapers that are still surviving in Canada. Again, without being all concerned about it, the quality of the newspapers they are supplying in Canada.

Senator Everett: Do you then feel that the quality of the newspaper has been heightened by the competition with radio and television?

Mr. Camp: Yes, I think it has improved the standard of journalism, I think generally. I think probably in many different ways. I think newspaper men themselves have options they didn't have before.

It has broadened the field of journalism.

Senator Everett: What do you mean by "options they didn't have before"?

Mr. Camp: Well, they have the option of not only their local newspapers but they have the option of their local radio station and local television stations.

Senator Everett: You mean they could work there?

Mr. Camp: They have some mobility which they never had before. As well of course there is the higher expectation on the part of the reader to what the publisher wants to produce and I think this is a good thing. It used to be you know, that the Fredericton Gleaner wouldn't publish the radio schedule of the local radio station because they felt that threatened by the competitive media.

Now, of course, they do.

The Chairman: We don't want to spin this thing about bad newspapers out endlessly but conceding your point about government involvement for purposes of this discussion and for perhaps more than purposes of this discussion, what do you think a Committee like this could do or should do about newspapers which are not providing an adequate service in their communities?

Mr. Camp: Well, I think you already have. I think the Committee has provided a forum and a focus—and a national forum for a great deal of complaints, some of which are legitimate about the condition of the press in various parts of the country. There are people who have been vocalized, shall we say by the fact of this Committee, no doubt they should speak out and now feel a little more freer in doing so.

The Chairman: Beyond that you think there is nothing we can do?

Mr. Camp: In my judgment, no, sir.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could introduce a very short discussion of magazines which you have dealt with in your brief and they are on our minds because we have been dealing with magazines for the last several weeks.

I note you think that the special status for Time and Readers' Digest should become irreversible, irrevocable and I forget the other words you used. Is that a new position for you?

Mr. Camp: No.

The Chairman: You took that position at the time, did you?

Mr. Camp: I was pleased to see Senator O'Leary come over to my point of view on that.

The Chairman: Well, I was going to ask you about that. Throughout your paper, and I had the advantage of being able to read along with you when you were reading it, there is a sense of concern if I could use that phrase about Canada. You are clearly a Canadian—I don't want to say nationalist...

Mr. Camp: I don't mind.

The Chairman: Well, either do I in describing myself so let me just describe you as a Canadian nationalist.

As a Canadian nationalist, do you regard Time as a Canadian magazine?

Mr. Camp: No, not at all. What the O'Leary Commission did, Senator, was stop them at the pass. Not Time and not Reader's Digest, but I know for a fact stopped it Newsweek.

The Chairman: You know that for a fact?

Mr. Camp: Yes. It also created the environment that allowed, I think, and made more permissive and easy to achieve the business whereby we could stop the split-run problem which I think had tremendous implications for Canada and Canadian magazines.

I think that achievement was considerable and I am satisfied that it shouldn't have gone any further than that.

The Chairman: Did we discourage Time from doing split-runs inside of Canada now?

Mr. Camp: Well, there again, the government has patriated Time here, has given it a special status and it is entitled, I think, to all the privileges of any other magazines.

The Chairman: Do you read Time?

Mr. Camp: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: What do you think of the Canadian section?

Mr. Camp: I prefer the rest of the magazine. I don't depend on the Canadian section of Time for anything of importance. I think it is entertaining, but you see the problem with Time magazine is that it does serve a purpose in Canada.

It serves a purpose to advertisers in Canada and there can't be any question about that. That is not a good enough reason to sustain it but I think that the magazine has not been responsible for the damage to the magazine industry, but the magazine industry once insisted that it did.

In my own judgment it was never a case of advertising in Maclean's for example or Time magazine. I don't think we ever had to make that judgment. I can't think of an advertising decision that affected Time magazine—that if Time magazine hadn't been there—I would have automatically turned to Maclean's. It was in that environment that that decision was made.

The Chairman: You say, and I am quoting you:

"I suspect a Canadian magazine industry can best survive, as do the newspapers, by serving exclusively local markets and special Canadian interests."

Now, as someone who I am sure has a special knowledge and a special interest in the Canadian magazine industry, has that begun to happen now in your opinion?

Mr. Camp: I hope so. I think maybe Toronto Life is an example of a special magazine.

The Chairman: Maclean's when they were here represented themselves as a special Canadian magazine and a special interest magazine with a special interest with Canada.

Were they being fair to themselves?

Mr. Camp: Well, that is everybody's special interest. I think the national magazines here and in the United States are going to be in some chronic difficulty. The only thing that I can see that would change that would be broadband television which would give the advertiser then another kind of judgment to make. You have broadband television or multi-channel television, nobody is ever going to pay the television price for a fifth of the market of New Brunswick for example, I wouldn't think, not at the cost of which it would have to be.

The Chairman: You are really saying more specialized and more localized there?

Mr. Camp: Yes. If the pattern in the United States were to change and if Life Magazine for example, was in trouble Maclean's has got to have some difficulties.

The Chairman: Well, when Time was here, they assured us that Life wasn't in trouble. Contrary to popular impressions I agree, but you are thinking of the article in New York Magazine and so on?

Mr. Camp: Well, I was just thinking of the magazine. You can pick up the magazine and practically carry it in your vest pocket.

Senator Sparrow: Did you say that you would not like to see the privileges that are extended to Time and Reader's Digest extended to other publications such as Newsweek?

The Chairman: That question was put, but carry on.

Senator Sparrow: Did you say that?

Mr. Camp: I said, Senator, that the O'Leary Commission stopped Newsweek at the border and I am glad that it did. I think that if you did continentalize the whole magazine industry, then it would be disastrous.

Senator Sparrow: So stay where we are, is that what you are saying?

Mr. Camp: Yes, sir.

The Chairman: Exactly where we are as I understand it?

Mr. Camp: Yes.

Senator Everett: What do you think the future is then of television if we are moving towards multi-channel operations?

Mr. Camp: Well, I am told, Senator, that multi-channel operation as envisaged will be on a first come, first served basis. If you have broadband television, the first consequences would be the destruction of the network. There would be no reason for a network—no economic reason for the networks.

The practicality of the networks would simply just disappear.

Senator Everett: Why, wouldn't the networks distribute the programs?

Mr. Camp: Oh, yes, but let's see if we can try and stay on micro-waves. If you have in every television home in Canada somewhere between six channels and 30 and you have two networks buying programs on the North American market and distributing to a sixth or thirtieth of the Canadian market the whole economic structure that allows the network is damaged, because, as I said earlier, I don't think anybody wants to buy a thirtieth of Winnipeg or a sixth of Moncton or a tenth of Charlottetown, but it is economic now to buy a sixth of Toronto, for example.

Senator Everett: Well, in radio you quite often find yourself in that position?

Mr. Camp: Radio?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Camp: But, Senator, network radio went with the dodo for that very reason. I think that local television will go the way of local radio in that it will have the same community identity and community interest and the same retail volume. But you have to, it seems to me, have a policy which at the present Mr. Juneau seems to be buying, where you have to put some sanctions on this thing. You can't allow unlimited television channels, not unless you are prepared to pack up your networks as in the case of radio.

Senator Everett: Did this cause the pack-up of the networks in radio?

Mr. Camp: Yes, I think you could say that. We still have one fortunately. You have the same radio network system as the television system—ABC, NBC, CBS and...

Senator Everett: And NBC have two of them?

The Chairman: Yes, two.

Mr. Camp: When you have 16 radio stations on the band, then the networks no longer exist and the advertiser simply buys by station, by market.

Senator Everett: Well, would this be a good thing?

Mr. Camp: Well, for this country, I think it would be a very bad thing.

Senator Everett: A very bad thing?

Mr. Camp: Yes.

Senator Everett: Why?

Mr. Camp: Well, in spite of what I said about television, about news and public affairs, I think that if you for example, if you left Toronto fully in the hands of two local stations without a national service supplying it that 80 per cent of the population would be watching the American networks.

Now, I would consider that a bad thing; I would consider that as serious as having a total loss of a Canadian environment to television. Canadian news environment, the Canadian public affairs environment. This is tenuous enough right now but if that audience continues to be fragmented then I would be very concerned.

Senator Everett: So you see as the only solution—it would be a very meaningful restriction on the granting of licences—continuing restrictions?

Mr. Camp: Yes, sir. I don't see how you can say to people who live in Calgary and Edmonton or Moose Jaw or anywhere else that it is feasible that some Canadians can have five channels and other Canadians can only have two.

I think politically, I don't think that is a possible solution, but I do think that when you have that cable television you can insist upon prime time hours in which there is Canadian content with Canadian programs and Canadian presence.

The Chairman: The Committee is meeting tonight at eight o'clock and so therefore I would like to adjourn at six.

Senator McElman: Mr. Camp, as one who participated last Saturday in the festival along with Mr. Laurier LaPierre and Mr. T. C. Douglas, would you share the opinion that has been widely broadcast by Mr. LaPierre that the media did a very bad job in covering this?

Mr. Camp: No, sir. I made no evaluation of it, partly because I was trying to be careful with my valued judgment about the media where the considerations were primarily subjective. Did he mean to suggest that it was overplayed or underplayed...

Senator McElman: He had many comments about this as I heard on television. I think the prime one was that the demonstration had begun the day before and there were some 2000 people involved and that the only point of coverage made by the media was the unfortunate incident that did develop rather than the whole play. What its purpose was—what the attempt was to protest—what they felt should be protested...

Mr. Camp: Well, I wouldn't agree with that. I think the essence of the news story—I mean, I wrote a column on it the same day...

Senator McElman: Well, I must say I didn't see your column.

Mr. Camp: It was the presence of the Maoist so-called of these overradicalized young people that dominated the event. I can't imagine any newspaper or any reporter covering it in any different way. You have to say at the same time that subject is media and a degree to which television can make events.

Senator McElman: Do you feel that the media in general are doing a useful job from the point of view of the total society in reporting and dealing with these new developments?

Mr. Camp: Yes.

Senator McElman: Well, this is one of the dangers of an uncritical public in terms of its attitude towards the printed word. Now, is there even a bigger danger in terms of what it sees on television?

Mr. Camp: Yes, Senator. That is true with respect to the television media and I must say with the media in general. For example, the press has told the story about cigarette smoking. Now, a lot of people are worried about the effects of cigarette smoking and they are concerned with pollution and in general with world conditions such as the war in Vietnam.

Senator Everett: I have just one question on this pollution issue. You say that the press has given a great service there. Has the press gone far enough on the aspects of pollution?

Mr. Camp: Well, Senator, in my view it can't go far enough.

Senator McElman: Are you aware, Mr. Camp, that the publishers of some of these papers have been here and suggested that perhaps the press has been remiss in its dealings with pollution and now the newspapers are doing a better job in reporting on pollution?

Mr. Camp: Yes, they still do reports on pollution and they are editorializing much more.

Senator McElman: Yes, it is being well reported.

Mr. Camp: Well, when I made inquiries as to—when I read a story about what was happening down off the coast of Newfoundland—there apparently was some oil leaking somewhere...

Senator McElman: Yes, Mr. Camp, I would say it was well reported in all of the principal dailies.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Camp, weren't you in fact misquoted at one stage out West?

Mr. Camp: Yes, I made a statement in Edmonton and I came back and a Canadian Press report in the Toronto Telegram had what I had said completely wrong. So I immediately wrote a letter to the Telegram and in so doing I sent a copy of the letter to the editor of the Edmonton paper and low and behold I received a note back with an apology.

The Telegram also asked me if I wanted to have them publish a retraction, but of course, this I didn't do.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mr. Camp, you have spoken very eloquently on government intervention, on chain ownership and of monopolies, but you didn't deal with conglomerates—that is ownership of the media by massive conglomerates. Do you hold the same feeling there as you do in other areas?

Mr. Camp: The answer there is only a partial yes. In other words, we are dealing now not with a private product but a public one. This is a television station, or a radio station and therefore there is a clear responsibility here.

I may say that I opposed Mr. Bassett's acquiring a television station in Toronto. I deliberately went out of my way and told him that I opposed it because I was against newspaper publishers owning television stations. He replied with something to the fact that he was not the only paper in Toronto that applied for this.

I would say that the interest of the general public could be involved, Senator, if one owner owned the only daily newspaper and say the only television station or radio station in a city.

Senator McElman: Well, let us go to the print media. Do you see any conflict with the public where a conglomerate who has massive interests outside of the media—where its massive interests are relatively outside of the media reaching to all parts of the economic spectrum. Do you think that there is any particular danger in that respect?

Mr. Camp: Well, Senator, that is rather a difficult question to answer.

The Chairman: Well, Senators, I hate to bring an end to this session as it has been a very interesting and informative one. Dalton, on behalf of the Committee, may I say that the request we made in asking you to come here was an imposition and the Committee is grateful and delighted that you have come.

On behalf of the Committee I can only say that we share your concern about the mass media and again thank you for sharing your concern with us.

Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned at 6:10 p.m.

—Upon resuming at 8:00 p.m.

BRIEF OF PROFESSOR THELMA McCORMACK,

Associate Professor,
Sociology, York University,
Toronto.

The Chairman: If I may call the Session to order. The first of two witnesses this evening is Professor Thelma McCormack, better known as Mrs. McCormack in some circles at least. Mrs. McCormack is Associate Professor of Sociology at York University, and if you had an opportunity to study the briefing book I am sure you will have read her biography.

Sometimes, Professor McCormack, we have received briefs some few weeks in advance. That has not been the case for this brief, for which you need not apologize. There is one disadvantage in that the Senators have not seen the brief and I would suggest you proceed and perhaps you could quote from it or indeed I suppose you could wrote it all and then we will question you on its contents.

Professor Thelma McCormack: Or anything else. I think a brief is often like the media because it suffers from sins of omission. But it is a very large topic and I have a sabbatical next year in which I hope to write a great big fat book on it.

In any case, let me begin by saying that being a sociologist means I am not a professional journalist and do not have any very informed opinions on particular examples of the media; they are those of a layman. But sociologists have been studying the mass media in the same ways they study the church, the family, or the school. They see it as an institution in urban society and just as a sociologist would not think of passing judgment on your local church but talks about the function of the church, this is my particular interest in studying the mass media.

Now what I have tried to do here is to provide a set of concepts because I think very often in discussions of the media one gets into the details and evaluations without examining what the assumptions are. So I have tried to do two things in this brief. First, is to indicate what I see as the criteria for evaluating the media. Secondly, to indicate what kinds of structural factors have in my opinion made the media fall short of fulfilling this kind of function. In other words, if I were studying a school system I would say, you know, what is the function of a modern school system in the 20th century and what are the structural factors which either make it meet those goals or fail to. This is exactly the same kind of question which I am asking about the media.

In this brief and in my courses as well I do put a good deal of emphasis on the print media. This is because it is the oldest media and allows you to examine it developmentally. The newer media are sufficiently young so it is hard to trace any kinds of trends but that is where it ends because what I have to say about the media apply really to all the media. McLuhan, notwithstanding, I really don't see any fundamental reason for making a distinction between the print media and the electronic media if what we are looking at is the function of the media in the modern society.

Now what I start out to do in section II is to define some terms and that is going to be a little dull but you might find it useful later on. I simply say the term "mass media of communication" does refer to newspapers and periodicals, radio, television, and so forth. In other words, to forms of communication which are mediated by a technology which makes it possible to reach large populations easily, quickly, conveniently, inexpensively, and without prior screening of names.

Now this means that I am not using communication to talk about inter-personal communication or personal letters and I am not sure that the term "mass media of communication" should be used for very expensive glossy magazines which sell publicly but cost $1.25 or $2.00. The mass media of communication ideally should be available to the poorest citizen although in fact that doesn't always happen.

When people talk about the content of the media I find the tendency to sort of flip-flop between journalism and popular culture. Here I am using "journalism" for non-educational reporting or interpretation and I am using "popular culture" when we talk about dramatic material or material with a lot of entertainment value. It doesn't really matter. What is common to both is that the content and the style are intended to have a very wide appeal.

I don't think there is any point in talking about "mass media of communication" unless you realize that the whole point is they are popular; they have a wide appeal. That means that I am excluding certain kinds of coded information or even material which requires a very special competence. If you have to be a trained lawyer to understand it, if you have to have a Ph.D. in economics, it is no longer part of the "mass media of communication".

Now the term "communication" has become a kind of mystique. I think McLuhan is partly responsible for this and it is becoming a kind of vague, romantic term. I find that people believe that all problems are due to lack of communication and if one could just solve the problems of inter-personal communications everything would be okay. I hope I am not being condescending here in defining it as "a voluntary relationship between senders and receivers". That means that school is not communication. It is not a voluntary relationship. It is something you are compelled to enter into by the state. Now this is not true when we are talking about communication in terms of the mass media. There are no rewards for entering into this relationship, no incentives, no privileges.

This term "voluntary" I think leads to a certain kind of misunderstanding. It is quite true media executives will say "It is a voluntary relationship. Nobody forces you to read this newspaper, nobody forces you to listen to this station or this channel." Now what I think is true (and we have a good deal of data to support this) is that, although it is a voluntary relationship, almost everyone in a modern society is to some extent exposed. In that sense it is habitual and it is universal. So it is not quite voluntary but it is also not involuntary.

The next term I look at is "media influence". Again I find this is thrown around very loosely by people and they use it sometimes to talk about media power and they are not the same terms. "Media influence" really has to do with the numbers of people who voluntarily expose themselves to the media and its prospectus. When people talk about "my newspaper" or "my favourite station" they are in effect saying: "I am putting myself in a position where my opinions and attitudes may be influenced. I am inclined to accept the biases or predispositions of this newspaper or this channel or whatever." "Media influence" has to do with the effectiveness of the media in shaping attitudes and public opinions.

The "power of the media" may have very little to do with numbers. The media may be very powerful and yet there are few people exposed. The best example of that, of course, comes out of the war time period in which underground newspapers, underground radio stations may have reached very few people but the people it reached were strategic and the party or the group or the elite in power regarded them as a threat. The media can be very powerful without having large numbers of readers or large numbers of listeners. The whole power relationship is somewhat different.

Thirdly, I would like to distinguish the "prestige of the media" because this idea has nothing to do with and should be conceptually differentiated from its influence or its power. "The prestige of the media" refers to standards and these standards are set by other media professionals. They have their concept of what a good newspaper is just as we have concept of what a good family is or a good educational system is. A good or high prestige media may have a very small circulation and nevertheless be regarded by other media professionals as a model, as an ideal. What characterizes this is the rotation that it does not yield to pressure, that it does not sacrifice long-term goals for any kind of short-term popularity or gains in influence.

These three terms, I think, are analytically distinct although sometimes you find in reality they overlap. Politicians and people in power in other areas very often pay a good deal of attention to the prestige media. They would like to be well received in it and very often the prestige media has an influence because other journalists pay attention to it.

There was a very interesting study done some years ago of Washington correspondents and what emerged from that study of Washington correspondents was how important the New York Times was to other journalists. They were the ones who conscientiously every morning read the New York Times and it was from the New York Times they very often developed their sense of what was relevant and what should be pursued or not. So the prestige media may have an indirect kind of influence which you would not know from its circulation.

Now perhaps one of the most controversial issues I find when people talk about the media is measuring its influence. You know you just stop anyone on the street and they will say "Oh, yes, the media have enormous influence." But what does "enormous" mean here? How big an influence is a big influence and is there any way of measuring the influence of the media? In recent years social scientists have become increasingly skeptical of the vast power of the mass media. I don't think the public has. Certainly my students believe that there is some tremendous power in the mass media and that I am withholding secrets from them because I don't explain what the magic is.

There have been a number of studies which suggest the media have far less influence for better or for worse than the public is inclined to believe. Now where the media influence is greatest is a combination of two conditions. The first is that there is a good deal of social disorganization—and here we get into some sociologies—but the other institutions of social control have broken down. You find this very often in underdeveloped countries or in countries which are going through some kind of revolutionary change where the family has broken down, the educational system has broken down and the media are the only institution to which people turn. That is condition A.

Condition B—now I am talking about maximum influence—is where the media have no competition. In other words, if you have social disorganization and a captive audience that is maximum influence. I think when you talk about influence of the media you have to ask yourself what kinds of competing influence are there from other media and from other kinds of social institutions. Now minimal influence is where confidence has broken down in the media itself and the people turn to other forms of readership or they withdraw altogether and make no further effort to order reality. What I am suggesting here is that both extremes, maximal and minimal, are probably not very healthy in a democratic society.

Now in section III of my brief I raise the question of what is the function of the mass media in modern society. I think to answer that question you have to start looking at modern societies and what we mean by them. They are large scale, they are complex, they are industrial; people sometimes refer to them as mass societies, as post-industrial, sometimes advanced technological societies. These are societies in which there is a very high division of labour, a great deal of social differentiation, very complex inter-dependent kind of economy. Now what happens in that kind of society is that we create a communication vacuum. There is no counterpart in the small face-to-face primitive society or in a small local village society. These societies have so much interaction and they are so homogeneous as a population that there is no communication problem. The communication vacuum exists in these modern highly developed technological societies.

Here again a rather snide aside to McLuhan: I do not think it is the function of the media to restore the tribal village. I think we are living in a complex society and I think we have to learn to live in a complex society. We do have residues of village folk journalism, if you like. I see this in the modern tabloid press. If you look at something like the New York Daily Mirror it is full of scandals, it is full of the notion that people can be divided into good and bad. It is full of miracles and this kind of thing. That is primitive thought, that is village. I am using "village" now in the anthropological sense. That is "village thought" or "village journalism" which you find in the tabloid press. We are just not living in that kind of world. Canada is an industrial urban society and its technology is characterized, as I say, by the division of labour and social differentiation. We are a future oriented society in the sense that we believe in planning ahead, in conserving our resources or developing surpluses and acquiring knowledge to plan ahead. Very briefly that is the model, if you like, of modern societies.

Now modern societies, as I say, have a difficult problem first of co-ordination and, second of achieving consensus. This is just another way of saying there is a communication vacuum built into the modern societies and there are two ways in which that vacuum can be filled. One is rumour, gossip, whispering campaigns. This is not a very efficient way partly because gossip and rumour tend to be structured by our personal prejudices, our personal biases, personal anxieties. It means that consensus is left to chance with the risk that there can be panic, ignorance, and indifference.

Now alternatively the vacuum can be filled by propaganda of an elite group which does not hold itself accountable to the public and attempts to maintain itself. A word here about propaganda. It should not frighten us.

Propaganda very often begins for very good reasons—for instance, to persuade people to undertake sacrifices which they might not wish to take and which are not convenient but nevertheless in the long-run are in their best interest. The problem with propaganda, however, is that it deteriorates quickly. It begets more propaganda. It tends to be one-directional. It tends to be from the top to the grass roots and not the other way around. This is another way of saying that the trouble with propaganda is there is no feedback system and it becomes rigid and dysfunctional in a different way from rumour and gossip. These are two ways in which that vacuum can be filled.

Historically in the Western World the third response to the vacuum has been the development of the media of communication and it developed, as I say, as a response to the communication vacuum. It is not as unreliable as rumour and it is not, I think, as rigid or one directional as propaganda. The media, as I see it, have a dual function. The first is to help us in this very differentiated type of society to synthesize our experience and help us develop a sense of "collective identity".

Collective identity is very easily achieved in a simple primitive society where people have very much the same experience and are very much alike and these societies tend to be static and closed. Collective identity is very difficult to achieve in a society which is characterized by a great deal of differentiation and it is, I think, an important function of the media to help us find our collective identity. I have some qualifications to make about that term "collective identity", but I will skip them now.

The second function of the media is to help us adapt to change. Modern societies cannot survive as static; they are continually in the process of change. It is the function of the media to increase our flexibility, to give us some kind of guidance in the process of social change. This means, I think, that the media are sensitive indicators of social unrest or tension and they alert us simply to the kinds of problems which exist in the society to which we must adapt, the kinds of alternatives that may be available to us.

What I am saying is that the media are instrumental and they are continually engaged in assessing our total society, in evaluating it. I think this kind of critical posture is essential, not because I am a student radical but because I do not believe that a modern society can remain static; it is in the process of social change and if we don't take responsibility someone else will. I think this means that the media do have to get into the act, as it were. Now the media may not, and people will still read newspapers and listen to the radio and perhaps enjoy them, as I say here in the same way people find pleasure in reading a telephone book. I am not being facetious. I sometimes do find pleasure reading a telephone book but it is not an essential function of society that I have this pleasure.

If you accept this notion or this hypothesis about the function of the media the next question is: Do they perform effectively? And I am going out on a limb here and saying I do not think they perform effectively and I don't think it has to do with the character or the motive of the people who run the media. I do think it has to do with the structure of the media.

Now the structure—those of you who have been following or attending all these meetings will find it is fairly obvious—with the exception of public broadcasting—that the media are forms of business enterprise and this means that they get a large share or a greater share of their revenue from advertising. It also means that large circulation metropolitan newspapers disappear although the public may want them. There have been some rather scandalous examples recently in Britain of newspapers with fantastically large circulations which suggests the public thought they were okay and enjoyed them; but the shareholders were not satisfied that the return was good enough.

In broadcasting this corresponds to the notion of ratings and very often programs have very high ratings but the sponsor is still not satisfied that they are high enough so the public interest here or the public voice is simply disregarded.

What I have then done is suggest some of the structural developments in the media and I really think they are very familiar to you. There is the decline of family ownership and development of the corporate structure, decline of competition and growth of monopolistic or quasi-monopolistic forms, increasing absentee ownership through chain development, multi-media ownership and affiliation with conglomerates. I think you have perhaps almost exhausted these subjects but in each case I think these developments have not been influenced by social need but by economic need. I think the media are forms of business enterprise and media personnel behave like entrepreneurs. That is their job as they see it. They see what they are doing as a form of economic activity which must pay off.

I have commented briefly on some of these trends and we can perhaps go back to them, if you like, and point out none of these trends is unique to Canada. You can find them in the United States and you can find them in the U.K. Now when I say the media are business enterprises first and public services second it is true that the media are not always very profitable forms of business enterprise. I mention here something which you may have already seen, the Royal Commission on the Press, which was done I think in 1961, in which they found that the media newspapers in Britain were sick industries. They were not industries that were especially attractive as investment.

Very briefly I suggest that when media executives are entrepreneurs, they behave like entrepreneurs, not only economically but also socially. They have more in common with other business executives than they do with their own employees and very often large sectors of the public. I think the media executives whom I have known have perhaps a little more perspective than some of the business executives. But they do belong to the same kind of sub-culture as other business executives and their tastes tend to be those of other business executives and they tend to see the world in the way other business executives do. I do not think they know very much about the world of the underprivileged or the powerless or the have-nots. I think this is why people have come to look upon the media as establishment. The fact is I think media people do put property values ahead of human values. So when students start smashing up a computer at Sir George Williams University I think the media executives, with all the best will in the world, have a reflex in favour of property values. This is why I think there has been a growing cleavage between the young radical students and the establishment media.

Now there are differences. There are newspapers and newspapers and there are magazines and magazines. Some of them, I think, have a kind of old-fashioned shirt-sleeves working man's style; others have gone in for the new swinging zap-pow style. Whatever the style I just think they do not rock the boat where the status quo is concerned. They tease occasionally, they flirt, but they really do not rock the boat.

Now in recent years the response to this situation has been what I call the "soul journalism"; this you will find in the student radical press and the underground press. It is a really horrible form of journalism: hostile, shrill, arrogant, profane. It is dogmatic, careless of facts and it is deficient in a lot of ways. However this form of journalism, I think, has caught the imagination and reflects the sense of social concern which has developed in Canada and elsewhere. This kind of journalism concentrates on very relentless criticism of the status quo and they are confident they do not have any competition from the establishment media. I am a little ambivalent about it. I just emerged after having been attacked by the York University Press. To go back to this point...

The Chairman: This is not the question. But what were you attacked for?

Professor McCormack: Not having enough Canadian content in my courses.

Anyway, I am going out on a limb and suggesting it may be horrible to contemplate, but I think quite possibly that the media in Canada may become increasingly polarized between the two extremes of an establishment media, which serves the economic cultural and social elites, and the soul media serving the critical intellectual minorities. And that leaves the rest of us with simply nothing. That's a rather gloomy kind of prediction.

Now I want to qualify a little bit some of the things I have said. Recently there have been a number of observers who have said that bias is disappearing in the media. The old days of hard bias have vanished and what you have instead is something much worse. You have a blah neutral, anonymous, white bread quality to the media. They lack any kind of personality. You get mass produced items, mass produced syndicated material which really is far more alienating than anything we could possibly do. These people say it is much better to go back to the old-fashioned authentic editorial bias than to continue with this kind of empty anonymous objectivity which, as I say, frequently deteriorates in kind of compulsive fixation with accurate details. Well, I leave that open to discussion.

I think you can see whereas the media in the past have been criticized for lacking objectively they are increasingly criticized for too much objectivity and lacking any kind of personal commitment.

The second thing I would like to suggest is that twenty years ago the media were criticized for being an extension of class interest. I think a number of people are increasingly concerned about the changing relationship between media and large government bureaucracies. The news is increasingly governmental. As government services expand by very subtle process—I don't think there is anything Machiavellian about this—I think the media are being drawn into governmental bureaucracies so that in the future the problem may not be classed by us in the old-fashioned sense but a kind of tendency to see the world the way government bureaucrats see it.

I think social scientists have exactly the same problem. We are dependent very often on the government for research grants and the problem is how do you maintain your economy and independence? How do you say to the government: that is the wrong question to be asked; another question should be raised. If you say that, you don't get the research grant. I think it is a very similar kind of problem. In another article I have suggested that freedom of the press is threatened in the way that I think freedom of knowledge is increasingly threatened. I do not think the way you save freedom of the press is through the courts. I think the media people have to stop relying on the doctrine of freedom of the press and begin to look at the kind of social alliances they establish with consumer groups or trade union movements or other kinds of social organizations.

I was once vain or foolish enough to suggest that maybe social scientists in my position and journalists in that position ought to really get together and together we might solve the problems of integrity and autonomy. Since we are both increasingly dependent on the government we still feel we have to continue to pursue a kind of critical posture.

Well, what about recommendations? Here I have been very cautious. Again I am not in the business and it is very easy for an outsider to come up with some grand solutions. I think the main point that I would like to get across is that we have to look at the media as a social institution. I think the questions you ask about the media should be the questions you ask about the family or the church or the school. Now when the problem of merger or chain comes up (I don't think these are necessarily bad) I don't think these decisions should be made solely on the basis of economic considerations. I think we ought to begin to ask what is the social price and if the social price is not very high, okay. But if the social price is high then we say "No, we would not do this to the school and we are not going to do this to the media."

I look to the day when journalists will begin to take themselves far more seriously as a profession. A profession means a commitment to service. I think this does involve far more education, not necessarily in journalism but I think in the social sciences and in the humanities. I think journalists have got to stop worrying about the term "intellectual". I think many of them are going to have to start thinking of themselves as intellectuals and I think this is part of professionalization.

I did suggest earlier that the independence of the media could best be assured when the media have established alliances with other non-profit and non-governmental institutions.

I like the idea of independent evaluations of the media at regular intervals. I think the public should be to some extent involved in independent evaluations of the media.

Last but not least I suggest that there ought to be one Canadian foundation that is willing to subsidize a prestige media. I think we need other models of the media either subsidized by a foundation or a university which would give us our Christian Science Monitor or our Le Monde which have, I think, kind of a high prestige.

I think I have exceeded my time.

The Chairman: You have exceeded your time but it has been most worthwhile and most interesting. I think we would like to ask some questions. I think Mr. Spears has a question.

Mr. Spears: This is simply a matter of a correction in the text. Might I point out to the Committee that Mrs. McCormack brought sixty copies of the document with her and discovered some typing errors and went through it by hand and corrected them herself. I think I have found one that she missed on page 14, the last paragraph, Recommendation No. 1...

The Chairman: It should be "social" instead of "special". Thank you Mr. Spears.

Senator McElman: In your summing up your second reference is to journalists and they must begin to see themselves as other professionals with a commitment to service. Do you not agree there are many, many journalists in this nation today who do see themselves in exactly that fashion and practice their craft in that fashion?

Professor McCormack: Yes, I agree they do, but I think they are trapped in an institution which makes it very difficult. It is as if York University were a business enterprise. It makes it very difficult to behave like a professional in a business enterprise. Now again I don't want to sound like a student radical. Many businesses are taking themselves more seriously as professionals and so this line may begin to be a little less obvious. I think many do see themselves as professionals. They have failed to develop professional organizations which behave like other professional organizations. They have failed, I think, to convince the public that they behave like professionals. They have failed to make explicit their own codes of ethics which you have with other professionals.

Now I would hate to see them become like doctors and lawyers where they have to be licensed. I think the modern licence is not the Bar on medical profession but often the Ph.D. I don't think that is absolutely necessary but it may be that as an occupational group becomes a profession they may want to think about something like that.

Yes, I have enormous respect for the tradition of journalism.

Senator McElman: We had a good bit of testimony before this Committee which indicates not only the journalists themselves but the establishment of journalists have given a tremendous emphasis to this in very recent years. The recruitment to a large degree is coming from university graduates. I was wondering—it seemed to be a generalized statement you were making—do you find degrees of this or does it relate to the metropolitan areas of Canada and to a lesser degree to the smaller cities?

Professor McCormack: This would be a very sound kind of hypothesis. That is you would find the tradition of apprenticeship still surviving in the small areas and in the small newspapers whereas recruitment out of professional schools would be more in the larger ones. I think we need data and maybe you have collected it. When a man becomes a doctor he remains a doctor for the rest of his life. I have the impression that there is a lot of turnover in journalism and that people drift in and out into public relations or something else. They don't enter it as a vocation, they don't enter it as a priesthood the way doctors and lawyers do. Sure, there is some drop out in the other professions as well but I think the impression in journalism is it is a very unstable kind of occupational group.

Senator McElman: The evidence we have taken indicates this too is lessening. I perhaps misunderstood but at page 12 you spoke of the media reflecting "Establishment values" and it reacts in accordance with establishment values. You gave Sir George Williams as an example where you suggested, I believe, they reacted as to the value of the property involved. Are you suggesting they should not have reacted in that fashion?

Professor McCormack: Not quite so quickly. What I am suggesting is it was almost a reflex. Now, you know, I think their reflex tends to be in terms of property values rather than human values.

Senator McElman: Within the scope of the need for news being almost instant today would that be abnormal for the first reaction to be X million dollars of damage took place?

Professor McCormack: I think it is normal, given the values of our society. We do put more emphasis on property values very often than we do on human values. They do the same thing in labour disputes. The emphasis is how much damage there is to the property. Now I reacted in the same way to the Sir George Williams affair and I thought "My God, this is a horrible thing to have destroyed a million dollar computer." Well, you know, what is a million dollar computer in terms of certain kinds of, you know, human resources. I have had fantasies of destroying computers myself when they frustrated me!

The Chairman: Where is that reference?

Senator McElman: On page 12, the foot of the third last paragraph.

Senator Everett: Could you enlarge on that statement?

Professor McCormack: That I have fantasies of destroying computers?

Senator Everett: The penultimate statement in which you said human resources. I think you indicated human resources in this text were more important than computer resources.

Professor McCormack: I think, you know, the human resources involved may have been the quality of education and what was happening to students in their development and I don't think we look upon people as resources as we do property or mines or minerals.

Senator Everett: You find fault with the article because it did not bring out the underlying dissatisfaction of the students in human resource terms?

Professor McCormack: It brought out the dissatisfaction but hardly. You know, I don't find in the media any very real understanding of what is going on these days in universities with students and with young people generally.

Senator Everett: The articles I have read on that particular subject seem to me to deal quite pervasively with the underlying problem, whether they agreed or disagreed with it. The impression you have is all they were concerned about was the wrecking of the million dollar computer. You may have read it differently.

Professor McCormack: I don't think it was, you know, a horribly one-sided version. The students eventually did, I think, get their point across and I think there were enough journalists who were intellectually curious enough to want to find out what the sources of dissatisfaction were. But the sort of gut problem of universities and the gut problems of minority groups in universities are possibly not as well prepared as they might be. I don't find any real discussion on that.

Senator McElman: Was not the gut problem here in fact the charge of racial discrimination which had been put under investigation, was then under investigation, and is still being looked at in considerable depth? Was this not pretty thoroughly reported coincident with the damage story even though in sensation understandably, I think, damage got the predominant lead?

Professor McCormack: Well, I think that certainly we found out that a professor was accused of racism and an investigation was going on but it is very much the same story as San Francisco State and other universities. Somehow it was not related to what is a social revolution going on.

Senator Everett: It seems to me you are talking about two entirely different sections of the newspaper. In the George Williams episode it would seem in dealing with the underlying causes in terms of hard news you have very little complaint about the way the newspapers handled it. Now your complaint refers to the gut problem, as you put it, of the university student. That would be dealt with on the feature page, that would be an in-depth article. That is not a news item.

Professor McCormack: Again this whole distinction about the in-depth versus the quick news, I think that distinction is going to have to break down because increasingly news are these in-depth problems.

Senator Everett: But you then are finding fault with newspapers for not reporting hard news because it takes too long. It seems to me there is always going to have to be a division between the news area of the newspaper, which suffers from all its limitations, and the in-depth side of a newspaper which may expand and I suppose we hope it will.

Professor McCormack: Again I think here you need a good journalist to tell you the kind of new balance that is going to emerge or has to be developed. I don't think it is enough to say if you want to see in-depth stuff read magazines. They come out once a week or once a month and that is where the in-depth stuff is. The newspaper handles the faster news, the quick bulletins. I think we grew up accepting that distinction and the families subscribe to the magazines and opinion magazines and you also have the daily newspaper with the quick news. The question is what is news? Pollution. You can't begin to discuss pollution without getting into a much more complex problem.

Senator Sparrow: It seems to me you are making a very drastic step or jump from the million dollar cost to the in-depth study of in fact why that happened. What difference does the figure of a million dollars make in your opinion? Supposing there had been no dollar value established. Is there any middle line of thinking—malicious damage or vandalism? If we hear of a church being vandalized as such we don't immediately react to the cost of that, do we? Vandalism itself is the factor or the crime aspect that it was against the law. Now we don't initially say "Why did this happen?" An in-depth study would do it.

You say the news reporter was wrong in reflecting what he would think the public interest was and you are saying in theory that is a mistake. Is that right?

Professor McCormack: Well, yes. I think this is good traditional middle-class bias. We have a tendency to regard the fever rather than the disease and news is the temperature and not the disease. We get very upset by vandalism because it violates our norms about proper behaviour and property and so forth. We think it is sufficient to say "We think that is bad", but you don't solve problems by reacting to the temperature.

Senator Sparrow: But you have to react first, do you not?

Professor McCormack: I think you have to see these as signs of a disease in a very clinical sense.

Senator Sparrow: In an in-depth study, yes. I can't visualize the press...

Professor McCormack: I think the term "in-depth" has become a kind of out for saying "I will do a superficial job and somebody else is going to do an in-depth study." I don't think you can even identify problems these days without a more sophisticated kind of social preparation. One of my beefs—and perhaps this is unfair and I apologize to any journalist present—is the way it is just assumed that anybody can cover urban problems. Your training may have been in sports or something of this sort but you go off and cover a riot. Now when it comes to financial news you always get financial experts to cover financial news.

The Chairman: That has been disputed. A lot of people have come and said that is not the case.

Professor McCormack: Well, I am impressed by the experts.

Senator Sparrow: We had evidence given the other day that some of the better reporters on religious news were non-believers.

Senator Everett: I suppose if you were covering a riot it might not be bad to be a good long distance runner.

Senator McElman: In your reference to the prestige media I appreciate your approach was that the prestige was established by fellow members of the media. Are there any in Canada today of the major print media that you would classify as prestige media in your terms?

Professor McCormack: No. I think Canada has had in the past and they still have, although its days are numbered, a good solid middle journalism. That is something I would not underestimate. I think there is a good sort of solid citizen middle journalism. I don't think it has prestige media. Now I am not really familiar with the French-Canadian media at all in this respect.

Again if this does not sound like a special pleading I think that the CBC has been for many broadcasters outside of Canada an example of a prestige public affairs journalism.

Senator McElman: Are you speaking of both radio and television?

Professor McCormack: Yes; but again I would not knock the kind of good middle tradition.

The Chairman: Where would you rank the middle tradition? Between the establishment media and the soul media, as you call it?

Professor McCormack: I think it is on the side of the establishment. I think it is not always uncritical of elites but by and large it supports good middle-class value such as getting ahead, as finding work, being on time, saving your money and so forth.

The reason I call it "middle journalism" is that I think it is a kind of citizen oriented journalism. What worries me a little bit about the prestige media, particularly something like the New York Times, is that I just don't think that it is for citizens anymore. I just don't think the ordinary citizen can read or enjoy the New York Times.

Mr. Spears: Or Le Monde?

Professor McCormack: I think you have to be French. There is a whole intellectual tradition there. What worries me about something like the New York Times is I think they are elite oriented and not citizen oriented. I would not knock this other tradition.

The Chairman: What are the soul media in Toronto, for example?

Professor McCormack: They change their names.

The Chairman: You are talking about the underground?

Professor McCormack: And the student press.

The Chairman: Aside from those are there any?

Professor McCormack: The kids bring me samples.

The Chairman: What percentage of the people in Toronto read the soul media?

Professor McCormack: A very small percentage. It goes from hand to hand.

The Chairman: Do you see the future of the soul media as expanding and growing?

Professor McCormack: Well, it has certainly got its own clientele.

The Chairman: It has its own establishment?

Professor McCormack: Yes. It is very much in some ways like the Extreme Right. It has its own little mythic world.

The Chairman: The question I was going to put to you: Are there examples of soul media which do not exist in that mythic world, to use your phrase?

Professor McCormack: Well, I think there is a new kind of journalism developing that you see in someone like John Hersey or Norman Mailer, deeply and clearly committed kind of journalism. It is critical of the status quo but also competent journalism.

I say to the student radical journalists that Marx had an enormous respect for facts. Why don't you go to the British Museum and look at the facts the way Marx did? They don't. They don't have that kind of respect for facts that Marx did. I think some of the people like Hersey and Mailer...

The Chairman: And who else?

Professor McCormack: I think to some extent Richard Rovere.

Senator Everett: How would you relate Pierre Berton?

Professor McCormack: Pierre Berton belongs to the very old-fashion tradition of muckraking and it is lovely. It is one of the grand traditions. I think it is a grand tradition which deteriorates when it gets to Vance Packard. I see that as the end of what was a very glorious tradition of muckraking in journalism.

Senator Everett: If this new style of journalism is growing, why wouldn't your recommendation, rather than being the ones you have listed on page 15, why wouldn't your recommendation be to let it grow and knock the mass media aside or cause the mass media to change their approach?

Professor McCormack: I don't suggest it be censored or eliminated.

Senator Everett: In fact you say it is going to grow. It is in a real growth stage.

Professor McCormack: Yes.

Senator Everett: In your recommendations you say that there should be government foundations willing to support the prestige press; there should be independent evaluations of the media; stronger alliances with trade unions, consumer organizations and universities.

Surely in your view this is because the mass media do not represent the constituents. If you say the soul papers do represent the constituency and are growing why would your recommendation not be to let them grow and either cast the mass media aside or let them go out of business?

Professor McCormack: Well, I have great reservations about this soul journalism and its kind of Apocalyptic visions of social change. I think in its own way it is as irresponsible a kind of journalism as the kind of underground right journalism. I am more interested in you and I being served well.

Senator Everett: Would you characterize Mailer this way?

Professor McCormack: As serving us well, yes.

Senator Everett: Would you characterize him as being irresponsible in the terms you used in reference to the underground?

Professor McCormack: No. It is the Berkley Barb and the S.D.S. material.

Senator Everett: I thought you said that people like Mailer were an outgrowth of this sort of thing and we were in a new era?

Professor McCormack: I think they are another response to the same changes going on in society but I do not link them with the East Village Other, or the Berkley Barb. I think they are good competent professional journalists reviving the tradition of ideological journalism, which seems to me highly professional. I am interested in us being served well and I do not see soul journalism as serving us well. I think it is much too unreality oriented and leaves too much in terms of its own private vision. It is to me quite unreadable but I am interested in a change in mainline journalism, if you like, mainstream journalism.

Senator Everett: Would you say through men like Mailer this is changing?

Professor McCormack: Yes, I think so.

The Chairman: To my regret we have run out of time. It seems as though we have just begun.

Senator Quart, do you have a question?

Senator Quart: Yes, Mr. Chairman. You mention on page 12, Mrs. McCormack: "The other world of the underprivileged, the powerless, the 'have-nots', tends to be ignored."

It seems to me in this day and age they are playing up the poor and the underprivileged and making almost a class war rather than ignoring them. I think the students are getting a tremendous amount of fair play. Much too much as far as I am concerned.

Professor McCormack: Here again I think there has been a sudden social conscience which has seized the media. I am somehow put off by a newspaper in Toronto, which shall remain nameless, which has a sort of bleeding heart approach to the poor about once every two weeks but inflicts on me four days a week a business section which I never ask for and which doesn't tell me really a thing about the business world except it is like a sorority newsletter—who is changing jobs, what is going on in what company. It is conscience money. It is conscience journalism. Occasionally they have something about the poor or housing or something of this sort. It is a little bit like the old Life Magazine which could publish a terrible picture of human suffering on one page and juxtapose it with some debutante ball in New Orleans. The effect is lost.

Senator Quart: Thank you. This is positively the end of my questioning. You mentioned at one stage that newspapers should be available to poorer citizens. How is that? By some government grant?

Professor McCormack: I am simply saying that if you are going to talk about democracy and the political responsibility in the mass media then they ought to be available to every citizen. Now the newspaper has been a cheap thing and it has been available to almost all citizens. It has not been economically impossible. I would exclude from a definition of the mass media something which costs $1.25 an issue and just is not available to all of us.

The Chairman: Professor McCormack, there are a great many additional questions, I realize. Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Would you categorize the United Church Observer as soul media?

Professor McCormack: I haven't really!

Senator McElman: I apologize, Mr. Chairman.

Professor McCormack: It is a somewhat facetious term, soul journalism.

The Chairman: I think that was a somewhat facetious question.

Professor McCormack: I don't want to leave the impression that journalism in Canada is in a desperate state. If I might add I would like to say I think there are distinguished journalists. I think that one of the things which I find very exciting is the new magazine called Science Forum which David Sturgeon produces, a magnificent contribution. It is expensive but very fresh and exciting kind of magazine. I think a lot is happening. I would like to see more of the bigger media give help to the littler ones.

The Chairman: I am genuinely sorry we can't go on, there are obviously more questions, but in fairness to the other witness who is here and in fairness to ourselves—we have been here since early this morning and have to come back early tomorrow—hopefully you could stay with us and we will be delighted. We are terribly grateful and particularly impressed with the handwritten changes. Thank you very much for a most useful documentation.

I know that Mrs. Evans is here and will you please come forward now.

BRIEF OF ALDERMAN UNA MacLEAN EVANS

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the Session back in order. The next witness is Alderman Una MacLean Evans. Mrs. Evans, or more accurately Alderman Evans, is from Edmonton. I don't know whether you had a chance to read her biography but it tells, I think, a most interesting and impressive story including a degree of involvement certainly in Liberal party politics. That is where I suppose I first met her more years ago than either of us would care to admit. She is past-president, for example, of the Alberta Women's Liberal Federation. She has been very active in the Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, holding executive position after executive position in that organization. I suppose one of the highlights of the biography was her marriage in 1962 to Arthur Evans, who is a well-known newspaper columnist in the City of Edmonton. She has three children. She has continued her political activities and moved into the municipal scene in 1966, elected as Alderman with over 40,000 votes. She was re-elected in 1968 with 45,000 votes. She is a former member of the Board of Governors of the CBC. All in all a most impressive biography.

Now when the Committee was in its early formative stages it occurred to us we would do well at some point to have someone who has some special interest and knowledge of municipal politics because after all we are ourselves, I suppose, Federal politicians. We felt it would be well if we could find someone who might be able to bring special insight into the media from the viewpoint of municipal politics. Of course, I immediately thought of you because as well as having that particular insight, you have the background in broadcasting as member of the Board of Governors of the CBC and certainly an extensive background in all kinds of women's organizations and women's activities. I must say that the viewpoint of somebody from outside the Toronto-Montreal-Ottawa triangle is always of value. Those are some of the reasons why we asked you and we are delighted you are here.

You have a brief that we have not seen and I would suggest perhaps you read it and we will ask you some questions.

Alderman Una MacLean Evans: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Honourable Senators, I very much appreciate your invitation to come to the Committee and I realize that I am perhaps covering ground which you have heard these many times as you have called a great number of witnesses.

I was particularly pleased at the invitation as it recognizes the interest of the municipal level of government. While I cannot say my views are wholly representative of municipal opinion in my part of the country, I did however think you would be interested in a somewhat representative viewpoint of the aspect which you asked me to touch on—namely—coverage of municipal affairs. I therefore took the liberty of asking my fellow Aldermen, the City Commissioners and one or two other executive officers of the city for their views. Those expressions of opinion are incorporated into the text of what my remarks say and the submission therefore becomes a composite view.

It seems that while coverage of local affairs is high there is not much of municipal interest carried on the wire. One must look to trade journals generally for news of projects or events in other municipalities. The magazine, Civic Affairs, carries the kind of story of interest to those in municipal government of what is being done elsewhere to solve problems which are of concern to citizens in most areas—particularly urban—across the country. It seems to me that wire services might usefully carry such articles. Local radio and television stations in Edmonton say the major portion of their news comes from City Hall and accordingly staff are assigned to this beat daily by the two television stations and 6 of the 7 radio stations. The City facilitates this coverage by providing a permanent Press Room with phones for each media outlet, as well as a Press Bench in the Council Chambers equipped with microphone "jacks" so that debate of council may be taped as it takes place. Two television stations also cover council proceedings with sound on camera. Only the French Radio Station does not regularly cover the meetings of council but does so at such times as agenda items interest them. The new TV education channel in Edmonton is due to go on air on March 10th and I do not know at this point whether coverage of council will take place. It might be argued as to whether or not it was educational! In addition to the daily paper which presently has a City Hall staff of three reporters, council is covered by a weekly, and from time to time by student newspapers.

The reporting in Edmonton appears to me generally, to be reasonably accurate, fair and unbiased. Covering of municipal news is generally adequate, the reporters are eager for information and there is no shortage of interest or enthusiasm.

The personalities of the reporters make a vast difference in cooperation. A few have displayed indiscretion to the point of being obnoxious, but this is by no means the general rule. Interviews are requested politely and by appointment. Interference, accordingly, in daily routines is minimal. Requests for releases at appointed times, when necessary, are normally observed. The withholding of confidential material has not been a problem since a Press Room has been provided.

Alternatively, a lack of training and skills is sometimes apparent. There is repeated evidence that proper English grammar is often lacking. Knowledge of world affairs, and of the political scene Federally and Provincially, is often scanty. Poor grasp of municipal problems in depth shows a lack of a research approach. Skills basic to the journalistic career seem not to have been encouraged. Shorthand, fluency of expression, and interview acumen are not taught, sometimes not even acquired. There is little evidence that these people have an opportunity to grow professionally. There appear to be few if any professional standards. The development of a Press Gallery in Council has opened the way for a code of ethics, but this has been accomplished to fill a need felt by the reporters themselves and has in no material sense been fostered or sponsored by media management.

There is, in my opinion, a need for a school of journalism in Western Canada, where education, skills, polish and expertise can be cultivated. This should be augmented by a faculty of journalism in at least one of our Western universities, so that the journalistic profession can truly develop.

In considering the virtual lack of standards for media personnel Mr. Chairman, your Committee might well consider what attracts people to work for the media. Calibre of staff will depend to a large extent on the inducements offered, and the calibre will, in turn, determine the type of coverage given.

The money, offered is usually no inducement and the media are therefore in a poor position to compete for brainpower and cannot demand professional qualifications in their recruits.

I realize that many of the great newspaper people have not held degrees and that a degree in itself does not often mean too much—depending on the holder. But, people with training in economics, political science, or English to name a few, are unlikely to be attracted to the media with their present scale of pay and lack of prestige. Yet these are the types of people who should be attracted so that understanding and competent coverage of complex issues can be achieved.

Perhaps I have placed too much emphasis on monetary return. However, the former inducements of loyalty to the newspaper tradition seem to be fast disappearing in the face of the increasing emphasis of the importance of the advertising dollar or audience rating versus the importance of journalistic content.

I realize that news media must sell a service to the public. However, subterfuge too often supplants context. There is a grave tendency to use a misleading headline or a fragment of a broadcast item to grasp attention. The sensational often takes precedence over the factual. Controversy supersedes accomplishments. Problems are given much greater priority than solutions. Arguments in Council receive much more prominence than successful decisions.

Editorials show an alarming lack of research depth. If these are to be weighed with credibility, they should be properly researched so that the facts are precise, and conclusions are based upon correct information. Attendance at Council meetings by editorial writers would be of assistance in interpreting events and removing them from their insular position.

There is evidence that management policy dictates choice of news. While Edmonton's single newspaper is surely not as biased as might be expected, certainly municipal information, which is of prime concern to our residents, receives a poor second place. Similarly those opposed to a decision in Council are interviewed, and written up, while those aldermen applying reason and judgment to the solution are ignored. Radio and television coverage of Council meetings evidences a similar pointed discrimination. The aldermen who shout the loudest receive the prime time. The innovator, the leader, the steadying influence, receives little or no attention.

Too often our City is guilty of failing to provide to the media, material which reports progress and development. On the other hand, when coverage is sought it may receive little attention or none at all. The exigencies of the day, rather than the service to the public, determines the degree of coverage. Again controversy is emphasized, not the progress. Edmonton is one of few cities in Canada favoured with a Public Relations Branch in civic service, yet all too seldom is the advice of this office sought or used.

Large urban municipal corporations play an increasingly important role in the lives of individuals, particularly as the services they provide, the manner in which they accommodate their expansion, and the kinds of amenities which they provide their citizens, determine to a very large degree the quality of his life. It is important then to the municipal body and its citizens that the complexity of problems and the solutions proposed be fully understood by the citizenry who through taxes, foots the bill. It can be argued in economic terms if not in terms of straight community service, that the news media have a responsibility to the municipality in which they exist, to report and interpret issues well, for they are dependent for their own livelihood on a thriving municipality in which the business community itself can grow and prosper.

We should surely, however, if our values are not wholly material, be able to look at responsibility of the press to its community in terms other than purely economic.

Lord Francis Williams of Britain has worked as a journalist and broadcaster. He is a discerning critic and serious historian of the press and among the books he has written is "Dangerous Estate—The Anatomy of Newspapers" published in 1957 by Longmans, Green and Company.

Williams defines the traditional, historic, responsibility of the press as follows:

1. To report honestly.
2. To comment fearlessly.
3. To put no interest, including self-interest, before the public interest.
4. To disclose, disclose, disclose.

These are worthy standards and are useful for measuring the regular day-in, day-out performance of a newspaper.

Does it report honestly and accurately?

Does it report fearlessly but fairly?

Does it put the public interest before its own interest?

Does it disclose wrong-doing as a public watchdog should?

If a newspaper meets these standards then it is exercising freedom of the press in a responsible manner and is entitled to claim with justification that it represents the public interest. However, if a newspaper fails to meet these standards then it is derelict in public duty and cannot claim to represent the public interest. Instead it is abusing freedom of the press and betraying a public trust.

Editorial integrity is something that a newspaper must earn by performance. The newspaper that lacks editorial integrity will also lack, and deservedly so, the confidence and respect and support of thinking people.

When we talk about freedom of the press, what kind of freedom are we talking about? Francis Williams in his book "Dangerous Estate" goes into this question very thoroughly and I believe it of value to quote his remarks at some length:

"It is useless to criticise the press without relation to its trading position. But terms of trade are not all. The freedom of the press does not exist in order that newspaper owners should grow rich. It is not a possession of newspapers or their proprietors or editors but of the community; won by many who were not journalists, as well as many who were, during that long struggle for freedom of religion, opinion and association and for the independence of Parliament, judiciary and press on which our democratic society rests. Those responsible for a newspaper are in a different position from those responsible for a business who may properly govern their activities by what is commercially advantageous to themselves, their employees and their shareholders: they have inherited other calls on their fidelity. A newspaper must sell to live, but it cannot claim that what sells most is by that fact alone justified. It has other obligations: obligations to the past, for newspapers would never have known independence if earlier men had not been ready to sacrifice themselves for principle; obligations to the present and the future, for the press is as much a custodian of national freedom and the qualities of civilisation as Parliament or the courts. It cannot turn its back on these obligations without reducing its stature, for it is on them that its stature depends.

"Those who control or write for newspapers have no more right to claim immunity from the historical responsibilities of their office on the excuse that these responsibilities come between them and commercial advantage than have Members of Parliament or judges: the positions of all three in our society are analogous, just as the independence of the press was won in the same struggle as that for a free Parliament and an independent judiciary. The journalist is not buttressed as they are by constitutional safeguards; his status and the principles which must govern him in the exercise of his duties are less firmly rooted in acknowledged tradition and less clearly defined. Unlike them he is a hybrid, a Janus with two faces, a two-purpose beast. He has commercial obligations they do not have. But he has obligations to society not less important than theirs. It is by the manner and degree in which these dual demands are reconciled that the press is properly to be judged. The nature of the reconciliation is not the same for every age, nor is it the same for all newspapers. But its compulsion exists for all and at all times."

Of the submissions made to your Senate Committee I was most impressed by the observations of Mr. B. H. Honderich, President and Publisher of The Toronto Star, as reported January 31 this year by the Canadian Press in the Edmonton Journal. I should like to quote a few passages from that report:

"He (Mr. Honderich) told the special Senate committee on mass media that there is 'a sort of contradiction' in newspapers between their motives as a profit-seeking business and their responsibility in maintaining a free flow of information and stimulating public discussion.

"The approach a publisher takes towards balancing the conflict of interests determines the newspaper's quality", he said."

This is a crucial point. Newspapers are commercial ventures and must make a profit if they are to survive but the danger is that they can become so profit-oriented that their other rule of informing and enlightening the public may be diminished.

The Commercial nature of their operation identifies newspapers with the business community. Yet they must speak for the whole community and not just the business community or they fail in their responsibilities to the public.

In the words of Lord Pearce, independent Chairman of Britain's Press Council: "It is essential to the freedom of the individual that he should have the press as a spokesman of their rights." But he added that the press has a corresponding duty in maintaining standards to keep the freedom to which it is entitled.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think that Senator Quart will begin the questions.

Senator Quart: Alderman Evans, you were talking about reporting of your municipal council. It has been said many times it is much more difficult to be elected to municipal Council than it is to be elected to the House of Commons. Well, that has been said many times. It is to your credit what I have heard.

Alderman Evans: I tried to be elected to the House of Commons and I was unsuccessful. I would have to say it was the other way about really.

Senator Quart: Do you find reporting of the municipal council and your contribution (and I am sure you make a very valuable contribution in participation in municipal affairs) do you find you get the same kind of publicity as the councillors of the male sex? I am not an ultra feminist but I am wondering if you feel that?

Alderman Evans: I don't really think it makes any difference. I never felt that there was a differentiation whatever. I think it is the importance of what you say. There are flamboyant municipal councillors of both sexes and certainly they garner their share of publicity in equal amounts and similarly perhaps people with a soft sell approach, or softer approach, more reasonable type of approach. I don't think that is a factor.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: I would like to open discussion of the TV coverage in your municipal government and your thoughts on that aspect of news coverage. By the way, when did they institute that program?

Alderman Evans: That is about five years now.

Senator Sparrow: Would you be able to tell us whether there is better municipal coverage now because of the TV cameras? Do you feel it is more creditable coverage than perhaps newspapers?

Alderman Evans: I don't really think you can compare television coverage with newspaper coverage because of the lasting coverage of a newspaper as opposed to the fleeting kind of coverage which is possible for TV cameras. You can only capsule what happens on TV. You could have a rather lengthy story of the same debate in the press. I don't think you can equate them in those terms. However in Edmonton, particularly where there is only one daily, I think the television coverage then becomes the competition that another newspaper would provide and the same is true, I suppose, to a degree, of the radio coverage. I think certainly that television coverage has made a much greater awareness of civic affairs than took place previously and it does not in any way inhibit debate nor I think after an initial settling down does it mean once you realize the cameras are on you you are going to go on forever because once you become boring they will cut off too. I think it has had a salutary effect.

Senator Sparrow: Are the cameras working a great deal of the time when council is in session or is it interviews after?

Alderman Evans: Both. The set-up is that the mayor and commissioners are in a situation like this. The aldermen facing like yourself and the press bunch right behind and we have a microphone plug-in for tape recorders of the radio station so they are taping the debate and it makes for very lively coverage.

Senator Sparrow: And there would be no grand standing of the aldermen in Edmonton that I would be aware of, knowing them all!

Alderman Evans: Politicians are politicians.

Senator Sparrow: Charles Templeton, on a "Thursday Night" program in January, said survey after survey indicated that TV news is more creditable than newspapers. Would you say that is true in municipal coverage?

Alderman Evans: No. I don't think that you can measure the credibility of one against the other. Television coverage is a fleeting thing. It may serve to focus public interest on a certain discussion in council. I would suggest that the public who are interested then go to the newspapers to follow up the more complete report of that particular issue. I have found sometimes that there is a different emphasis put by the television station. Sometimes the press might not cover a particular discussion of council whereas both of your television stations do. I can't see any reason for this but this has been observed from time to time.

The Chairman: Senator Everett.

Senator Everett: I am referring to the quotation of Lord Francis Williams about the special responsibility of the press. Do you have any thoughts on how this responsibility can be ensured?

Alderman Evans: No, I don't. The tradition of the press itself really should ensure it but one really has to wonder if this is a tradition which will continue to endure. I think by and large it has to date. I think this is the best guarantee. I may say, Mr. Chairman, that I think this kind of self examination which your Committee is bringing about of the press itself is the kind of examination which the press gives to many issues on which it reports. The focusing of the public attention will certainly serve to strengthen that newspaper tradition on the part of the newspaper people themselves. It does seem to me that there is a bettering of the standards of our local paper in the latter months and whether it is the outcome of this or not I don't know. It is difficult to guarantee this kind of thing by other than the standard of the press itself. Of course, you may be referring to press councils and this sort of thing, which I think would be helpful.

Senator Everett: It was really to get your ideas of how it might be ensured. Dalton Camp this afternoon said, I think, that the press should be left alone and that the check on the press is the reader really, the person who is influenced by the press. Professor McCormack, on the other hand, in her submission, which I think you heard...

Alderman Evans: I heard part of it, yes.

Senator Everett: Feels there has to be stronger alliances with trade unions and other non-profit organizations; a foundation willing to support a prestige press and so forth and so on. She almost finds herself on the other side from Dalton Camp. I wonder where you feel you would stand on the matter?

Alderman Evans: I suppose somewhere in the middle.

The Chairman: That is spoken like a true Liberal.

Senator Everett: What did you say your last majority was?

Alderman Evans: 45,000! I don't really see the newspaper in alliance with organizations such as trade councils and those sort of things. I think their independence certainly has to be preserved. I don't think they can be left alone by public opinion. I think they must be subject to the same kind of public scrutiny, which as I said previously, their focusing on events brings to the events themselves. I think that this will probably be the greatest balancing factor but it is not something that, you know, can be just left to happenstance. I suppose symposiums on the press in local communities, panels on responsibilities of the press by extension departments of universities, by people in public bodies, if you like, will serve to make the press aware that there is a concern and hopefully they would react in a responsible manner to this kind of opinion.

Senator Everett: Do you think that a chain ownership or a normal ownership, cross-media ownership makes the problem of the special responsibility harder to solve or does it really matter?

Alderman Evans: Oh, I think it does make it harder to solve, particularly the cross-ownership of media, and then even more particularly when the media ownership is combined with other business interests, communications industries and this sort of thing. When you have a strong commercial enterprise combined with ownership of the media, naturally pressing towards a business orientation would be much harder for a newspaper to resist.

Senator Everett: Have you any concrete proposals in that direction?

Alderman Evans: No, I haven't.

Senator Everett: I gather you are fairly satisfied with the situation that obtains in Edmonton?

Alderman Evans: Oh, I would not say I was satisfied with it but I don't know what can be done. I think that the situation there is not too unhealthy a situation because you have so many radio stations who do serve as a balance to your TV and newspaper. I don't think the kinds of cross-ownership exist to the degree they do elsewhere. There are possibilities, for instance, of some of the radio stations competing for cable television licences. I don't know what effect this would have if cable television were allowed. It is not a situation which seems to me to reflect that much in the kinds of coverage and the orientation to the business community. I think this is a general identity of interest with the business community which reflects in the overall attitude of the press and the coverage that is given.

The Chairman: Is this a fair question to ask you or are you giving away trade secrets if we ask you to make a comment on the CBC? When did you leave the Board of Governors?

Alderman Evans: In May of last year.

The Chairman: Would you care to make any comment on the CBC? I am sure the Committee would be interested in opinions.

Alderman Evans: I don't think I want to say anything in a national sense since I am dealing with the municipal level. I was only on the Board for a year and resigned for personal reasons. The local coverage, I think perhaps the training of CBC news people in Edmonton at any rate I would say is superior to the general training of the radio stations and the newspaper.

The newspaper has some highly qualified reporters but this is not a general state and I think the situation is perhaps worse at the radio station level and this may be due to the pay scales. There is certainly a protection of tenure in the CBC that is not possible to reporters in the radio business or the newspaper business in Edmonton because of union membership. Also I think there is a possibility of a continuing career with the CBC, which I think the previous speaker touched on. People who are coming in and out of the trade. I don't think in the CBC—and this again is a purely local observation—you see it as a stepping stone into public relations or into some other field. It becomes a career in itself. I think this used to be true of the newspaper business but the turnover of reporters in Edmonton at any rate would seem to indicate that there is not the dedication to newspaper work as a continuing career that obtained even twenty years ago.

The Chairman: Is there an underground newspaper in Edmonton?

Alderman Evans: Not at the moment.

The Chairman: Has there been one?

Alderman Evans: Briefly.

The Chairman: Has it gone out of business?

Alderman Evans: Yes.

The Chairman: There is none now?

Alderman Evans: No.

The Chairman: Have any of the other Senators questions to ask?

Senator Sparrow: In quoting Lord Francis Williams on page 6 of your Brief you mention:

"Williams defines the traditional, historic, responsibility of the press as follows:

1. To report honestly.
2. To comment fearlessly.
3. To put no interest, including self-interest, before the public interest.
4. To disclose, disclose, disclose."

Then it goes on... These are worthy standards. Are you still quoting him "These are worthy standards"?

Alderman Evans: No, that is mine.

Senator Sparrow: The four questions you ask:

"Does it report honestly and accurately?"

Can you answer "Yes" or "No" to each question of your local press? I would ask you your opinion of the press on a national basis?

Alderman Evans: No. I am not trying to be political when I say "Not always". I don't think you can give a "Yes" or "No" answer. I don't think it always does report honestly and accurately. I don't know if you are looking for examples. I could cite some if you want that type of thing.

The Chairman: Why don't you go ahead?

Alderman Evans: This doesn't deal with a municipal story. There was a case of the Treasury branches in Alberta before the Supreme Court of Canada and there was a split decision on the validity of the Treasury Branches. The front page headline was "Treasury Branches Illegal" and then the lead of the story. You got to the third paragraph and you found this was a minority opinion of the Court. This is a rather glaring example of this kind of thing. It doesn't happen too often but that type of thing really cannot be an honest or accurate reflection of that particular decision.

Fearlessly but fairly...I think it tries and I would suspect looks on itself as a fearless press but again I cannot cite an instance of courageous journalism of the kind which obtained by the Edmonton Journal in 1935 when it won a Pulitzer prize for coverage of the Social Credit phenomenon in Alberta.

Does it put the public interest before its own interest? Again I think it probably conscientiously tries but it is, I suppose, a psychological equation with the interest of the business community as opposed to the broad segment.

Does it disclose wrong-doing as a public watchdog should? Again I think it tries but not in the old sense of journalism.

I have said—To disclose, disclose, disclose. There is a movement in Western Canada at the moment and since you are from a neighbouring province you may have heard of it. It is a Committee which is formed in Calgary to research whether Western Canada can stand as an independent entity and yet the papers have said that this is a broadly-based Committee in the City of Calgary and yet only one name has been mentioned. The backers have not been disclosed.

The Chairman: Who are the backers, do you know?

Alderman Evans: I don't know. The statement has been made by people opposed to this, even this kind of research, and one wonders if...

Senator Sparrow: Is it one Prairie Province you are speaking of? Is that the Committee?

Alderman Evans: No; whether Western Canada could stand as a separate entity.

The Chairman: Have you heard any names mentioned as a backer?

Alderman Evans: No. The question has been raised in Edmonton: Are these American oil interests? It seems to me a legitimate question for the press to answer.

The Chairman: Does the press know?

Alderman Evans: I don't know but there is not any evidence they have attempted to give that answer to the public anyway. This is the kind of think I mean when I say "Disclose, disclose". Don't take the striking and not get down to the base of some of these problems.

The Chairman: I want to return very briefly to this question of municipal politics. You, as an Alderman, I am sure are interested in what is happening in municipal governments, in Toronto, Vancouver and Montreal. How do you find out? Through trade books?

Alderman Evans: You have to largely. Sometimes you will find it in The Financial Post. There might be something but it is really through trade and professional drills that you find it. For instance, we are embarking on a rapid transit and I would be interested in other municipal experiences in this field yet I would have to go probably to engineering journals to find articles.

Senator Sparrow: Would Civic Administration be one of the papers?

Alderman Evans: It is about the only one I can think of offhand that deals specifically with civic problems and solutions.

The Chairman: You could hardly expect the Edmonton Journal to carry news of the Toronto City Council.

Alderman Evans: No. For instance, the urban renewal programs in Halifax is something that might be of national interest. You do get coverage but it is just tidbit coverage—four and a half miles of Toronto transit going to cost 79.5 million dollars—capsule items. I find, for instance, and Senator Quart might bear me out on this, that on the women's pages you do have stories of sociological implications of experiments that are taking place in other parts of the country. This doesn't seem to carry in other areas. For instance: How does the City of Hamilton solve its pollution problem? What might Edmonton or Calgary learn from this? How are the water resources of the different provinces handled?

Senator Quart: That may be why so many men read the women's pages now. They do.

The Chairman: Do you think how Hamilton solves the pollution problem would be of interest in Edmonton?

Alderman Evans: Yes, I do. The kind of interest that is evidenced is that recently one of the members of Parliament had 68 hundred communications on pollution. That is a fairly widespread public interest on that particular problem. Now I don't know that you can expect the press to gauge—I suppose it should be able to gauge what is of public interest and give its readers stories of this kind.

The Chairman: Thank you. Are there other questions?

Senator Everett: Can you tell me if in your judgment the Edmonton Journal is doing a good job of educating the Edmonton public in urban problems? I am talking not about reporting what goes on elsewhere but the general urban problem of Edmonton?

Alderman Evans: I think not in terms of saying to itself: We will follow this program of general education in our urban problems on a systematic basis that here are transportation problems, here are communication problems.

Senator Everett: I am talking about a series of features?

Alderman Evans: No. I mentioned that perhaps municipal councils might do more themselves in giving seminars on background information on city utilities, transportation problems and problems of budgeting and this sort of thing. What the tax dollar means in terms of service to the individual taxpayer in terms of the amenities his community does provide him. This type of thing. It perhaps might be there could be a greater kind of co-operation fostered by municipal governments themselves to provide this kind of educational process.

The Chairman: Senator Quart has one little question.

Senator Quart: Alderman Evans, do you think that the average Canadian woman today is interested in the financial pages of the business section of newspapers? I am and I was wondering...

Senator Smith: You have a lot of money!

Senator Quart: No, I haven't.

Alderman Evans: No. I don't think the average Canadian woman is nor do I think the average Canadian man is.

Senator Quart: And the sports pages—don't you think women are interested in sports too? I am.

The Chairman: Do you think the average Canadian woman is interested in the average Canadian women's pages?

Alderman Evans: I think so because the women's pages are getting away from the traditional social coverage. They are getting down to really good articles: a series on day care centres, what is being done for disadvantaged children, programs of social service obtaining not only in the local community. I think the women's pages, certainly in Edmonton, are broader...

The Chairman: Do you think these things are as well read as the Astrology column?

Alderman Evans: I doubt they are as well read as Ann Landers.

The Chairman: Perhaps before we get into Ann Landers I might adjourn the meeting and before doing so I want to thank you, Mrs. Evans. Thank you for coming, we are very grateful.

Tomorrow morning at 10:00 o'clock we will be receiving the brief from the Graphic Arts Industries Association. At 11:15 a brief from Professor Thomas L. McPhail, Department of Sociology and Communication Arts at Loyola University.

I am sure the Senators know there is a very important meeting at 2:30 tomorrow with Pierre Juneau and the C.R.T.C.

The meeting is adjourned, thank you.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Thursday, March 5, 1970.

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10:00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

BRIEF OF GRAPHIC ARTS INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the meeting to order. This morning we received a brief from the Graphic Arts Industries Association. Seated on my immediate right is the General Manager, Mr. David Maclellan. On his immediate right is Mr. Pierre Des Marais, Vice-President of the Association. On my left is a member of the Association Dr. Melvin O. Edwardh.

Mr. Maclellan has explained to me that although he is going to be the chief spokesman now that that had really not been the intention of the Association. The chief spokesman was to have been Mr. Donald Alloway. Mr. Alloway may yet arrive but unhappily he was flying from Boston to Montreal and could not land so he may be in Boston or in Montreal and he may be here or he may not. We are sorry. I understand there was a request that we might delay this hearing until 11:00 o'clock and perhaps hear the other briefs later but that has not been possible because we could not contact the other witness. I know you are sorry that Mr. Alloway is not here and so are we.

The brief which was requested was received and presumably read by the Senators. It has been circulated to them. I would suggest that you could now make an oral statement on anything you might wish to say and then we will turn to the questions on your oral statement and perhaps some of the things in your brief. Thank you for coming.

Mr. David Maclellan, General Manager of Graphic Arts Industries Association: Thank you, Senator Davey. If I could explain very briefly, our Chairman, Mr. Alloway, is much more knowledgeable than I or perhaps the rest of us from the standpoint of our Association because he is both a substantial printer and one who is very largely involved in printing educational material. Mr. Des Marais, on my right, is a large printer operating in Quebec and Dr. Edwardh is Vice-President Publishing and a Director of W. J. Gage Limited, a very large textbook publisher.

Now our feeling is, if there is a mass medium in our society, that it is the textbook or educational materials generally. When we are educating young people en masse many things flow from this. While our initial interest is obvious as printers and manufacturers of materials we have tried to approach this on the plane of Canadian citizenship and the impact of the mass medium and the origin of the mass medium in this context.

Now I have a brief summary which I might refer to but it has not been circulated, sir.

The Chairman: The Senators have it now.

Mr. Maclellan: I will just read it:

"This brief opposes the growing domination of mass instruction in Canadian schools, colleges, and universities which is being imposed by educational materials which originate in a culture other than our own, which lack Canadian facts and a Canadian point of view, and which also serve in many cases to promote the national interests of another country.

We recommend that this Special Senate Committee should

(a) urge the Department of Education in each province to seek reasonable, appropriate ways and means of encouraging Canadian authorship at all levels of education;

(b) urge the Canada Council to make grants to qualified Canadian scholars for research and writing directed to the preparation of text and reference books, with excellence and Canadian orientation as two of the criteria;

(c) urge the existing council of provincial ministers of education, the individual provinces, and The Canada Council to explore cost-sharing formulae with Canadian book publishers, since genuinely Canadian works of high standard—whether in English or French—should reasonably be expected to be used by several or many provinces; and

(d) urge the entire educational community, and all professors and teachers in particular, to seek and to use aids to study and teaching which honour the heritage of Canada and reflect those qualities in Canadian life which persuade the majority of our people to live out their lives as citizens of this great land, which commands and deserves our common allegiance."

We have put our recommendations at the end of the brief. We recognize that the field of education is a provincial one but on the other hand there is a need for public awareness and perhaps for awareness in the Senate and in the Parliament of Canada and in the Parliament of the Provinces for focusing attention on this problem today. Some encouragement might be given to the provinces to take initiatives to co-operate to help to redress the balance in Canada's favour.

Therefore, Senator Davey, we bring the problem to you and as I understand you have read the brief I won't recapitulate all the details. I do want to emphasize that there is a dearth of reliable statistics involving printed materials in this country. If you want very detailed statistical evidence it is difficult to obtain. Our own Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is just now commissioning a depth study of the book industry at substantial expense in order to find out more detail factual information. So very largely we have to deal in terms of general knowledge and this is where we are at the moment, sir.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Maclellan.

Perhaps I may be allowed to make a very brief explanatory statement. When I made my original speech in the Senate last February, I did not include within the terms of reference book publishing, either generally or textbooks. I think that perhaps this may have been a mistake on my part; although the Senators knowing the schedule may be delighted I did not include books. Nor did I include films. In any event, our terms of reference do not encompass a study of the book publishing industry, films, or textbooks. Notwithstanding that we are delighted you are here and welcome you.

You have made a point, it seems to me, that textbooks are in fact part of the mass media so the point of explanation I make is in no sense to say you are not welcome. We are delighted you are here and we are certainly going to have questions for you. I do think you should understand that many of the points you are making, quite apart from provincial ramifications, perhaps are without our terms of reference. Notwithstanding that we will proceed.

Mr. Maclellan: Perhaps I might say in reply, Senator Davey, we did understand this when we discussed our appearance and we have in the brief tried to deal with the larger picture of education today. We are in the area of television and many other things whereas in the past educational aids consisted entirely of printed matter. Here we are faced with a changing technology which blurs the lines and definitions.

The Chairman: This was no doubt an oversight on my part but I just thought we should have our position on the record and we are delighted you are here. Senator Sparrow I think has the first question.

Senator Sparrow: Perhaps the delegation, with your explanation, will bear with us in not having really studied the background of textbooks, particularly the reference to school textbooks in Canada.

I might say that it is a very interesting brief and the first one we have had in this particular line. Although, as the Chairman said, it really is not in our terms of reference, I think it is going to be valuable for us to have some background on this.

To extend verbally from your brief as such and being aware that we are not in fact reviewing or studying this particular aspect, have you recommendations to make as to what the media, that we are in fact studying, could do in this regard—like newspapers, TV and radio—to extend their services, to at least try and cover these areas of concern that you have. What can they do?

Mr. Maclellan: I think, Senator Sparrow, the answer would be very simple, although we have not framed a recommendation here I would be quite correct in inter preting the feeling of our industry in that anything the mass media, in the context you are referring to, could do to enlighten Canadians on this subject will be a tremendous contribution to our society. Many, perhaps, are aware of particular educational materials that are not Canadian and may have expressed opinions about this. Whether they realize the magnitude of the problem is another matter and here I think our newspapers and television and so on could do a great service in acquainting people of the facts, whether they hold an official position or are ordinary citizens.

Senator Sparrow: Are you familiar with educational television in Canada and do you have any recommendations in that regard, bearing in mind the provincial responsibility and the national TV?

Mr. Maclellan: We would not officially have opinions on this. It may be that Dr. Edwardh, a man who has spent his life in the educational field, might have some personal comments. I don't know.

The Chairman: Dr. Edwardh?

Dr. Melvin O. Edwardh, Member of Association: I have some very strong prejudices from my experience on educational television in Canada. I think we have neither extended the energy, the money or the talent to produce a quality that will grip the youngsters in the classroom. This is a very broad jurisdiction and I think we are learning but we have a long way to go to get the quality that is necessary.

May I refer, Senator Sparrow, to your first question? Another strong feeling that I have, I am concerned that the scholarship of Canada is encouraged and that they have a chance to speak and have the time to look at the Canadian scene. I think that the other media have a great responsibility to give time and money to give us this scholarship about Canada and in this way the values which are Canadian will come through and the myth which comes from abroad will be dispelled.

Senator Sparrow: What can the newspapers themselves do to counteract this, this non-Canadian content as far as textbooks are concerned? Do you feel newspapers are doing a good job in this field and if not what areas can they do a better job in?

The newspapers tell us they have a school program as such and there are current event classes in school and so on and the newspapers feel they are playing a part in this. Do you buy this?

Dr. Edwardh: They do have this part. Let me put it in the context I see developing. I think the schools of Canada in the next ten years will spend a great deal of time on Canadian issues and Canadian problems. To get the resources and information to study this intelligently and evaluate it is very difficult in many of the schools. The information is outdated very quickly. I think the newspapers could carry documentaries of information on some of these issues as well as TV and educational television.

Let us talk about urban problems, the Indian problem, the problem of pollution. We get articles that express opinions without the evidence that I think is necessary to give youngsters a chance to be critical and assess the situation. I would like to see scholarship in the newspapers and national magazines done by scholars in the field.

Senator Sparrow: You refer, of course, to the influx of predominantly American textbooks, more so in the last few years. Originally you suggested it was an influx of English material. I would not gather from your brief you are suggesting any legislation to prohibit this but it is a matter of trying to encourage greater Canadian participation in the writing of Canadian text. What about the influx of American primarily and again to a degree English teachers and professors in our school system? What stand should be taken in that regard? Do you have a particular stand on that? Are you just saying discourage this influx?

Mr. Maclellan: As far as the Association is concerned we have no inclination to prohibit anything. We recognize this is a free society and we hope in the free part of the world. We trade with other countries and we hope to export Canadian materials. We are not thinking of prohibiting. We are trying to look at the positive side with regard to American teachers and professors in our educational institutions. At the moment statistics are not abundant. We do refer to the Matthews and Steele book and feel that it is only human and cultural that the American professors will give as assigned reading materials with which they are familiar and these almost inevitably will be American text. This is bound to happen but as for statistical proof at the moment we cannot hand this to you.

There is reference here, as I say, to the Matthews and Steele book and we have, I think, referred to a particular page, the first page, about the number of university teachers who are Canadian and who are non-Canadian. We would leave it to you to draw a reasonable conclusion.

Senator Sparrow: You make reference to the fact that an American teacher or professor has a tendency to use American texts because they are familiar with them and familiar with the authors.

Mr. Maclellan: He might or might not. I would assume the average American professor coming here would not be familiar with MacGregor Dawson's works on Canadian Government or other Canadian works on Political Science.

Senator Davey, may I interrupt to say that Mr. Alloway, our Chairman, has just arrived.

The Chairman: Mr. Alloway, welcome. Because of our timetable we have been forced to proceed without you. About the only thing I should update you on is a statement I made at the beginning. Much of the material covered within your brief probably falls outside our terms of reference. Notwithstanding that fact, we are delighted you are here and we are interested in the points you are making. Perhaps the fact that book publishing, for example, is not within our terms of reference is my fault. It is regrettable but those are the facts. This is the framework under which we exist. Subject to that qualification we have been proceeding and in your absence Dr. Edwardh and Mr. Maclellan I think have been performing satisfactorily. Perhaps we could continue the questioning. Should we now direct questions to Mr. Alloway?

Mr. Maclellan: I think that would be proper. We may want to bounce the questions back and forth.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow, will you proceed then?

Senator Sparrow: I will ask a supplementary and then I will pass. With the potential or further potential of educational TV as such that we would expect to see to a much greater extent, the use of it in the future, will this to a degree allay your fears as far as the importation of text from outside the country? Will that solve the problem to a degree at least, as long as there are controls as far as the content, will this help solve the problem?

Mr. Maclellan: I would think certainly, sir, the greater use of valid Canadian material the greater help it will be in solving the problem. From a selfish standpoint perhaps I might regret that more printed material is not being used which would cause greater employment in manufacturing plants but that is a selfish consideration. Mr. Alloway?

Mr. Donald Miller Alloway, Senior Vice-President of Association: We don't see any significant trend which would reduce the volume of printed media in educational fields; notwithstanding Mr. McLuhan and increase in the use of electronic media. Historical trends that are studied by our industry and being projected in America particularly would indicate the print media in the educational field will continue to increase along with and be a companion to the electronic media.

The Chairman: Perhaps I could put this to you, Mr. Alloway: You indicate throughout your brief that the problems you are talking about really pertain far less in Quebec. Could you discuss that with us?

Mr. Alloway: I think Mr. Des Marais...

The Chairman: This is less of a problem in Quebec?

Mr. Pierre Des Marais, Vice-President of Association: We had decided not to go too deeply...

The Chairman: Would you prefer to speak in French?

Mr. Des Marais: Have you the facilities?

The Chairman: Yes, by all means. Just give us a moment. I think we are ready now.

[Translation]

Mr. Des Marais: Our presentation purposely does not deal with the Quebec situation in this matter. As far as the question is concerned, it is obvious that educational television is at the same level for Quebec as the rest of Canada. I entirely share the opinion of Mr. Holloway that no matter what McLuhan says, the coming of educational television will not reduce our consumption of printed matter, whether it is school books or what concerns us right now.

[English]

Is this the answer to your question?

The Chairman: Not really. I think there is less reliance presumably, in Quebec on American material.

[Translation]

Mr. Des Marais: Of course, we are less subject to a direct confrontation considering the language. However, we have other problems. I should like to emphasize once again that we did not think it appropriate to include in today's presentation these special problems that may probably be of the same nature as those, for instance, of France. It is obvious that in television there aren't that many problems. From the point of view of the material itself, it's a different problem and one that in its outline is the same as that of our English-speaking compatriots, but is different because the material is perhaps more difficult to obtain. Distance certainly has something to do with it.

[English]

The Chairman: Mr. Alloway, I was interested in the brief again, not reading specifically but just recalling it. I read it several times. If the problem pertains less in Quebec it pertains more in British Columbia. Is that a fair statement? If it is a fair statement why would that be the case?

Mr. Alloway or Dr. Edwardh?

Dr. Edwardh: I think it is historic in the West. Let me say that most of the graduate students before ten years ago took their graduate work in the United States so connections were made very definitely and specifically and this influence came back. They were trained at Stanford, Berkley and Oregon. I think this is the major reason. The British influence in the West—maybe I should not include British Columbia in this as much as Alberta and Saskatchewan—was never as strong as it was in the East. Our educational system developed under the impact of developments in the United States.

Mr. Maclellan: I wonder if I might add something, Senator Davey? Obviously there have been inducements for perhaps more Canadian material in the French language to be produced. For example, during the last war reading material was not available from France. This would encourage French language publishing in Canada. I might also observe with regard to English language that those of us in my generation will recall we grew up with many English publications available such as Boy's Own, Girl's Own, Chum, Chatterbox—this type of thing. This was in general use in Canada. Then in the latter 1920's the American material came in: American magazines, American radio, American movies, there was more travel to the United States, and latterly American television. So that at no point it would seem to be economically possible to develop the distinctive Canadian material in English. We were just from the British influence shifted to the American influence. We are still struggling to bring forward the Canadian identity, the Canadian material.

Senator Beaubien: As long as each province buys or can direct the buying of textbooks it would seem to me to be the simplest thing in the world to control the Canadian content. If you can try and control the Canadian content over the year when people can listen to American stations and all that ...after all surely the provinces all buy their own books and they buy books in a large enough volume that it would make it economic to turn them out.

Mr. Maclellan: I believe in some cases you have to deal with school boards. To answer your question more specifically, not long ago I happened to meet at breakfast the Minister of Education for New Brunswick, the Chairman of the Provincial Council of Education Ministers from the provinces. He indicated a lively awareness of this problem. I had told him that we expected to appear before the Committee and would be suggesting the Provincial Education Ministers might co-operate. For instance, why shouldn't Quebec and New Brunswick and Ontario collaborate with French language material and help develop the material here.

Senator Smith: And Nova Scotia as well?

Mr. Maclellan: And Nova Scotia as well, even in Liverpool.

The Chairman: How does everyone know where you are from!

Mr. Maclellan: By the same token English language material. Perhaps a greater awareness and willingness to co-operate...

Mr. Alloway: Senator Davey, Senator Beaubien mentioned the economics being satisfactory to support the volume of books in any given province. This is not in fact so. The volume of textbooks required and the proliferation of titles and obsolescence of knowledge and general reduction in the length of runs that has taken place in the last few years has created an economic problem which the Americans are very well able to capitalize on.

I listened to the Director of Curriculum from British Columbia say to the textbook publishers that he was himself not happy with the quality of Canadian textbooks being offered and in fact was going to buy more and more from the United States. In addition, the Federal Department of Education in the United States has granted very very large sums to authors to subsidize the production of a science series which are being used in Canadian schools because there is no authorship that can cope or compete with the kind of quality that comes to these particular books.

Senator Beaubien: The quality is so excellent?

Mr. Alloway: Yes.

Senator Beaubien: If the quality is so excellent, we should not complain. It seems to me that the Ministers of Education for the ten provinces could get together and work something out. They could pick, I should think, the best works and have them produced in Canada and put in whatever Canadian content they wanted.

Senator Sparrow: I think you made reference in your brief that texts such as mathematics or science is not really your concern. That is an international type of subject and that really is not a matter of concern where that is written or produced.

Dr. Edwardh: May I qualify that a little? I think in the physical sciences per se I would have no concern. I think we should gather the best scholarship, the best quality, because the cultural biases are not shown. If you are talking about elementary science where you are developing an understanding of the flora and fauna in your own country I think that it is too bad that youngsters in the provinces study the flora and fauna of Arizona and California. There is an area where there is room for some Canadian publisher.

May I also reflect on the quality, because you have touched on prejudices of mine. I am not debating the quality of some of the new science materials that have come out from the United States after 18 or 25 or 50 million dollars, in some cases, spent on research. They are excellent materials. But we have just as capable authors in many cases but we haven't this aura of research around the project and research is the magical word today and sometimes we bow down before it when really a little further investigation would show it had little relationship to the final quality. So there is a problem here about the aura of research backed by millions of dollars.

Senator Beaubien: You are not suggesting that we spend 50 million dollars, are you, in turning out the books?

Dr. Edwardh: My question is we have to spend a reasonable amount of money on research and testing with the students but certainly we don't need to spend that sum to give us the quality necessary.

Senator Beaubien: We could do as well on less, you think?

Mr. Maclellan: It might be noted that since Sputnik the Americans have become so concerned about education at the Federal level they have pumped billions of dollars into education. A lot of this has gone into the textbook field and there has been a tremendous stimulus to book publishing in the United States. This, of course, again spills over into Canada. There has been a great deal of pump priming at the Federal level in the United States. Of course, our jurisdictional problems are different.

The Chairman: I think Senator McElman indicated he wanted to ask a question.

Senator McElman: It is a supplementary question on the matter of quality. Getting away for a moment from the quality of the research and the material itself and turning to the quality of the material that you use for communicating—that is the book itself. Has any consideration been given by your industry or in consort with education departments to producing in the paperback quality rather than the tremendously expensive hard cover glossy page type of book that is almost totally used in the schools; taking into account the tremendous increases in the cost of education and the problem this is throughout the whole of our nation and throughout the Continent.

Dr. Edwardh: I am just quoting from memory but I think we spend about 1½ per cent of the educational budget on instructional materials, which is a very small per cent. Most of the provinces of Canada have rental schemes worked out related to books and they specify hard cover books to last three and four years. The feeling is this is really more economic than paperbacks. Paperbacks themselves—if you put the quality into the diagrams and the illustrations and you use a quality paper that will last three or four years that is required of a paperback—that is not that much cheaper than the hard back book. I think if I were running 30,000 copies of a 300 page book and putting the same quality paper, print and diagrams in, I might arrive at a differential of about 40-cents a book and in terms of economics over three or four years there is no economics involved. It is more expensive in many cases.

Mr. Maclellan: A very large volume of re-binding is done in the provinces. This is a business in itself—rebinding school books.

Senator McElman: I have one supplementary for Mr. Des Marais: I notice at one point in the brief on page 3 it says:

“French Canada escapes the saturation of American educational materials because of its magazines, textbooks and television are distinctly French-Canadian. Recently, however, it was reported by Mr. Paul Gérin-Lajoie that Quebec is in the process of becoming a colony of the French publishing industry.”

It goes on to speak about cultural agreements and so on and the term “dumping” is used of French books into Quebec.

Could you elaborate a bit on that and perhaps suggest what solutions your industry has to this?

Mr. Des Marais: Well, Senator, this is an excerpt of a newspaper account. I am not sure exactly in what context it was said. If I might give you my personal answer to your question we, of course, have similar problems as far as manufacturing is concerned and this is the only aspect on which I want to answer at this moment.

The manufacturing aspect is that France, having such agreements with Canada in regard to the export of school books—and I am referring to the absence of any duties of any kind—they have been able to publish some books in France in great quantity and export a very small part of this quantity into Quebec at a much lower price than we could ever expect to produce them.

Really the complete answer to this question would bring me into a discussion of Federal-Provincial jurisdiction and I don't feel that I am in a position to express opinions on this particular problem.

Again manufacturing-wise this is our only concern as far as the Graphic Arts Industries Association is concerned. We would like to produce more in Canada either French or English. As far as French is concerned we have had, particularly since the end of the war, the wrong end of the deal and we are, I may say, under the cover of French-Quebec cultural exchanges, we are very cautious of not losing any manufacturing advantage that we would have, the very minor manufacturing advantage we would have at this time.

This is a problem that is right in the middle of a huge crisis and depends so much on other aspects so far away from manufacturing it is completely outside the scope of the Graphic Arts Industries Association.

Senator McElman: The reason I raise this is that in English language text we have permitted ourselves to reach a disadvantageous point with the great influx of American books and it would seem that perhaps we are just starting into a similar situation and that one should have constructive suggestions to make as to how to prevent this. Instead of Americanization we have the French influence overly stressed in the French language. I was wondering if any of your people have any thoughts as to this? Obviously it is not practical because of the agreements to erect tariff walls, because of the agreements themselves it would be one government policy against another. Is there anything else that is useful from your standpoint that you could do or the government could do?

Mr. Des Marais: Senator, if I may refer you to an organization which is a group of French-Canadian publishers. They have been very very active on this problem and to my knowledge they have not suggested at this time any particular way or means of coping with the problem. I know for a fact they are taking a very serious look at the so-called cultural accord between Quebec and France. They are worried from their standpoint and we, of course, from the manufacturing standpoint; but we have not come to any final conclusions or resolutions on this problem.

Mr. Maclellan: Senator McElman, in answer to what you are saying I might draw attention to the publicity that appeared in the last few days arising from the meeting of the Canadian Teachers' Association. I have in front of me a clipping from the Montreal Gazette, a report in which they spoke about the crucial shortage of French language textbooks throughout Canada:

“The shortage has persisted for many years and there has been no noticeable effort by anyone to remedy the situation.”

The next paragraph says:

"Many French speaking students in Quebec are forced to use English textbooks or poor translations from American books."

Later it says:

"The delegates did manage to establish one thing. No publishing firm is going to put out books unless there is a profitable market or assistance by government subsidies."

The last paragraph:

"The idea of importing more texts from France was shunned by French delegates who insisted that textbook planning for Canada's French schools must bear in mind that French Canada is closely knit to North American trends and aspirations."

On the heels of this report there was a Canadian Press report, dateline Ottawa, and this intrigues me:

"The French language textbook publishers association promised on Saturday (the clipping is dated March 2nd) to produce books suitable for French students throughout Canada not just in Quebec. Peter Coffin, communications representative for the Canadian Teachers Federation, told reporters that the pledge came at the week-end Federation-sponsored Conference on French language texts. To date Quebec texts have not headed the curriculum of other provincial education systems. Instead French students have to rely on French translations of U.S. texts."

I must say when I read of the pledge to produce books suitable for French students throughout Canada I wondered about the economics and how we were going to do this because as the other story mentioned no publishing firm is going to put out a book unless it has a profitable market or is subsidized.

Senator McElman: I understand the economics of short-runs and long-runs and so on. Certainly there is not any scarcity in the Province of Quebec of scholars to produce material. I think we can accept that immediately. So it has to be economics. What constructive action has the Government of Quebec taken or does it propose to take to assist your industry in overcoming the economic problem?

Mr. Des Marais: Senator, I know of no action at this time. I know it is under study. As far as I can say for the time being I know they are studying it at our request, this particular problem. There has been no action.

Senator McElman: Nothing of the equivalent of Canada Council grants or anything of that nature?

Mr. Des Marais: Not as far as textbooks are concerned. In a very minor way as far as other publications of books—novels or essays are concerned.

Senator Smith: May I ask a supplementary? How do you think the Province of Quebec, particularly the Minister of Education in Quebec, would view the action of the Canada Council giving a grant to someone to see if they could not produce French textbooks in the Province of Quebec? Would they accept money like that willingly if it were a feasible thing financially from the Federal point of view?

Mr. Des Marais: Senator, I would prefer not to answer. You are asking me to comment on what the Minister would have to say. Really I am not that close to the Minister or the Quebec Government.

Senator Smith: Perhaps it is a very sensitive area then.

Mr. Des Marais: It is.

Mr. Maclellan: And even if it is subsidized and the work is produced you have no assurance that the Quebec Government would accept the finished work and put it on the curriculum.

Senator Smith: That might be a good thing. It would have to stand on its own merits then.

Senator McElman: Even within the provinces you have a very distinct problem at the provincial level. There is no requirement within the curriculum that X book will be used throughout. Is that true?

Dr. Edwardh: I think that is true in most provinces. There are what we call multiple authorizations. A school can select from three or four series in a given area.

Senator McElman: What efforts are being made to improve on that situation? Or do you seek to improve from your standpoint?

Dr. Edwardh: I think educationally, if I may speak, and this is a personal opinion, I think this is found. I think you need a diversity of materials that is related to the needs of the children and the abilities of the teachers and although it might be strict in one sense in the other sense a series might be authorized as one of the four or more provinces. I am not sure this adds to the expenses or the risk involved.

Mr. Alloway: May I comment on that. There seems to be a trend towards proliferating the particular book for a particular province, even within a series. I am speaking from manufacturing and Dr. Edwardh from publishing. I see a book prepared with considerable care and then we see it as manufactured being slightly, and very slightly, amended for two or three provinces. The cost of reproducing this book, for example the Manitoba edition of a book, is a very tremendous cost in terms of the benefit that is to be gained, it seems to us as manufacturers.

I don't know how the pricing is handled at the publishing level but at the manufacturing level short run for a smaller province versus a larger province, if they pay their fair share, is a very heavy cost for making very few number of changes in a textbook. Rather than having a melding of books to suit a number of provinces the direction of the trend would seem to be going the other way.

Senator McElman: We have had some excellent research on how and what affects the mind of the very young. Dr. Wilder Penfield's works are outstanding in this regard. Emphasis is placed on those things that you want to last, to imprint them on the youthful mind, pre-school as well as primary. Now in view of I think the accepted fact that at that age level, the pre-school child, TV today is the one that is imprinted; and in primary it is comic books certainly that are imprinting. What effort is your industry making in this area to get Canadian content? Now certainly you are a graphic arts industry and you are interested in television material and you should also be interested in comics, although you are facing a flood of 25 million American. What are you doing in this area?

Mr. Alloway: Senator McElman, I am sorry this committee of the industry is not coming before you with a more positive and more optimistic note. I am glad you broaden the terms of reference to mention the pre-school and other areas of influence for the minds of our young people. The whole question I think that concerns this Committee is the mass media in Canada and in a broad sense books—not just educational books but books are certainly one of those influences and their volume in terms of dollars would suggest (A) they are mass media; and (B) increasingly coming from outside of Canada.

We are making in Canada, as an industry, books per capita about $1.50. In the United States they are making $5.00 per capita books. We know we are importing, by the channels we can measure, about $3.00 per capita and unless we are much more illiterate than Americans there is a gap we cannot measure.

I am suggesting to you that our industry is impoverished in terms of its capability to meet the economics of an industry that is overshadowing us in the United States to the tune of producing one billion dollars worth of books a year against our industry in Canada and we are importing three to one roughly in dollars at the factory level. I don't know the publishing level. I would even go beyond that to say in other areas where you get into the book magazine or however you call pamphlets and hard-bound magazines.

Yesterday I stood beside the mailing machine of a company that is importing Horizons. The machine stopped and I looked down and saw the name of a man I knew in Toronto, who is the information officer of a very large company. I knew his initials and address. He is receiving the magazine Horizons along with thousands of others produced by a firm American Heritage.

This is typical of the book or the book magazine. I thought it rather symbolic. Here we are a country and our horizon in terms of print media, books and pamphlets and magazines, is symbolized by American Heritage from Marion, Ohio, sending in something in the order of three times everything that is produced in Canada.

This influence is having a profound effect towards continentalism in our continent here both on the young and the old and to an extent I think this Commission would be well to think about and ponder even though we may not, per se as books, simply be within the terms of your reference.

Mr. Maclellan: While the examples may be isolated there has been very positive interest taken in producing Canadian material by a number of Canadian companies. I might mention the problem with cut-out material—colouring books and this type of thing that young children use. There is a lot of this stuff illustrated with American heroes and American tradition, the frontier image. Ralph Clark Stone Limited several years ago started moving into the field and producing folk colouring books and cut-out arrangements illustrating Canadian history and Canadian heroes that young children could use. I know the president of the company was very interested in trying to fill the vacuum with Canadian material.

Dr. Edwardh's company in the field of reference work has brought out in recent years three dictionaries: a junior dictionary, an intermediate dictionary and a senior dictionary. It was, I believe, an American dictionary to begin with but Canadianized and introducing Canadian words and expressions and using Canadian illustrations and suitable for reference use in schools from the lowest level up. The same company has produced a very handsomely bound book of Canadianisms.

From time to time I hear of other companies very interested in supporting something in the Canadian context. Of course, so often problems and answers are economic ones. There is an interest in this. This was encouraged a great deal by our Centennial celebrations. You will recall that 1967 saw a great many more things coming out in the Canadian historical context and then too in recent years we have seen many more Canadian pictorial books that young and old may enjoy. Some are even published by the National Film Board and others commercially published. There is some beautiful work. I hope we will see more and more. Today if you go into book stores although the preponderance of material is imported we do see a good deal more in the way of Canadian books than we did ten years ago. You can go to the two closest book stores and I guarantee you will see many more books today than you did ten years ago although it is still a small percentage of the total.

Senator McElman: You have mentioned something I was moving towards. The period of the Centennial, let us say 1966 to 1968, I was going to comment that it seemed to me the industry had missed a golden opportunity when feelings within Canada or pride was running at a much higher level than was ordinary and that although there were many prestige type of books published surely this was the time when your industry should have levelled in on something less than the prestige type of material and got to the younger people, the ones who are going to carry on the Canadian pride and the Canadian knowledge. Was there not a great opportunity missed or has it been missed?

Mr. Maclellan: I don't know it has been missed. I don't know that you can expect in one year, even with a centennial, to see the problem solved. Among our people, as amongst all Canadians, there is more and more conscious Canadianism and we have in recent years seen a trend to encourage more and more Canadian work, people taking pride in being Canadians and writing Canadian work and there is an appetite for it. If we missed something in 1966 to 1968 perhaps we will correct it in 1976 to 1978. I think there is a positive development here and as a Canadian I would hope that this is going to be encouraged in every possible way.

Senator McElman: Coming back to another area I mentioned a moment ago—comics. Each day in just about every home the newspaper comes in and the very young turn to the comics. That is about all they turn to and much as we older folk may enjoy Al Capp and Johnny Hart it is all American; isn't it?

Mr. Maclellan: Almost entirely.

Senator McElman: I recall a couple of years ago in my locality there were strips included with the comics that dealt with exciting times of the fur traders in Canada and they ran for a bit and disappeared. Presumably they originated somewhere from within your industry. What happened? Do Canadians not accept this? Are they not interested in this?

Mr. Maclellan: Comics don't necessarily originate in our industry, Senator McElman. This is the work of artists perhaps in collaboration with someone who supplies the narrative. They may sell to a publishing syndicate. We have more than one syndicate in Toronto using American and Canadian material.

One of the problems over the years past has been the lack of support for Canadian material. People are not as interested in it. They are more interested in the battle of the Alamo or some American historical experience. Our Canadian heroes have not been romanticized and there is not the demand.

It is a problem perhaps with our society rather than the industry. We serve all sectors of society and perhaps tend to reflect all sectors of society. Perhaps there should be more initiative but we are, of course, dealing primarily at the manufacturing level rather than the publishing level; although many of our people are in publishing as well.

Mr. Alloway: Senator McElman, I would say the answer to the question is largely economics. I have discussed this with people who have originated comics and we have produced books of this type and they go for a few months and the company goes bankrupt. I can say this from personal experience.

I talked to the president, a Canadian, of a large food chain store in this country during Centennial year, about generating Canadian materials to merchandise through supermarkets. We had a great idea and creative people that would put these packages together. There is no way that our Canadian industry can begin to compete with the manufacturing costs of the product that is for sale in these big stores. There is just not any known way today. We may find some tomorrow and we continue to look and continue to be optimistic but when a consumer has a choice and there is a price differential, and it is very substantial, he simply picks what he believes is more for the money.

The Chairman: On the best seller book lists that we see from time to time in the weekend papers do Canadian books ever get to first place?

Mr. Alloway: We had a book on "How to Make a Million".

The Chairman: Yes, we sure did. Did that go to first place?

Mr. Alloway: Yes.

The Chairman: How about a book like Pierre Berton's "The Uncomfortable Pew"?

Mr. Maclellan: That was a best seller by Canadian standards. Probably went over a hundred thousand.

The Chairman: And Peter Newman's book, was it first place?

Mr. Maclellan: "Renegade in Power" and "Distemper of our Times" both had a very large sale.

The Chairman: And Miss LaMarsh's book?

Mr. Alloway: That was a best seller by Canadian standards.

The Chairman: Not only a best seller, would it go to first place on the list in Canada, for example?

Mr. Maclellan: It might and if not first perhaps second, third or fourth.

The Chairman: Would books like "The Bird in the Gilded Cage", "Dis'emper of our Times", "How to make a Million" (Dr. Shulman's book), Pierre Berton's, "The Uncomfortable Pew"—would they sell as many books in Canada as a book, for example let us say "Portnoy's Complaint", to choose one that was a best seller a little while ago?

Mr. Maclellan: "Valley of the Dolls" would have an enormous sale in Canada.

The Chairman: It would outstrip those other books?

Mr. Maclellan: Yes. Senator Davey, I think the short answer is that popular taste does not accept the best quality. If you go to New York or London, the most popular newspaper is not necessarily the best and the most popular movie is not necessarily the best and the most popular paperback would not meet the highest standards. The lowest common denominator is perhaps most economically successful.

The Chairman: Would you apply those standards to the Canadian newspaper industry?

Mr. Maclellan: No; because in the Canadian newspaper industry you don't have much choice—one or two newspapers perhaps in your area and you are dealing with local news in which you are interested, or Canadian news, and you want it. This is your medium. I don't think this is a valid comparison.

The Chairman: Could I ask one other question and then I am afraid we must leave the subject as we have another brief to receive this morning. I will put it to you, Mr. Alloway, and if this is not a question which should be properly put to your group please say so.

Are you able to comment on the graphic standards of the Canadian newspaper industry? Would you care to? Maybe you could but would not care to.

Mr. Alloway: I think that comes closer. I was in the newspaper business for ten years but I am afraid I would just as soon not make that kind of comment.

The Chairman: Why not?

Mr. Alloway: I would not like to make it as Senior Vice-President of the Graphic Arts Industries.

The Chairman: Well, make it as an interested citizen. I don't want to embarrass you.

Mr. Alloway: I would say in the United States in terms of process per circulation or per newspaper establishment there are more progressive techniques being used from a process standpoint in the United States than in Canada. Their use of photographic material, design and offset reproduction has gone to much more sophisticated length in the United States than it has in Canada. That is simply from the standpoint of appraisal of the quality of the product as a printed medium. I remember eight years ago seeing the kind of pictorial reproduction in a full page of full colour in a small daily in the United States. Canadians hadn't even thought of it yet. That is still a progressive element in the United States in the newspaper industry from a technological standpoint.

Mr. Maclellan: Mr. Chairman, as an newspaper editor and periodical editor I would like to give a very explicit personal opinion. On the average Canadian newspapers from the standpoint of graphic art or design or content they are superior to the average in the United States. You may have exceptions but if you go to mid-Western United States and get the local newspaper you would think that you were at the centre of the universe. It is very hard to find news of the rest of the world. Everything is local.

While we have newspapers also that are locally oriented I think we have struck a better balance in national and world news and I think our design, while in many cases this is an assembly line proposition turning out a newspaper overnight in a few hours and everything necessarily done in haste, is fully up to American standards and frequently better. I don't think we need to be ashamed of our newspapers.

The Chairman: Fine, thank you.

Mr. Alloway: I would be ashamed of a few of them.

The Chairman: I won't ask you to identify which ones. Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: On page 8 of the brief, there is reference to the considerable number of Americans who are at the university professorial level currently and there is an incident referred to, where someone approached and discussed the selling of American textbooks in Canada. The American professors usually reply "I know these books, I have used them. I know the authors and publishers."

Obviously the next comment would be:

What in a constructive way has your organization done in approaching the Presidents' Association—for want of the appropriate name—of the Canadian universities; or even the C.A.U.T., the Canadian Association of University Teachers, to overcome what is perhaps a growing attitude in our universities and to get Canadian content, to stress Canadian identity and culture. Have you made such approaches?

Mr. Alloway: No, we have not made those approaches. Our customers are the originators of data and of the content of books. They decide what shall be published, what is a manuscript that makes a viable publication. We manufacture it. We package, we are in the information transfer business. We do not originate. For that reason, it is not within our competence to go to the president of the university or anyone who buys books and say "You should buy Mr. X's book over Mr. Y's because Mr. X's book has got Canadian content." All of these people are customers. We can report to you the facts and trends as we see them.

I talked to an American publisher yesterday whose salesman was at McGill yesterday and he was having a great heyday. He said "Our books are going great. The professors in the universities in Canada know them. We send them in singles through the mail. We have no trouble. We don't have to have them stopped at the border. We have no warehousing in Canada. It is a great heyday. They all know them."

We can report the facts but it is very difficult for us to go to the consumer because between us and the consumer is the publishing entity whose judgment it is. It is incumbent on them to make judgment whether something will sell or not.

Senator McElman: Surely as a Canadian organization you would have an interest in approaching these people, although I agree you are in the production end, you are not in the originating end of things. Surely you have an interest. You don't hesitate to go to the Canadian Government. I see you have done so very effectively on a number of occasions. You appeared before the O'Leary Commission and the Glassco Commission and in other ways made representations with exceedingly good effect which proves you are an effective organization.

Would it not be a practical thing for you to actually deal with the people who are making the decisions? The Government is not.

Mr. Alloway: I think you have given us a seed for thought. Since you have suggested we are effective maybe we could pick that up.

Senator McElman: The record proves that.

Mr. Alloway: Thank you. We would wish that some of the comments we are making might be made by the Canadian Book Publishers Council but when you have a Council that is divided and have different viewpoints between the American dominated publishers and the indigenous Canadian publishers it is very difficult thing for them to be as effective perhaps as we are, wholly interested in the Canadian point of view.

The Chairman: I think I must intercede at this point and perhaps underline your gratitude to Senator McElman as he has made a most interesting and worthwhile point.

Unfortunately we live in a real world and we have to proceed to another brief. I would thank you all for coming. It has been a most interesting and I think worthwhile presentation. I had not intended to sound negative in the opening statement that I made. I merely felt it was something I should say in fairness and that it should be on the record. I could perhaps compensate somewhat by saying, speaking personally but I suspect that some of my colleagues might agree, I am terribly sympathetic to the position you put forward.

Senators, we have a brief which we are going to receive and I am going to adjourn before we receive it.

—Short recess.

BRIEF OF PROFESSOR THOMAS L. McPHAIL

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, the second brief we are receiving this morning is one which has been prepared by Professor Thomas L. McPhail of the Department of Communication Arts, Loyola.

Professor McPhail, the brief which you have prepared has been circulated to the Senators and it has been studied by them and presumably they are ready to ask you some questions. Perhaps before we ask the questions you might like to use some time to amplify your brief or to explain it or comment on it or subtract from it. Perhaps there is something else you might wish to say.

Professor Thomas L. McPhail: What I think I will do is provide a brief summary of what is contained in the brief and then go to the particular recommendations of how we can implement the desired solution, which is rather expensive, as you might notice.

The Chairman: Yes, by all means.

Professor McPhail: You might also notice by the time I finish that I should be sitting to the left of you rather than to your right, considering my solutions.

Initially what motivated me in terms of submitting a brief is that I do teach a course related to the mass media, in which newspapers come under in terms of criticism, terms of style, in terms of force or impact on society.

It became very apparent to me early on in reading the newspapers, especially the reporting on the mass media, that you were getting a great deal of material from editors and a great deal of material from journalists and owners. I am not saying I don't trust them but I do say they have rather selective bias; not that I don't have bias, I certainly do. I have bias like anyone else. I just think that the way of approaching materials in the field of social science gives a better opportunity for being objective and this is an area where we need to be as objective as possible. It allows us to be systematic and select large amounts of data which once again should lend weight to the conclusions.

Now I give three examples within the paper. That is how editors perceive themselves to be fairly objective and yet some of the studies I am aware of indicate this is not true. Editors also claim that computerized projection of election results do interfere with election trends. The studies I am aware of contradict this. I am questioning the role of experience in the news media. I am beginning to say there is a new source of information which is the behavioural science literature. I do not publish papers; I do not influence them to the extent editors and owners do. It is they who should be aware of the new source of information even though the new source of information frequently conflicts with their traditional values and systems. I intend to think that it is more relevant.

Now coming from this background, that is the social scientist background, but first of all as a Canadian, I come up with three observations about what I think are relative today in terms of trend or changes. First is the news media is obviously generating considerable concern about social problems, whether problems of ecology, pollution, over population. I select two examples—that is marijuana and the police and hippies. I show through the Press you are very much aware, for example, the Chicago seven trial and Judge Julius Hopkins. You are very much aware of these problems. The B.C. Lands and Forests Commissioner and the Quebec City Police. Now this generates concern among the public. The media does this. It raises our expectations, it raises our awareness. But what about the solution? The solutions do not appear to be on the horizon despite the fact that marijuana is a very serious problem. Even more important, the laws on marijuana have become a social problem. It is not the marijuana that is the social problem it is the law on marijuana that is the social problem.

Just as a footnote, I just returned from the University of Illinois where a study was done concerning the usage of marijuana. Freshmen—78 per cent of freshmen students, first year students, had not used marijuana. By the time they go through first, second, third and fourth and two years of graduate school up to the doctoral student who replied, the 78 per cent had fallen to 12 per cent. In other words, there is a direct linear relationship between education and the use of marijuana.

If we ever started to enforce the marijuana laws; for example, if we ever got on a law and order kick we would lose most of the people. That is if we could generalize from the study, which is questionable whether we could.

I am saying that things like this—marijuana—especially in the news media, has raised our expectations that something is going to be done and I doubt whether it will be until more kids of prominent people get busted... unfortunately.

If this is what it takes to change legislation in Canada we are in trouble. Because of the rate of change there has to be a more adaptable system.

The second part of this deals with what I call open line or editorial comment shows. This is more of a personal thing where pseudo-psychologists or pseudo-economists— instant experts on everything—give their opinion using the media and the media tends to lend weight to whatever one says.

Now this indirectly again might deal more with misinformation via mass media rather than information. That is why I call for very highly qualified journalists so they will perceive themselves as professionals and not get caught up in parochialism or patriotism which is involved if you don't have the latitude of being a professional. It is very easy to become a "yes man" if you do not perceive yourself to be professional.

The next general area is the shift in trends to what I call mini-communication. Many editors and owners probably paraded through here claiming "We represent all points of view." I say, "If you represent all points of view why are we seeing small rebel newspapers appearing?" In other words we now have evidence they are not representing all points of view. I think this is the start of the mini-communication revolution whether it is the high school underground newspaper or the paper in Halifax—I don't recall the name offhand. We are going to see more and more of this where newspapermen will break away and start their own mini-presses which again, I think, proves that editors and owners are not meeting the demand of all sectors of society even though they claim to be doing that.

Now the next section is probably the most important as far as I am concerned and that is dealing with software. Here I am talking about Canadian content. Now culture and communication are obviously inseparable. To me as a social scientist you cannot separate communication and culture, they are intertwined. In Canada we do have the best of hardware, we are even getting into the satellite business; but in terms of content we are extremely deficient. What I say we should do is invest upwards of one billion dollars per year for the next decade in order to keep a distinct culture. If we do not do that then why should we continue to pay higher taxes than the United States, even though we are not fighting a major war in Vietnam and even though we are not putting a man to the moon? Why should we continue to pay premium when all we are going to be is carbon copy—or in contemporary language Xerox copy—and Xerox being American is rather appropriate.

I see a severe challenge to our culture. It does concern me as a Canadian and I am not here being anti-American because my graduate degrees are from American institutions. I see, I think, something very worthwhile about Canada that is worth saving, particularly the dual cultures. We are unique and we are going to have to pay a price to stay unique.

Senator Beaubien: You mean a higher price than we are paying now?

Professor McPhail: A shift in priorities.

The Chairman: Perhaps we could go on to the question period in a moment.

Professor McPhail: Another thing besides the dollar commitment is obviously there has to be a talent commitment. We need imaginative young people in the media, the various media, and particularly the news media because I think the news media is going to be, in terms of the future, the print industry is going to be in trouble unless they get some imaginative people into the industry.

Now I am Chairman of the largest Communication Arts Department in Canada and we will graduate 40 people with Bachelors and 12 people with post-B.A.'s and we will be lucky if five of those forty-two go into the communication industry in Canada. There are no jobs available in 1970 in the vital area of communications. Try and get a job at the CBC; try and get a job at the National Film Board; try and get a job with one of the cable companies; try and get a job with one of the newspapers. It is extremely difficult. These students, of course, are a little concerned and upset and needless to say I am also. I have raised their expectations through the classroom and said "You are in an area that is going to determine the future of Canada." Do you know what those students will wind up doing? They will be insurance salesmen or high school teachers or airline stewardesses. Now this is a crime.

On the way up here this morning I talked with people in the National Film Board and I have talked with people at the CBC and the austerity program is cultural genocide—an austerity program in the field of communications. You say "Okay where are we going to come up with such large sums of money?" I have several solutions, all of which I doubt will be implemented. The first is we should consider collapsing the Senate. I think it is a subsidy to the past. Secondly, collapse the Department of Veterans' Affairs. We haven't fought a major war nor do I hope we will get into one. Severely reduce the Military budget. We do not need any more Bonaventures. Probably eliminate the baby bonus. Eliminate subsidies to such industries as the tobacco companies. Have a tax on all foreign companies, a one per cent culture tax. It is bad enough to have Denison Mines sold to the Americans, but it is even worse the fact we don't try and counter-balance the damage done to our culture. We should have a 2 per cent tax on the communications industry within Canada, that is the American, British, German and Japanese firms.

We should consider shifting expense. The National Film Board are now charging rental for films. I, being from Montreal, obviously unable to pay the price but what about the Maritimes? What about the little school district in the Maritimes? What are they going to do? They will drop film from their courses or curriculum... further perpetuating the gap, by government policy. What about in Montreal East, the poorer school systems in metro cities? They will not purchase the films. The suburban schools purchase all they want. Government, by its policy, is creating two cultures. I think counter-cultures are not sub-cultures. We might have irreconcilably different value systems if we are not careful what we do with the younger generation.

I would go so far as to recommend legalized gambling—putting a tax on that; legalized marijuana—and placing a tax on that. Such traditional things as matching grants, tax concessions, paying interest on loans to students who want to go to the communications area, offering fellowships to students, a cross-Canada competition with the 20 best people working for the CBC and the government pays their salaries.

I perceive it to be a very serious problem. I might be wrong; I have been wrong before. I am lucky, I have a Ph.D. and can get a job anywhere in the world but there's not many people with that mobility and I stay in Canada because I believe in the country but 10 years from now I don't know whether I will be able to say that.

There is one other thing that I would like to recommend specifically and that is we institute a Canadian Communications Centre. This is where the government, industry and universities get together to begin a systematic collection of experts concerning new media form. Here we are talking about journalism, new styles; here we are talking about computers and software; here we are talking about satellites and cassettes. We do desperately need an institute of Canadian communications. Where can you go to get that type of information? You can get the odd course here or there and you can get the Bachelor's degree at Loyola but you won't get a job once you get it. We do need something.

I think I have given you enough material for a few questions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. I think there will be the occasional question. I think, Senator Smith, you were going to ask the first question.

Senator Smith: I would not want to start off to argue the points that Professor McPhail brought out in the area of how we could make a shift of funds. I am not one who stands up everytime and tries to defend the Senate. I just let our performance speak for itself to those who open their ears and open their eyes to look at us. At my age I have no particular objection on a personal basis.

The Chairman: May I say something on that subject. Do you want to say more?

Senator Smith: I was not taking it too seriously.

Professor McPhail: No. I am very serious.

Senator Smith: In order to save two million dollars you want to cut our throats?

Professor McPhail: Here it is a question of priorities. Canada has a limited amount of money and I am saying there won't be a Senate in ten years if what I say is true. I am saying we will be electing 20 Senators to a larger congress called the United States Congress. I think the Senators of Canada should be concerned enough about problems to be willing to collapse that section just as a demonstration of the problem we are facing. If it is not done ten years from now we won't have a House of Commons, let alone a Senate.

Senator Smith: Let me say in the first instance I was not too serious. I should not have mentioned the Senate, because I understand what you are driving at. I didn't intend to make any particular argument against your suggestion. I thought you were thinking of the Senate in terms of money only and the couple of million dollars that our operation costs is not going to do very much in supplying the billion dollars you suggest we need. I don't want to make an argument about the shift of funds or family allowances. The future of the parliamentary operation is under consideration by some people anyway. I think we all should make our contribution to that consideration.

What you say is valid. I don't quarrel with anything you say. I might say that there is no longer a Bonaventure. She is out of service as of March 31st. That was sure to come and a lot of other things have to come too. For every dollar you save in national defence, up blooms the cost of Medicare and so on. There is where the hard choice becomes and whether people would rather remain healthy, have the opportunity to remain healthy as American citizens rather than to be strangled for lack of funds to pay for health as Canadians—that is the point people will have to decide when that moment comes. I think I had better leave that at that.

I found the brief very interesting. I found it a little difficult to get started to read it because you are in language areas that didn't seem to click with me. The point where you lost me was when I was reading the page or so quotation from Tannenbaum and Greenberg. Then when I turned to the back that is when I made my notes because I thought you were making very valuable suggestions.

At this point as the basis for my first question I would like to put on the record the part of the paragraph on page 10 you have referred to in the opening remarks:

"Based upon the fact that communications and culture are inseparable and based upon knowledge of the communications media in Canada (with television dominating), I suspect that Canada has one decade remaining in which its members have to make up their minds whether they want to remain a distinct political, cultural and geographical national entity."

That is about all I should quote. The problem is one of Canadian content in our communications media.

You don't have anything too bad to say about the print media or radio. You say that television is where the weakness lies. What is your opinion of the proposal recently made by the CRTC with regard to Canadian content?

Professor McPhail: I respect Pierre Juneau very much but I think he is fighting a losing battle. You cannot win this battle without sufficient funds. He can recommend very strongly for cable companies to develop Canadian content but like the gentleman in the session before said, it is an economic question and as long as you use an economic yardstick it will not be done. You have to use a social yardstick in order to justify putting Canadian content on the highest priority level. In relation to the C.R.T.C. they are trying but I don't think they can win. We are going to create a ghetto. Ottawa is a ghetto in terms of not having available access to American programs.

Senator Smith: Ottawa is on cable.

Professor McPhail: Can you get Johnny Carson? Well, take Calgary.

The Chairman: Do you watch Johnny Carson?

Professor McPhail: I certainly do. He had on there Paul Ehrlich, the over-population expert. Ehrlich is right, everybody should be watching. He had on there Dr. D. Reuben. I am not saying that we have to watch the wedding of Tiny Tim.

The Chairman: Would you feel deprived if you couldn't watch Johnny Carson?

Professor McPhail: Not if I couldn't watch Johnny Carson but if I couldn't watch the people he has on his show.

The Chairman: He has them on. That is the question. Would you feel deprived if you couldn't watch Johnny Carson?

Professor McPhail: Sure I would.

Senator Smith: Don't you think it would be a pretty difficult thing to do with the media partly in the hands of an establishment—in this instance the Crown Corporation establishment—and the private television in the hands of another kind of free enterprise establishment? Is not our problem a pretty difficult one to be able to convince the taxpayer that the certain priorities which you have suggested—and there is a lot of merit in it, I recognize that—is the thing they should go for instead of increases in old age pensions. How are we going to do that?

Professor McPhail: Through the news media, exposure to information that points out the depth of the problem and points it out very well. I am very concerned. The problem is very, very difficult because what happens when you start to pipe in, let us say, United States programs to the Eskimos, or cables or satellites will allow us to do; will be a one-way ticket out of the north and instead of developing the north with satellites, we are going to show them they want a Buick and a barbeque in the suburbs and they will all take off unless we allow local programming where they can develop their own culture.

Senator Smith: Professor McPhail, I don't recall any campaign that has been carried on in all the media, except going back to years ago when the publisher of the Halifax Herald for a rather lengthy period of time carried on a campaign which he thought would lead to recognition of Maritime rights. I don't recall at the end of that campaign, or anywhere during it, that the people who worked for that newspaper or the publisher himself were able to suggest any concrete steps to right what was recognized as a problem.

Is it fair to expect any of the media to have that kind of expertise to follow up and say that that is what should be done; and not put it in bald terms of "We need more money". It is easy to say.

Professor McPhail: I am sure there are journalists capable of rising to the occasion, whether it is a Vance Packard (that I don't particularly agree with) or a Ralph Nader. I am sure there are journalists in Canada. If, for example, the Globe and Mail or the Vancouver Sun or Montreal Star were willing to release a journalist from their staff for six months to write a book or monograph it could have a substantial impact on our society.

Senator Smith: You have already made reference to the drug problem. It is, of course, a very difficult one for anyone to arrive at a solution for that, but a solution must be found. With regard to a lot of our social problems at the root is another reallocation of funds. How does a newspaper get the kind of people who can write stuff in a form that appeals to the taxpayer that he should pay more taxes in order to make better housing available in some of the slum areas of our country; for example, for the Indians and Metis population? How do you go about putting forth an acceptable solution that involves the transfer of funds?

Professor McPhail: I think again these are very difficult problems to solve. One step in the right direction would be lowering the voting age. I sincerely believe that young people are more humanitarian, more concerned about redistributing the wealth of society into priority items. I think we should be talking about lowering the voting age to 16 not 18.

The Chairman: Could I ask a question, Senator Smith? You are talking about lowering the voting age to 16; you are talking about redistribution of wealth. I guess a pretty natural question which occurred to me at the beginning of your remarks is: How far to the left are you?

Professor McPhail: I think I am in the mainstream of the young society and that is what bothers me. There is a considerable gap.

The Chairman: Let me ask you a couple of questions. Do you subscribe to the profit motive in journalism?

Professor McPhail: I say yes, that is a legitimate function. It should not be the only function.

The Chairman: I quite appreciate that. You have no objection to private ownership and the sale of advertising and so on?

Professor McPhail: No. I question certain advertising such as cigarette advertising. I would say it should be banned universally because it is a health problem. We have the guts to do it on DDT and cyclamates, so why not cigarettes? It is because they have a rather powerful pressure group.

Senator Smith: I was interested in your opening comment when you referred to the use by the broadcast media especially of pseudo-experts, instant experts I think you called them. You referred to it in your brief here today. You referred to it as a minor point. It seems to me that is a major point. Why did you use the words "minor point"?

Professor McPhail: I know the media is going to attack me tomorrow for being a major problem rather than a minor problem. One of these intellectuals who comes from his ivory tower and tells them what to do.

Senator Smith: Let me climb into his ivory tower. I have heard the so-called experts and they make me laugh. The next morning I walk down the main street of my little home town in Nova Scotia and somebody says "Did you hear so-and-so last night? I didn't know that." I say, "That is not the real story." They say "Well, I know it must be. I saw and heard him myself." That is the point you are making, isn't it? It is the power of that media?

Professor McPhail: That is right.

Senator Smith: I think it is a major point. I was surprised you used the word "minor".

Professor McPhail: Well, at Loyola we have had severe difficulties, to say the least, and sometimes I pick up the paper the next day and I would not really know they were talking about Loyola because there is such a discrepancy between what I viewed and heard and what they have reported. And also their editorial comments that come on with the news media before the news where the station manager tries to impress his neighbours. He does much more than that because he is talking to several thousand people.

The Chairman: I think a legitimate supplementary, Senator Smith, is to ask the witness to be more specific. Who are some of instant experts you have in mind?

Professor McPhail: I don't know how far you get. Bert Cannings is a good one. Burns—he is now booted out to the West Coast. Joe Pine in California. The open line show in Montreal with a fellow from Hamilton—Ed Scott Rod Blaker.

The Chairman: These are all electronic experts. Are there any print examples?

Professor McPhail: I don't read the print media that closely but I am sure there are enough people that if I were to continually, let us say, read the paper...but it is very inefficient, very inefficient to read the paper. There probably are examples within the news media.

The Chairman: You are thinking primarily of the electronic media?

Professor McPhail: Yes; because of the tremendous impact it has. It is one thing to change a newspaper industry but if 90 per cent of the effect on society is radio and television you have not solved very much. I prefer to zero in on the problem.

The Chairman: You have given us radio examples. Are there any in television?

Professor McPhail: Bert Cannings is on television.

Senator Smith: You referred in your opening remark to Halifax. I think likely the paper you had in mind down there which is an example of the revolt against the old conservative press is called the Fourth Estate. Is that the one you had in mind?

Professor McPhail: Or the Mysterious East.

Senator Smith: There is one published up near Fredericton called The Mysterious East as well. The Fourth Estate is another one I know. I have seen copies of it. Perhaps they are getting larger in circulation now. What do you think of the underground press and the student press as a force to be reckoned with?

Professor McPhail: They are strong. I think it is a very strong force and should be read by all parents. The trouble is the parents don't read it. The students read it and it reinforces their values which are counter to the parent value system and the parents continue to read material which reinforces their value system, which might be the stock report of the Stock Exchange or the annual review of the Steel Company of Canada. They are tuning in on different things, they are chewing on different things.

Senator Smith: Do you think the students or the—I don't like the word "hippy" one bit, but you know what I mean when I say it—the hippy on the street who buys a copy of the underground press down beyond the mall in Ottawa would take that home and put it on his living room table to make it available to his mother and father or is there something about it they would know they would find offensive?

Professor McPhail: No. I think most of them have tried it and that is why they are on the mall on Sparks Street. They got chucked out of the house.

Senator Smith: You are in some pretty good company when you say this is an important factor. We have had some evidence from pretty substantial people who have at least suggested the same thing.

I am interested in politics, having been up in Ottawa about 20 years, of course. I was interested in your reference on page 6 to some research studies which have suggested that the media play a limited role in the general decision-making process and it is either political or otherwise. Then you say that the publishers and the editors should have it right on their desk and the inference is they should read this thing. Why should they read those research studies when it is going to be something that is going to suggest to them they are a waning industry, because they have taken great pride I think in their influence on public decisions.

Would you like to say something about that?

Professor McPhail: I think the media is most useful for providing information but decision-making is still a function of interpersonal group relation. The media does provide us with a broad base of information but the final decision-making is really a function of the peer group. Again using marijuana as an example: give them a friendship circle of ten people and seven of those ten smoke marijuana. I can predict fairly safely that the other three more than likely have smoked marijuana and that is because of the peer group influence.

The second point: What are the owners going to do when they sit down and read all this disconcerting information about shifts away from the print industry? I have noticed something that might be peculiar to myself but prior to the Senate hearings (and I think they are very good) there were several horizontal moves among media people. In other words, the mass media was hedging against becoming obsolete by moving into cable and television but for the past two months they have stopped. Why? Because they are afraid of getting investigated. But the day this Commission stops hearing then the print media is going to start diversifying itself into other industries; hedging again the very fact they might become obsolete. They are going to think of themselves as communications rather than newspapers. They are afraid to move now because they are afraid of being investigated and closed off.

Senator Smith: It should be said here that one of the large newspapers, it was the Montreal Star, stated the time might very well come to get into the cable field to prepare themselves for when perhaps their kind of publishing will not be relevant and also to retain their present competitive position with newspapers who have chains. He was not trying to hide it.

Senator Beaubien: No reason he would.

Professor McPhail: I maintain that there were examples but few relative to the number that might have occurred had not these hearings been held. I think we are going to have a backlog when the hearings close of people moving in from outside media areas, which will be CRTC decisions, which will be again a very difficult problem.

Senator Smith: You might help some of us who from time to time in the past have been called on to make some decisions in this area. Do you think the political parties have often wasted resources financially, that is in buying media time and space in preparation of and during election campaigns? Do people pay any attention to it?

Professor McPhail: People do. That is what I call an empirical question. We don't have a lot of data on it but within a couple of years we should have. I think for the most part we are at the end of the age of ideology because we are in such a technological society. Obviously computers are not liberal or conservative and obviously satellites are not liberal or conservative. The decisions are becoming very very much away from ideology.

I think we have reached the major shift in our political ideology. For example, the NDP cannot be against computers. They have to take the same stand as the Liberals and Conservatives unless they are so nailed traditionally you will cut them off. I see a severe shift in politics as we know it because of the major communication changes, whether cable or computer, satellite or laser beam. All these things are very technical decisions. You cannot take a political stand on them unless you want to deny access. That is an ideological stand that would fail in the long run. The young bright people will move. They are very mobile. The comfortable web of custom has not caught up with them yet.

Senator Smith: I would like to ask one more question. I would like to ask a question on the subject of objectivity. You gave me the impression in your brief there is no such thing and it has been confirmed by some evidence of the working press and publishers who have been before us. The only element of the press which has a reputation for and perhaps which also makes a claim for objectivity—perhaps this is a matter of opinion, it is my opinion anyway—is the Canadian Press. Would you like to say something about the objectivity of the Canadian Press? Do they have to be without passion and without emotion completely in order to discipline themselves into being objective or is there any such thing even with the good old Canadian Press?

Professor McPhail: I think the Canadian Press is a very respectable institution in terms of not being totally subjective or totally objective so it reads like a technical report. They have handled very well the problems of trying to make the presentation as factual as possible and yet presenting it in a stylistic way that a person will pursue it or read through it. I think the Canadian Press has done very well in that area.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: What in layman's terms can the media of today—at least the print media—do to become relative within the scope you have made out?

Professor McPhail: Why not once a week give an editorial column on the front page—not the back page—to the local high school and let the high school put in that column what they perceive to be the relevant problems; or go to the welfare district and let the people on welfare write a column on the front page and not as some super middle class Wasp perceives their problem but as the poor perceives the problem, leaving the spelling mistakes in and leaving the inconsistencies in. Let the Indians write on the front page and not have someone write for them.

Senator McElman: What about the op-ed page?

Professor McPhail: I am sorry...

Senator McElman: Page 7.

Professor McPhail: It is at least a step in the right direction. I still think if you want to make the paper relevant that we should put it on the front page in caps. That is what people read most. I think page 7, that type of thing, is a step in the right direction but I still think it should be front page material.

Senator Beaubien: Do you think for the people who would be interested all the others should be forced to read whatever the high school children wanted to write on the front page?

Professor McPhail: No. It is written there but you don't have to read it. One can flip by the sports or the Dominion ads. At least the potential is there.

Senator McElman: Let's be practical. Surely you don't expect...

Professor McPhail: No, I don't expect. Go ahead.

Senator McElman: Surely you don't expect any major newspaper to give its front page.

Professor McPhail: No. I am saying a column once a week, say every Friday, to the best editorial statement of the week submitted by high school students. You will get excellent ones.

Senator McElman: Would you accept that within the general context today that people who are interested in getting opinions turn automatically to the editorial page of the newspaper and that prominent on the opposite page is an appropriate place to have such diversity of opinion? I am trying to get the practicality.

Professor McPhail: You say you read the page. I read page 1. I would not read that page you are talking about as likely as I would page 1. It is orientation towards what we read. You may be correct in saying that page would be the better. You might be exposed to a larger sample of people who read that page than I know.

Senator McElman: We are talking about communication, are we not? This is your field—communication.

Professor McPhail: Wait a minute now. I don't know everything. I know about 5 per cent of what is available in the field of communications. That is my disclaimer.

Senator McElman: You are directing yourself. How do you communicate?

Professor McPhail: Okay.

Senator McElman: Surely we must be practical if we talk about how to communicate. Do you in practicality say the front page or do you in practicality say let us get where the masses are reading?

Professor McPhail: I say on one Friday put it on the front page and on the next Friday put it on page 7 and do a test and find (1) how many people read it; (2) how many people understood it.

The Chairman: Don't you think that has been done by newspapers?

Professor McPhail: It is moving in some direction.

The Chairman: The editor of the Edmonton Journal when he was before the Committee told us he did the exact thing you are describing. Not on page 1, on the opp-editorial page. If I recall I think he said the project had been abandoned. There was not sufficient public interest either in terms of reading or more particular in terms of getting the material.

Professor McPhail: Then what you are indirectly saying is the problem of reaching the young is much more difficult than I perceived?

The Chairman: He was not saying the young. It was the young, the poor, the dispossessed—the whole bag. His point was they had abandoned this project. I must say the Toronto Star has begun this exact experiment. Are you familiar with the experiment?

Professor McPhail: No.

The Chairman: Which they call "Participatory Journalism". That is the phrase they use. I must say the names which appear on that page are all names they know. This is not a criticism of the page at all but they are frequently M.P.'s, aldermen and so on. Yet the page is doubtless available to people you are talking about.

You mentioned, for example, high school students. Would you prefer to see the kind of thing you describe or would it not be as helpful to have in that same space an in-depth analysis of what really is happening in the high school community?

Professor McPhail: Ideally you are right but that is too much of a problem to handle in terms of editorial comment. The complexity of the problems are so profound I don't know whether you could handle it. It might be more appropriate in a week-end magazine.

The Chairman: I am wondering if your suggestion is realistic, not in terms of the media making their facilities available but in terms of the response which we could expect. You think it is.

Professor McPhail: I think it is a possibility. I might be proved wrong.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: Professor McPhail, talking about students writing in high school or college—For years—I am sure it must be about five or six years—the Chronicle-Telegraph of Quebec, which is not to be compared to the Toronto Star or the Globe and Mail but which is read by English speaking Quebecers —every Saturday for years they have had a page practically for the students of St. Lawrence College, a boy's high school. They ran a competition and the students willing to write were then picked and the best articles published. You have no idea how that was read by the parents and grandparents and interested people. That was a very, very well read page. That has been going on for many years. I think it must be still going on.

Professor McPhail: I think it is also a great inspiration to become journalists because they get recognition from the high school and their parents and so forth.

Senator Quart: I may say that started my grand-daughter with the idea of going into journalism of some kind, writing so many times on various subjects taken up in the weekly news.

Senator Beaubien: Professor McPhail, you have been giving us some suggestions about what the CBC, or one of its component parts, might do to give information and so on to the Eskimos and so forth. Have you any idea how much the CBC deficit is now roughly?

Professor McPhail: I have a rough idea, a rough idea of their budget.

Senator Beaubien: What would you say it would be?

Professor McPhail: A budget of 130 million for television and 30 million for radio.

Senator Beaubien: It is about 191. You are pretty close. Do you think we should be spending more money?

Professor McPhail: I said in my brief they need more money but not more Edsels. That is where I make the distinction. I think the CBC especially is a fine example of where the public interest should come first. How can the president of the CBC maintain a need of cut-back in funds? That is a more subversive act against national unity than the Chicago seven ever was.

Senator Beaubien: He was not asking for a cut-back in funds.

Professor McPhail: He was justifying it on CHUM radio, I believe.

Senator Beaubien: Who was?

Professor McPhail: Dr. Davidson. It will force more efficiency, etcetera, etcetera.

Senator Beaubien: He is asking for 166 million plus 25. That is in the estimates for the next year so that is an all time high. He is not asking any cut-back.

Professor McPhail: This gets into the other complicated problem of the people at the CBC. As I perceive the problem the people who started with the CBC in the 1950's are now the top management. They are not the product of the new modern era. McLuhan to them is a social disease. I am not saying McLuhan is right or wrong but at least we have to be aware of what he said. If we want to cut off 10 per cent we should cut it at the top rather than at the innovated bottom.

The Chairman: You don't think that Dr. Davidson is aware of Marshal McLuhan and his teachings?

Professor McPhail: I am sure he is. I run into, let us say, people—"older people"—who react to Mr. McLuhan saying they can't read him. I am more concerned about his ideas. What if he is right?

The Chairman: I am sure you want to be fair. Are you sure you are being fair to, let us say, the top eight or ten people at the corporation? You really think they don't know McLuhan's teaching?

Professor McPhail: Let us say they don't apply them if they know him. I personally would not work for the CBC.

The Chairman: Why?

Professor McPhail: It is so heavy, you know, with rules and regulations. It would stifle innovation. I might want to work in the middle of the night and not from 9:00 until 5:00. I don't want to have a union cameraman follow me around in broad daylight because he is unionized.

The Chairman: How would you achieve the things you are talking about achieving? You are proposing to spend a billion dollars a year. Presumably the government would spend it.

Professor McPhail: In unison with industry and in unison with universities. No one today has enough talent. You have to go to all three. You have to use a team or system approach for modern society. It has to be government, it has to be industry, and it has to be university. Only by using the three would you have enough know-how to reach the right goal.

The Chairman: You said we are committing cultural genocide. Is that correct?

Professor McPhail: That is correct.

The Chairman: Are we going to be successful?

Professor McPhail: I will tell you in ten years. Are we going to be successful? I doubt it.

The Chairman: Why are we not going to be successful?

Professor McPhail: Because it is ridiculous for a country with six million taxpayers trying to compete in every way, shape and form with a country next to us that has roughly 160 million taxpayers. In other words the economies to scale in terms of mass production are inconsistent. We have to pay a premium for our small size.

The Chairman: That is not answering the question. You say we are not going to be successful in committing cultural genocide.

Professor McPhail: I say we are not going to be successful in the fight against it.

The Chairman: Why?

Professor McPhail: We will not change our priorities.

The Chairman: In other words the game is over now?

Professor McPhail: I say we have roughly a decade.

The Chairman: You say short of an infusion of the billion dollars.

Professor McPhail: Of that size of input. I am not talking about ten million dollars, one million dollars a year over the next ten years.

The Chairman: You are very pessimistic.

Professor McPhail: And very expensive.

Senator Beaubien: That is a billion dollars a year?

Professor McPhail: Yes.

The Chairman: Are you pessimistic in this area?

Professor McPhail: No. I would not be sitting here if I was pessimistic. I would be filling out job applications to major universities in the United States.

The Chairman: Is there any other way short of a billion dollars a year of saving ourselves?

Professor McPhail: The other one is a re-direction of the presently used funds which becomes a mammoth organizational problem. We are committing X number of dollars through National Film Board and the CBC, subsidies and grants and education. If we could somehow coordinate that so it was all moving in the same direction we might get there. There is so much decentralization, so many decisions made in opposition. The cable companies are fighting the microwave companies, the microwave companies are fighting the telephone companies, the telephone companies are after the government for more money. They are not moving together, you know.

The Chairman: So you think we will successfully commit cultural genocide? We will be destroyed as an entity unless we do these things?

Professor McPhail: I am saying unless we take a serious look at our culture and re-direct our priorities then Canada as a distinct political community will have no reason for existing a decade from now.

The Chairman: I think the Committee would be terribly interested in your comments on where you think the American culture will be at 10 years from now.

Professor McPhail: It is going to be one of two polar extremes—either tyranny or anarchy.

The Chairman: No matter what?

Professor McPhail: No matter what.

The Chairman: You say you are an optimist. It doesn't sound like a very optimistic forecast.

Professor McPhail: I have to make my car payments and I have to keep working! When you have people like Spiro Agnew and Attorney-General Mitchell, out and out authoritarian, in a day and age when one would presume we have lost that kind of approach, and they are in significant positions of power. There is the George Wallace vote and there are lots of Wallace votes in Canada. You will have on the one hand a tightening up of the system and a reaction of disrespect more and more by the young, such as Jerry Rubin and his group.

The Chairman: Are you suggesting that Mr. Agnew and the Attorney-General are potential tyrants?

Professor McPhail: Are tyrants.

The Chairman: Are you suggesting that Jerry Rubin is a potential anarchist?

Professor McPhail: Yes.

The Chairman: Is he an anarchist now?

Professor McPhail: No. He is pretty smart.

The Chairman: Are there any other question any Senators would like to ask?

Senator Smith: I would like to ask one question. In the early part of the brief I tried to get an understanding of what would be the effect on the media by the employment of more trained people, people trained in the social sciences, people like yourself for example. I think you suggested somewhere in the brief the minimum requirement for a journalist should be a B.A. or M.A., something of that nature.

Have you thought about the economics of the real worth of having standards as high as that?

Professor McPhail: Well, I don't think they are overly high standards when for example the Inland Steel require a Bachelor degree as a minimum to work in a steel plant. The media is of such primary importance.

Senator Smith: They are not always terribly profitable. The media are not necessarily profitable.

Professor McPhail: That is why they need a kick-back from government.

Senator Smith: In other words, you are saying they are forced into cheap labour.

Professor McPhail: Yes. Some of those people initially are cheap labour but are very excellent people. That is why they can survive today. There is a good correlation between education and ability but there is also a lot of people who are very smart and not highly educated.

Senator Smith: It has been my privilege to know a great many journalists and in the hungry 30's they would be fortunate to get a university education. They rate pretty high in my opinion. How does this university graduate who has a great understanding of the social sciences and interplay and forces that confront human beings these days, how do you apply that to this particular field? How does that necessarily give the background to be able to write and so that people are able to read and understand, how can that be acquired by an additional training period?

Professor McPhail: The trouble is now that it takes so long to go through a training period that what you learn by the end is obsolete relative to the goals when you started. There is such a massive input of information that unless you go about acquiring it in a systematic fashion, which education is, it is unlikely you will be able to acquire sufficient information.

Senator Smith: Do you find in general your students to whom you teach sociology, or have taught sociology, in general are the kind who could adapt themselves and have the talent to make good journalists?

Professor McPhail: I think so.

Senator Smith: Could they themselves communicate?

Professor McPhail: Relatively well. A lot of them now are examples of the shift. A lot of them do not turn in term papers any more. I get such things as 16 mm. film and I get photography handed in. I have closed circuit TV programs. They are moving away from the traditional area. They do a term project which is multi-media. That is why I think they are moving away from the print culture into some kind of multi-media culture.

Senator Beaubien: Professor, how many students did you say you have in your class?

Professor McPhail: In my classes in the department 250. This semester I teach probably 25 students.

Senator Beaubien: Where would those people go normally? You said they might go into insurance and so on. What about normally? How do you prepare them to earn a living?

Professor McPhail: How do I prepare them to earn a living? Very poorly. That is why they are up in arms. That is why I am here today.

Senator Beaubien: Isn't that terribly important?

Professor McPhail: Yes, it is.

Senator Beaubien: Or do you think the world should change so they would not have to work?

Professor McPhail: No. It is very important to know how to work. I am more concerned they learn a process of continually adapting.

Senator Beaubien: I am thinking of them now.

Professor McPhail: I can prepare them for a job but suppose the job becomes obsolete in four years what are they going to do for the 35 more years except say "Here is another person representing the establishment who misled me." I am preparing them for constant change.

Senator Beaubien: Nobody prepared us when we got out in the world and we seem to have gotten along all right. You mean to say because you don't prepare them they won't be able to get another job?

Professor McPhail: It is very difficult to get a job in the communications field.

The Chairman: Professor McPhail, are you part of the establishment?

Professor McPhail: Yes. I considered getting a haircut before coming here today. I must be part of the establishment.

The Chairman: Did you get a haircut?

Professor McPhail: No.

Senator Smith: We will match our Chairman against you any day!

Senator McElman: Professor, we have had many print media bosses before us and they have all expressed the wish in this country for better training of journalists. They have spoken of the scarcity of well trained journalists. They have spoken of the efforts they have made to improve and assist in training journalists and yet you say that your graduates don't get jobs in the media. Is that correct?

Professor McPhail: That is correct.

Senator McElman: Why? Do you ask yourself why?

Professor McPhail: Yes. I guess supply and demand are not coinciding and to fill the void I am going to have to consider becoming a placement service to coordinate the vacancies in order to fill them with students. That becomes a rather significant job when I am trying to teach and trying to do research and trying to be a consultant and trying to enjoy life. It will have to be done to make them coincide.

Senator McElman: Directly applied then to this area of media insofar as your discipline is concerned has it ever been suggested that the type of training you are giving perhaps is redundant?

Professor McPhail: Sure.

Senator McElman: There has been that suggestion?

Professor McPhail: Yes. People wonder if you can teach it. People say it is an art and cannot be taught.

The Chairman: Professor McPhail, speaking for myself I am absolutely delighted you didn't get a haircut! I am delighted also that you are more optimistic than I had feared when I studied your brief. There is a glimmer of light at the end of the tunnel as far as you are concerned and I think that is a good thing. Notwithstanding your comment about the august Senate of Canada, I am delighted you felt it was at least useful enough to bring you here this morning and I am delighted because your documentation and comments are useful to us in the ultimate study we hope to prepare. On top of everything else it has been a refreshing presentation. Thank you.

Professor McPhail: Thank you. I enjoyed it.

The Chairman: May I say to the senators that we are meeting with Mr. Pierre Juneau and other members of the CRTC at 2:30 p.m. in this room. Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned at 12:40 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 2:30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I would like to call this session to order. This afternoon we are beginning to move into our study of the electronic media. That being so, perhaps you will allow me to make a very short explanatory statement.

I think it would be impossible in Canada today to conceive of a study of the ownership, role and function of the print media without some considerable reference to the electronic media and at the same time I know that senators realize, and in particular we want you, Mr. Juneau, to know, and we hope that the people who are coming here from the Canadian broadcasting industry will realize that this committee does not consider itself a junior grade royal commission on broadcasting or do we think that we are some Senatorial version of the CRTC. Our prime interest and concern in the Canadian broadcasting system is the role it plays in the overall spectrum of Canadian mass media. I think, Mr. Juneau, in your capacity, you must be the starting point in any such study.

Now, you were kind enough to send the Committee members what I can only describe as a deluge of material. I can assure you that we were most grateful, collectively and individually. It seems unlikely that many Senators have read all of the material, as some of us have, but I do know that most of the Senators have read it at least in part.

Perhaps before turning to you for an oral statement I could introduce some of your colleagues. On Mr. Juneau's immediate right is Mr. Harry Boyle, the Vice-Chairman of the CRTC. There are three full time members who are here as well, who are members of the executive committee. They are on my immediate left Mrs. Pat Pearce, on her left Mr. Hal Dornan, and then sitting next to Mr. Boyle is Mr. Réal Therrien. The balance of the group from the CRTC you may or may not wish to introduce—I do not know whether you are proud of them or not?

Mr. Pierre Juneau, Chairman, Canadian Radio Television Commission: Some of them I wouldn't!

The Chairman: The procedure we follow here is for the witness to make a brief opening oral statement taking perhaps as much as 15 minutes and then we would like to question you, not only on the oral statement, but on the material you were kind enough to send; and I am sure there are other questions about the broadcast media generally that the senators will want to ask you about. As I have said to so many other witnesses, if you wish to farm out any of the questions to any of your colleagues, please feel free to do so.

We are delighted you are here—Mr. Juneau.

[Translation]

Mr. Juneau: "Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I really have no presentation to make. I would rather prefer to put myself at your disposal and answer questions right away. Just one remark, however. My colleagues and I are very happy to be here before a part of the Senate, a Senate Committee. We are very much aware that the Senate is part of Parliament and that the CRTC, the Canadian Radio-

Television Commission, is a creature of Parliament, and not, as there is a tendency to say sometimes—and too quickly at that—a government agency.

The procedure is that we are appointed individually to these positions by the government, but we are very much aware of Canadian traditions in this area, that such Commissions are the creatures of Parliament, at a time in our history when so much stress is put on the importance of Parliament, when sometimes—and it is not up to us to say whether rightly or wrongly—there is concern about the role of Parliament.

I wish to emphasize how honoured we feel at having to implement an Act like the Broadcasting Act which was passed, barely two years ago, by the Parliament of which you are part. We feel that it is a very difficult mandate, but one that is also an honour for us."

[English]

Mr. Chairman, I don't think I have anything else to say at this point. I think that since you are interested in mass media you have no doubt followed our activities in trying to implement the new Broadcasting Act. We have also supplied you with all the important documents which reflect our decisions and operations and we are here to answer your questions.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Juneau. It just occurred to me that I may have a conflict of interest because I sponsored the Broadcasting Act in the Senate. However, I hope my colleagues won't disqualify me from chairing this meeting. I think the questioning this afternoon will begin with Mr. Fortier.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: "Mr. Juneau, we've read recently in the press and on the radio and TV that in the last two years you've become one of the most influential public servants. The question I'd like to ask you is this: Does this compliment that has been paid to you come from the fact that you have to administer such an important act? Or, does this compliment come from the very important decisions you have been rendering for two years? Or, is it your magnetic personality?"

Mr. Juneau: "I think you had better ask the persons who gave these opinions and not the victims."

Mr. Fortier: "Do you accept the fact that as Chairman of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission you personally and collectively hold one of the most important public positions in Canada today?"

Mr. Juneau: "Thank you for the question. After all, it allows us to make a statement that is perhaps of some interest. The statements in some newspaper articles, as is often the case, are over-dramatic rather than consistent with reality, I think. The Chairman of the Commission shares his authority with 14 other persons on the board. That is something which is prescribed by the Act. There are also, among these 15 persons, five, including me, who form the executive committee. It is not only the law, but it is an actual fact that the present Commission (and for my part I'm very happy about it) is a very united team which works long hours, long days and long weeks. I think I can say, without revealing the Commission's internal discussions (as you know, we don't publicize how we vote, either—that is not in the Canadian tradition) that all of our decisions, without exception, are the result of long discussions in which all the members, without exception, actively participate. It is also true that these are team decisions."

Mr. Fortier: "It's a collective 'you' that I'm using in my questions today, of course."

Mr. Juneau: "Yes. But the journalists have somewhat over-simplified the question."

Mr. Fortier: "This unanimity that you emphasized just now, I must confess that, as a lawyer who is used to dissident opinions in any court judgments, I cannot but admire such unanimity. Did you say that dissident opinions, if there is dissidence, are not publicized, or does the opinion of the majority take precedence?"

Mr. Juneau: "What I said was that I note that in Canada it's the tradition always to express the opinion of the majority, as in the case of the Cabinet. It's not the custom, with control boards or commissions, to present the differences of opinion if there are any in the boards."

Mr. Fortier: "Of course."

Mr. Juneau: "There is an allusion to this tradition in control boards."

Mr. Fortier: "There is nothing in the Act that prevent a member of the Commission from making known any dissidence from a Commission decision, isn't that right?"

Mr. Juneau: "No. I think it's rather tradition, since there shouldn't be any law stipulating that there must be Cabinet solidarity."

Mr. Fortier: "If, in an extremely important decision, you didn't arrive at unanimity, do you think (and again it's a collective 'you' that you, personally, have the deciding vote as Commission Chairman). Do you think that such a difference should be made public if it is on a significant question?"

Mr. Juneau: "I didn't say there was always unanimity in the Commission. Might that not be desirable in some cases? I don't know. I suppose the prevailing tradition until now reflects a certain type of prudence in Canadian administration. I have never been presented with a situation where it might have seemed advisable to depart from that policy of prudence."

Mr. Fortier: "Let's take one of your, not decisions, but statements of intention, the one of February 12, 1970. In the event that one or more members of the Commission were of the opinion that the minimum Canadian content you are now suggesting (and on which you are going to hear presentations at your April hearings) was too high or not high enough, and stuck to it stubbornly, would you recommend that he or they publicly put forward his or their opinion?"

Mr. Juneau: "The question seems quite theoretical to me and is never raised in practice. What would I recommend in a very specific situation? I don't think I would recommend anything. I think it would rather be up to the individual in question to make his own decision."

Mr. Fortier: "I agree."

Mr. Juneau: almost two years after the Broadcasting Act was assented to on March 7, 1968—that'll be two years in two days—are you and your colleagues of the opinion that the Act is as close to perfect as the legislators wanted it to be two years ago? Or, in the face of the cases you have been concerning yourselves with for two years, do you think it would be advisable that the legislators amend it?"

Mr. Juneau: "First of all, it went into effect on April 1, 1968. I must tell you that until now and until any new order, I anticipate that we'll have so much work putting the present requirements of the Act into operation (and we've had so much work putting the present requirements into operation) that the problem of improving the Act was not raised. I must say that with the exception of some very minor cases that don't come to mind right now. I don't see any great problems in the present Act that might be created by rigidity. There are still many possibilities in the Act that we haven't used yet."

Mr. Fortier: On some occasions, as section 15 of the Act allows, the Governor-in-Council, the Cabinet, has issued specific instructions, isn't that right? I am thinking in particular of the directive of March 1969 on the percentage of non-Canadian ownership and interest. Are there other sections in which you have been required to regulate and supervise? Are there other sections of the Act where you wish that the Cabinet had given your Commission more specific instructions?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I think all the sectors in which the Government has the intention of issuing directives are provided for in section 22 in particular, which states that:

[English]

"No broadcasting licence shall be issued, amended or renewed pursuant to this Part (a) in contravention of any direction to the Commission issued by the Governor-in-Council under the authority of this Act..."

[Translation]

In all areas, the Government seems to have clear intentions—the sooner we had them, the better it would be.

But as far as the Commission's administrative needs are concerned, no, we don't have any requirements. Of course, there is the area of concentration of ownership within Canada in which many people...

Mr. Fortier: "You're ahead of me..."

Mr. Juneau: There are all those areas in which it would be useful to have more precise instructions. To some extent, it would be up to us, considering our practical experience, to make recommendations to the Government. However until now, we've been so taken up with decisions these days we are getting out decisions almost every day, some days two. We've had no success in arriving at a system of strict rules in the area of ownership.

[English]

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Quite aside from any recommendations you might have, Mr. Juneau with respect to Parliament improving the existing legislation, perhaps we could approach it from another direction. I am sure that you and your confrères are totally familiar with the Federal Communications Commission and its mandate. Is there any way in which their mandate is superior to yours in handling the problems arising in this area in both countries?

Mr. Juneau: Frankly, Senator, I don't think we have the time nor the need to study how the present legislation could be improved. We started with a very small staff two years ago with an enormously increased mandate. Since then we have been faced with enormous problems, extremely difficult decisions, and at the same time with the need to develop an organization to cope with those problems.

As to the idea of studying how the present legislation could be improved in relation to legislation in other countries, we haven't had time to do that. While we have some knowledge of the American legislation, I wouldn't say that we are very familiar with the relative advantages in the details of the FCC legislation as compared to ours. On the whole the various conversations I have had with members of the FCC, or members of the staff with the FCC, lead me to believe that our situation is considerably better than theirs. I think that the extremely rigid legal approach that prevails in all the U.S. regulatory agencies would create havoc if we had by mere chance adopted such a line of action in Canada.

Recently we presented a project of procedure regulations and heard opinions at hearing. The opinions we had from some of the most competent lawyers in the field of broadcasting regulations were that we should be aware of not making our procedures too rigid so as to reduce the flexibility. I must say that I was surprised. I thought that perhaps the orientation would be in the opposite direction. Frankly we haven't spent a great deal of time thinking about how the present legislation could be improved. There has been on occasion where we have hit upon an important difficulty created by some rigidity in the Broadcasting Act. I am not saying that it is a perfect piece of legislation or that it will be indefinitely by any means.

Mr. Fortier: I am glad to hear that you have been pleasantly surprised by the attitude of lawyers before your Commission, Mr. Juneau. You touched upon an aspect of your decisions that I would like to pursue, and that is the concentration of ownership in the communication media. In many of your famous decisions, as well as in your first annual report to your Minister, you expressed this concern over what you call "excessive concentration of ownership" in the communication media. Your Commission expressed in very clear terms on page 18 of your annual report—that was in reference to your decision in the Okanagan Valley Television Co. Ltd.'s application for a share transfer—the reasons why you attached so much importance to this increased or excessive concentration of ownership. What I would like to know is, where in the Broadcasting Act do you find a concern by Parliament which you are now echoing with respect to this concentration of ownership?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I think that there is no specific reference to this matter as a criteria in the Broadcasting Act. But there is for the Commission the responsibility to regulate and supervise the broadcasting industry in Canada in order to achieve the objectives set out in section 2. There is also the responsibility to grant licences. So obviously in granting licences you have to take into account a great number of criteria of a general nature that cannot possibly be expressed in the Act. One of them is the need to grant licences in such a way that basic principles such as the free flow of information, competition of ideas, and so on (which I think anybody would consider basic in the field of broadcast media in general) have to be taken into account by the Commission.

There is a reference, as a matter of fact, in section 2(d) of the Act which states that programming must provide a "balanced opportunity for the expression of the differing views on matters of public concern." This is the place where there is a reference to the free flow of information.

Mr. Fortier: Are you not in effect equating public interest, or community interest as you call it in your report, with diversified ownership within the communication media?

Mr. Juneau: I am sorry, I don't understand.

Mr. Fortier: You are called upon by the Broadcasting Act to supervise and regulate broadcasting in Canada. You have expressed this concern with this excessive concentration of ownership in communications media. You have made it the object in fact of many of your most important decisions. You have just acknowledged that there is no specific reference in the Act to governments being concerned about the concentration of ownership in the communications media. What I am asking, Mr. Juneau, is whether the CRTC, in deciding as it has, that concentration of ownership in the communications media is a bad thing a thing which should not be encouraged, is not in fact deciding that it was not in the public interest to have concentration of ownership in the communications media?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, undoubtedly. I think that you could demonstrate whether I agree with it or not—you could demonstrate that this preoccupation has been implicit and indeed explicit in many of our decisions.

Mr. Fortier: Are you suggesting that the free flow of information in Canada could be somewhat hampered if there was excessive concentration of ownership?

Mr. Juneau: It seems to me that the philosophy of most people who are concerned about this problem is that this is such an important matter in any country or any civilization, you must minimize the risks, and even though you could have a great deal of confidence in a very large undertaking, wisdom would dictate that you should not take any risks in a matter of that kind and that you should administer in such a way that the public also would be confident. In other words, there should not only be security but confidence that there is security.

Mr. Fortier: Well, it seems to me that though the company may be large or small—what really matters in the end is the integrity of the persons in charge rather than the size of the holdings which they may have in Canada. Would you agree or disagree with that?

Mr. Juneau: Well, everything is relative of course but if we are speaking of—for the purpose of the discussion—of an agreed upon limit after which concentration would become excessive, then I think that the integrity of the individual would have little to do with it.

Mr. Fortier: Agreed. Is it the CRTC's policy to more or less draw a line beyond which concentration will not be in the public interest?

Mr. Juneau: No. We have drawn the line in specific instances. We have not established, as they have done in the United States, a formula which would be the drawing of a line which you suggest. We haven't established a formula based on the number of cities, or the total number of households, or any other such quantitative criteria. We have drawn a line in certain specific cases where we have said to a particular applicant: "We are sorry, you can't go any further."

The Chairman: May I ask a supplementary question? Would you tell us what the American formula is?

Mr. Juneau: Well, offhand, I could at least give the general lines. They do not authorize a company to own television stations in more than five large markets plus two small markets, I think it is.

The Chairman: Is there a radio rule as well?

Mr. Juneau: The radio rule...

Mr. Wilson: This has been changed. It is something like five and five—something in that order.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Fortier: The formula that you allude to, is one based on communities or regions is it not?

Mr. Juneau: In the United States?

Mr. Fortier: Yes.

Mr. Juneau: It is based on what they call the large markets, so that it is the size of the population in major areas.

Mr. Fortier: A formula which I seem to note in the CRTC's decision is one which concerns itself more with cross-media ownership than with population reach. Would that be a correct statement?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I think that most of the cases on which we have had to make decisions until now have had to do with regional or local concentration. We have denied further licences to certain groups because, in the region for which they applied for a particular licence, they already represented a concentration in cross-media ownership.

Mr. Fortier: So then it is really a combination of the two. It is a concentration in the population reach and a concentration, or a combination of media.

Mr. Juneau: That is right.

Mr. Fortier: In reaching a decision in those matters, do you take into account the current media holdings that the applicant or the transferee may have?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: You do so although you have no jurisdiction over the print media. Or, you do take it into account?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent do you take it into account? If an owner of a newspaper in the community applies for a licence, say for a CATV licence, how much weight would his ownership of the daily have on your reaching a decision?

Mr. Juneau: Again, as I have said, we have no formula which would constitute a sort of grid which we could apply to all the cases that either have, will, or could come up, any which would automatically provide the answer. We wouldn't mind if somebody provide us with a grid of that kind; if such a formula were possible it would be very nice. Up to now we haven't found one. In some cases we have taken decisions because we thought that the concentration that would be constituted by this particular application would be excessive.

Mr. Fortier: The concentration of ownership within diverse communication media one particular area?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Coming back to a question which I asked earlier, is this one of the areas—not using the same sense—where you would welcome a directive from the Cabinet?

Mr. Juneau: Certainly, yes. There is a provision for that matter in the Broadcasting Act.

Mr. Fortier: Would it facilitate your work if there were national government policy on the subject?

Mr. Juneau: It certainly would.

Mr. Fortier: In reaching these decisions I am trying to stay away from specific cases.

that you have decided in the last two years for obvious reasons—but is there a rule of thumb which applies across the board from the Atlantic to the Pacific dealing with concentration of ownership aspect or are there only specific situations to deal with Toronto, Windsor, Vancouver, Moncton, et cetera?

Mr. Juneau: There could perhaps be a rule of thumb but I doubt it very much. I think that with a great deal of thinking and experience you could perhaps arrive at a certain number of guidelines. I doubt that you could have a rule of thumb or a rigid rule as they have in the United States, because the country is very large geographically and rather difficult to cover. Suppose you had a rule, for instance, that no broadcaster could operate in more than five large cities. If you had five large cities in Canada you would cover 75 per cent of the population. Any rigid rule, it seems to me, would be very difficult to establish in that field.

Another difficulty is how to avoid excessive concentration and at the same time permit—what is the word in English—l'élan—the impetus which is such an important thing to foster in Canada at the moment in various fields, particularly in the world of ideas—information, broadcasting and entertainment. If Canada doesn't develop an impetus in that field, one wonders how it will succeed in developing an impetus in other fields. So while we have to remain very much concerned about a void in excessive concentration, I think that we have to be equally if not more concerned with developing this impetus, this sense of enterprise, enthusiasm, confidence, and belief in the need of doing things in that field.

In a situation of extreme competition with the most powerful country in the world...

Mr. Fortier: I am tempted to ask you how would you define "excessive"? This is an adjective which you keep resorting to. How would you define "excessive"?

Mr. Juneau: As I said, we don't have a formula and we doubt if it will be possible to develop one. We have had concrete cases where we felt that if one owned a large newspaper, a large television station, then maybe for a given area that was sufficient considering the other newspapers, considering the other television stations, considering the development of CATV in the area, considering the dailies, considering the balance of advertising, and so on. In one given case there are so many variables to take into account that whatever the guidelines which might eventually be developed, they would have to be very complex; otherwise they will be too rigid and will not be applicable, or very difficult to apply.

The Chairman: I believe Senator Everett has a supplementary question.

Senator Everett: I wonder if you could describe for me the conditions that in your mind would result if there were no multi-media ownership in the broadcasting field. In other words, what if every television station and every radio station and every CATV system had to be owned by persons who weren't related in any way to other owners, is a completely independent ownership of the meat of broadcasting?

Mr. Juneau: In other words, none of them would be owned by a newspaper, or none of them would own CATV systems?

Senator Everett: I am not so concerned whether they are owned by newspaper interests or other interests. I am more interested in what would result if there were no concentration in the broadcasting industry itself?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, so if the newspaper owned one broadcasting station they would only own one?

Senator Everett: That is correct.

Mr. Juneau: So you might have cross-media ownership...

Senator Everett: Well, we might come to that, but I am interested in the first question.

Mr. Juneau: Well, I think that if you don't consider cross-media ownership you are leaving out a very important element because if there can be an unlimited number of newspapers owned, so you already have quite a concentration there. So the ownership of one broadcasting station might constitute a problem in a case like that.

The Chairman: I don't think Senator Everett's question is in any way related to newspaper ownership, is it?

Senator Everett: No. Mr. Juneau is accepting that point. But if we chose to accept that point of cross-ownership for a moment and deal with just the completely independent broadcaster, you would have ownership completely independent of every aspect of broadcasting.

Mr. Juneau: Well, I am inclined to think that it would be too rigid a rule. Let me start with an easy case. Almost all FM stations at the moment are owned by AM operators. We think frankly that this is a good thing because we doubt that FM at the moment would or could exist, and could go on developing without the support of an AM station. I have often given the example of what has happened in motion picture theatres for instance where more and more you have twin theatres or two theatres operating together. One has a more commercial policy directed towards the larger audience and the other is directed towards a more selective audience. This provides for more variety, more choice for the public.

In FM and AM you could have something of the same kind. We are inclined to think that there is too much resemblance at the moment between AM and FM stations. There is no reason why the FM station could not be more oriented towards an audience very different from the AM audience. There is one example of something that you couldn't do if the FM stations were completely separate from the AM stations, and the licences were only granted to separate owners.

Senator Everett: Well, let me just follow that through. You are saying what you could not do is insist that the programming be different?

Mr. Juneau: No, we are insisting that the programming be different now.

Senator Everett: But you are saying that you can achieve this single ownership of the AM/FM stations.

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

Senator Everett: But you couldn't do it if that ownership were separated?

Mr. Juneau: No, because the AM stations in most cases support the FM stations. The FM stations make no profit or very little profit at the moment. Some of them do but only a small number of stations. If they do make profits usually it is because they tend to become a second AM station.

The Chairman: What do you mean by that?

Mr. Juneau: They are just a shade off the AM station and they tend to be very close in their programming to the AM station. If the FM stations are to provide a service to more selective audiences—minority audiences which get very little at the moment from the broadcasting system in general—it can only be done if there is some support by a profitable AM station.

The Chairman: Aren't there some markets, Mr. Juneau, where there are more profitable FM stations, where they are AM stations in the same markets?

Mr. Juneau: There are some cases, yes, but not many.

The Chairman: Well, I think Senator Everett probably wants a further answer. We should get it now and then we can go on to Senator Beaubien.

Senator Beaubien: Mr. Juneau, doesn't the ordinary FM station broadcast about 55 minutes of music, and then only about five minutes of advertising? That seems to be the situation in Montreal on the stations I listen to. The AM ones carry a tremendous amount of advertising. Isn't that the big difference at the moment?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, at the moment. One is profitable and the other isn't.

Senator Smith: But the big difference is also programming, isn't it? As far as the general public is concerned, the big difference must be said to be in the programming element?

Mr. Juneau: There is a tendency to have softer music on the FM stations.

Senator Smith: But not better music?

Mr. Juneau: Well,...

Senator Smith: Well, we will not get into that.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: Well, on all FM stations..

The Chairman: Well, why don't you put the question again?

Mr. Juneau: I am all right.

The Chairman: You understand the question?

Mr. Juneau: Yes—there is a certain advantage in allowing the same owners to own more than one station. I think we have ex pressed concern in the other direction a number of times, and I wouldn't want to appear to negate what we have already said on that. We have turned down applications in the case of multiple ownership of radio or TV stations and our views have been changed.

However, to look at the other side of the coin, I think that you do benefit from the professional competence of a group which can apply its professional competence over a number of stations. Quite often you have very competent broadcasters who have developed a station and who are reaching a certain age—which I consider, rather a young age, 45 or thereabouts—and they start thinking of the future of their family, and so on. They want to stay in broadcasting and they want to have a more liquid situation. It then becomes a matter of interest to join a larger group, to remain in charge of their station but to form part of a larger group and also have, perhaps, an influence on more than one station. There again, the professional competence is spread over a large number of stations. If there is an accumulation of professional competence and professional enthusiasm, I think this could be good for the country because if you have a certain number of strong nuclei like this in the country, it will develop other peripheral industries that are very important for broadcasting—film making, record publishing, et cetera. I doubt if you limited all the broadcasting companies to one station that you would develop that impetus that I was talking about.

I think that there must be a little more scope from a financial and from a professional point of view. Now, this again is a matter of balance because we ourselves have told some of those groups "Sorry, you can't buy that station." We also want to preserve enough local flavour in some regions and if you let all the groups develop as much as they can and as much as they would like to, competition wouldn't be equal and it would be relatively easy for almost all the broadcasters in a given region to be bought up by the larger groups in Toronto and elsewhere.

Senator Everett: Does this apply to CATV?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, at this stage anyway.

Senator Everett: Why? Is there a professional competence involved here? Is there a development of supportive services that are beneficial to the broadcasting industry? I don't see that in CATV.

Mr. Juneau: We are of the opinion that there is a need in cable television at the moment for an active role on the part of cable. If cable television is going to be only a means of transporting already existing programs, if there is going to be no active participation in the problems which concern us all—mainly the development of communications in Canada—then I don't see why it shouldn't be transferred to the common carrier as an operation—maybe a new type of common carrier—if it is the policy of Government or Parliament to have competition among common carriers. But if not, it would be a simple thing to turn the whole thing over to common carriers who are used to this kind of thing, wiring a place rapidly and getting access to the largest number of people who want to communicate.

Senator Everett: Well, I think you have answered the question except that I do want to ask you questions about the future. What do you see or what does Mr. Boyle see in the future of broadcasting? It would illuminate the answer you just gave, but perhaps we should move on.

The Chairman: I think we should. Perhaps we could complete our discussion on ownership. I will come back to Mr. Fortier, but I would like to ask Mr. Juneau one or two questions.

You have been discussing ground rules relating to group ownership. Is there any difference in philosophy between radio and television? Are the comments you have been making general to both?

Mr. Juneau: Well, only to the extent that I think generally people will agree that a television station—everything else being equal—is a more powerful means of public information. So in balancing these variables I was talking about, you would probably give more weight to a television station than you would to a radio station—that is, everything else being equal. However, there are some radio stations that are quite important operations.

The Chairman: A question that we have put to many newspaper publishers who came before us—I won't put that question to you, but I would like to put the parallel question to you.—is when does group ownership in broadcasting become excessive?

Mr. Juneau: Again, I think that if I had a formula, a figure, a mathematical criteria to answer that question I would be very pleased, but I haven't. I can only speak of some of the variables. If in a given area you control the newspaper, control the television station, control the radio station, if there is only one of those media present and there is no penetration from outside the media—all of these things must be considered. In some areas for instance, you have this kind of concentration, but the place is penetrated by 20 radio signals and three large metropolitan newspapers so there is some kind of balance. I am not saying that those situations are ideal, but is is some kind of balance. If you have a completely closed-in situation where all the media are controlled by the same owners, that does pose a problem, and we have said so.

The Chairman: I was thinking of group ownership across the country. Is it the same principle?

Mr. Juneau: The point is when does it become excessive?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Juneau: I am sorry, I can't answer that.

The Chairman: Well, if you can't answer it I think we should be clear on the record, and I think perhaps we are, that there is a point at which it does become excessive?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, maybe one idea that I could mention might be helpful. I think that it is—and that is why it is so difficult to have rules because it is sort of like an ecological problem—a matter of balance. It is not really how big is company A, but how big is company B, C, D and F, and how many do you have.

The Chairman: If they exist at all.

Mr. Juneau: Yes. How well will the other companies develop if company A is too big? So really I think it is an administrative problem, not a legal problem. I think that is why it would be difficult to have rigid rules because it is similar to administering a very large company—how important is it to have Division A as compared with division B. This is an administrative problem and a problem of balance. I think the reason why this problem will be very difficult in Canada is that it will have to be considered as an industrial problem, as an economic problem and not as a problem that you will solve with rules.

You might have a certain number of principles in guidelines and objectives but I am afraid if you drive too strongly towards rules you are going to forget that what you are concerned with overall, is the result you want to obtain. There is not only the fear of excessive power on the part of some companies but the need to have other companies develop and contribute to the overall harmony.

The Chairman: Thank you, that is very useful.

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if it would help to clarify this whole situation on this point if the witness would put on our record, in a very brief form indeed, several examples of situations which they have already taken care of, and I presume which you and your board regard as excessive. Can you think of a couple?

Mr. Juneau: Yes and I think they are on record.

Senator Smith: Well, on this record.

The Chairman: Well, I think we have them in our records and I would be reluctant to take a great deal of time...

Senator Smith: Well, I wouldn't think it would take much time.

The Chairman: Mr. Juneau, if you could give us one good example?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I don't mind giving some examples except that it tends to blow up a case.

Senator Smith: Well, don't use any particular names.

Mr. Juneau: It is all on the record—the official record—and the public knows about it. But I will answer that because I have no reason not to answer it.

The Chairman: Well, you don't really have to, Mr. Juneau.

Senator Smith: Well, this is the printed record of what you have said to us here today in relation to this discussion. I just thought it might clarify this point a little further.

The Chairman: I think, Senator Smith, if I may give my reasons...

Senator Smith: Well, just rule me out of order.

The Chairman: Oh, I don't want to rule you out of order but I think that there are so many questions we want to ask Mr. Juneau that I don't want to have him take time saying things which we not only have on the record but we have on the record at considerable length and in great detail.

Senator Smith: I accept that on the grounds that I may interrupt on something else which I think is not as relevant.

The Chairman: Fine. Perhaps when we adjourn in a few minutes you can speak to one of Mr. Juneau's colleagues.

Senator Smith: Fine.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Fortier you would like to get back to your questioning.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortier: On the aspect of ownership, Mr. Juneau, you've explained very eloquently several of the factors you take into consideration when you have to judge a particular case. You said, among other things, that even if it isn't mentioned in the Act, ownership by a newspaper in the medium is one of the factors.

If the applicant, the one who is asking you for a licence, is himself at the head of what is called an industrial complex that has nothing to do with communications enterprises, but who becomes involved in one of the media—let's say one of the most important business men, who has various interests in different companies—would you take that into consideration also?

Mr. Juneau: We would take that into consideration as a negative factor sometimes, and as a positive factor in other cases. Let me explain. I think what would concern us the most would be the applicant's proposed policy and his ability, or rather the confidence we have in his determination to enforce that policy (because we know that it's easy just to talk about policies). Therefore these are the two factors—the proposed policy and the determination and the confidence we have in the applicant's determination to implement that policy.

I say that because, as I was saying a while ago, the fields of broadcasting, publishing or the cinema, in everything that may be called in English the "knowledge and entertainment industry", in spite of our success in Canada in maintaining a broadcasting industry, the fact remains that there is a huge job to be done, and in our opinion we have just begun. Consequently, all financial, creative, intellectual and journalistic forces should be cultivated. Also, any attractive plan presented by a very large enterprise should, I think, be taken up by the Commission even though it is proposed by a very large enterprise. Thus the quality of the plan and the confidence we would have in the determination of the representatives would be the most important factors.

Mr. Fortier: That's the positive aspect, of course?

Mr. Juneau: The positive.

The negative aspect would be the opposite. If it appeared to us as a solely stock-market type of enterprise, and if the people were to get the most out of the situation, by investing the least possible effort and money, we would then, of course, not be interested. The fact remains, however, that even for an enterprise like that, the problem raised by some Senators, i.e. too much power in the hands of a company like that, could arouse concern in the population, and, as I was saying, the confidence of the people in these tools of communication is a very important thing.

Mr. Fortier: In your directive of July 10, 1969, your Commission was saying—my French volume includes the English text, but my English volume, also, includes the English text—so I'll continue in English:

[English]

"It is not the intention of the Commission to intervene in normal bargaining between current holders of the assets or shares of licensees and would-be purchasers.

"It is, however, the policy of the Commission to scrutinize applications for transfer of assets of licensees or for transfer of control of licensees in a manner comparable to its examination of applications for licences for new undertakings.

"Consistent with previous practice, such applications are subject to public hearings, at which objections may be raised and at which companies or persons other than the purchaser proposed by the current licensee may apply for the licence."

[Translation]

Dealing with the price that is offered, I am thinking for example, of the case where the person to whom we want to sell is not acceptable to the Commission and another group makes an offer in accordance with what I have just read, which is for less than the one submitted to you. How important would the price offered be, in the interest, of course, of the seller? To what extent would you take that into consideration?

Mr. Juneau: I think the Commission would give the preference to the applicant presenting the more attractive policy.

Mr. Fortier: Even though, as far as the seller is concerned, he was going to get a smaller price than the one he might have been able to get on the free, open market?

Mr. Juneau: I think so. Of course, the Commission would also be concerned with any injustice that might be caused to the seller if they took advantage of the Commission's preference to offer a ridiculous price.

Mr. Fortier: Of course.

Mr. Juneau: A price which would not offer an honest profit.

Mr. Fortier: To what extent does the Commission try to establish a price that wouldn't be ridiculous and would represent an honest profit?

Mr. Juneau: "I must say that the Commission stays as far away as possible from that question."

Mr. Fortier: "But the whole question should of course, be submitted to you?"

Mr. Juneau: "Our policy in that area is to make the policies of the Commission well known to the public, to possible applicants, to stockbrokers and to securities commissions and to make the obligations and responsibilities of the broadcaster in programming and public service well known. After that it is no longer the responsibility of the Commission to determine whether or not the price is right. That could be in cases where, because a licence had been given to an applicant who did not already have a business agreement with the seller, the Commission might be led to play an unofficial role as a referee, if I may put it that way, between the group holding a property but no licence, and the group holding a licence but no property."

Mr. Fortier: "The buyer, could, of course, profit from such a situation?"

Mr. Juneau: "Right. That's a dilemma we can't get out of other than by the good faith of the participants and a midwife role, if I may call it that, on the part of the Commission, in order to ensure that such good faith is going to exist and yield results. It's the kind of conflict that is well within the tradition of public administration of broadcasting, between licences that are public property and those that are not, and between frequencies that are public property and physical assets that are private property."

Mr. Fortier: "One last question about this aspect of ownership. On July 23, 1969, you considered the problem of banks vis-à-vis broadcasting interests. You said "Bankers, no equity for you." Without asking you to justify that decision (it's definitely not my role, nor the role of the Committee here), can you explain what the decision—it does not explain it in the 5 or 6 lines that I read carefully—can you explain why banking institutions cannot, as far as you are concerned, participate in the equity of broadcasting enterprises?"

Mr. Juneau: "Well, I wouldn't like to give much more explanation than there is in that decision, otherwise I would have done so in the decision. However, there is a very simple reason: concentration. There are very few banks and if the banks are required to play an important financing role through short-term and long-term loans of all kinds to broadcasters and if, in addition, the banks had an interest, a right to participate in the capital, in the form of shares—taking some equity in the companies—this, in our opinion, would be directing a disturbing form of concentration to the banks."

[English]

Mr. Fortier: I said it was my last question on ownership but I have one other. Canada presently has three national television networks—CBC, CTV and Radio-Canada. Is there room in Canada for a fourth television network?

Mr. Juneau: Do you mean four counting...

Mr. Fortier: Four counting the French Radio Canada?

Mr. Juneau: There is room in some areas for an additional television station, but to what extent could it be a network I couldn't say at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: Do you see one going from Victoria to St. John's, Newfoundland, or one going from Windsor to Montreal?

Mr. Juneau: Oh, I think it would be easy to say that there are many places between Victoria and Newfoundland where there is no room for a conventional network. I am not suggesting that there is no room for additional services, but no room in any of these places for an additional network. That is my view. The CTV network at the moment only covers 75 per cent of the population. There is no CTV network unfortunately yet in Sudbury, North Bay, Timmins, et cetera. There is no CTV network in Brandon, Manitoba, and no CTV network in Kamloops, no CTV network in Cape Breton.

Mr. Fortier: This very naturally, and I thank you for it, opens my other line of questioning and it has to do with the extension of service—the extension of service policy of the CRTC. You have just recited a number of cities in Canada who are not served by CTV. Being aware and mindful of your decision in December of 1968 with respect to the extension of the CTV service in the Maritimes, Mr. Juneau, could you tell the Committee where this extension of service policy is going to take us in Canada?

Mr. Juneau: I will be very brief as I would rather leave time for supplementary questions. We have released an announcement today...

Mr. Fortier: Well, that is one I have missed.

Mr. Juneau: ...on the extension of service in northern Ontario and northwestern Ontario. We are very much concerned indeed with Cape Breton. We had, as you know, taken a decision some time ago and it now implemented to have CTV as a second service or an alternate service in New Brunswick and to extend alternate service in southwestern Nova Scotia. We have taken a decision two months ago, to extend alternate service to Kamloops, Kelowna, Vernon, Picton, et cetera, in British Columbia. That is where we stand at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: The BBG's original policy was to refuse, as you point out in your annual report, introduction of alternate service in markets which could not financially support the new stations. This is at page 11 of your annual report.

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: Are you today taking into consideration this aspect of the market being able to financially support the new station? In applying the Broadcasting Act, do you feel that you are justified in going beyond this financial aspect of the alternative service?

Mr. Juneau: I think unless we hear from Parliament that there are public funds available to proceed otherwise, we will go on keeping that factor in mind. There is no other way to support alternate service than by the income from markets from advertising. So any time that we do contemplate extending service by announcing a policy and hoping for applications, and so on, we have to make up our own minds, by our studies, by consultation with the parties in the industry, and with the CBC, to find out whether there are enough financial resources to support another station. We have to find out whether the station will be able to support itself with advertising and to what extent the existing station, whether it is a CBC owned and operated station, but more particularly if it is a private affiliate of the CBC.

Mr. Fortier: What if CTV should say for example—it is not really a hypothetical case, but I will put it to you anyway that "We don't want Moncton."

Mr. Juneau: Oh, well, I maintain my answer, but you are right. It is a more complex matter because fortunately, through the mechanism of the network, you can see to it that the richer markets support the weaker markets and that happens at the moment. I think it is an avowed principle of CTV networks. Many of the stations in the CTV network would find it somewhat difficult to support alone the services they get from the network. There is a form of subsidization in the CTV network and it is accepted as a basic principle of the network and certainly would be welcomed by the Commission and occasionally insisted upon.

Mr. Fortier: The Act speaks of broadcasting service in English and in French, Canada's two official languages. In those Canadian communities, where there are sufficient numbers of Canadian citizens whose native tongue is neither French nor English, has the CRTC considered extending broadcasting services to those Canadians as an alternative service? Or do you feel hampered by the Act as it exists?

Mr. Juneau: We don't feel hampered. It would seem that services to minority groups, or services which reflect minority groups through the rest of the country is an extremely important function which should be achieved by the existing stations or by stations that are licensed. I don't think it would be possible to think of a third English network or a second French network because there are the beginnings of a second French network in Montreal and, I think, of an additional network...

The Chairman: Are you talking about other than French and English?

Mr. Fortier: Yes, that is what I meant.

The Chairman: You think that should be left to the existing stations?

Mr. Juneau: Well, unless, with an unlimited amount of money you can do an unlimited number of things.

The Chairman: Do you think there should be some third language broadcasting in this country?

Mr. Juneau: Well, there is some at the moment in Montreal and Toronto on radio.

The Chairman: And you presumably encourage that?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

The Chairman: What do you think of the calibre of that third language broadcasting in Montreal and Toronto?

Mr. Juneau: We make it a point not to criticize broadcasting stations, except in our official decisions, and only if they need criticizing. I am not suggesting that they do.

Mr. Fortier: I have always wondered why Mr. Juneau didn't elect to become a lawyer! I don't want an answer to that, Mr. Juneau.

The Chairman: Perhaps just before we do have a break for a minute or two I could ask you one question, Mr. Juneau. I mentioned earlier that I sponsored the new Broadcasting Act in the Senate and I well recall the clause, which occasioned the most discussion in the Senate and probably in the House of Commons, and I think, perhaps in this Committee, was the national unity clause. I would like to ask you about it. Perhaps I could ask you by referring to what I consider to be an excellent speech which you made to the annual convention of the Central Canada Association of Broadcasting last October at the Skyline Hotel. You said, and I am quoting you:

"Would it be reasonable to maintain that the national broadcasting service should not even 'contribute to the development of national unity' "

I must say that that was the only sentence that I could find in that speech to really wonder about, because the Broadcasting Act, it seems to me, is not a negative requirement but rather positive requirement. As I read it, broadcasters must contribute to national unity. So my question specifically is this—how can a broadcaster contribute to national unity?

Mr. Juneau: Well, it seems to me that there might be some misunderstanding about that sentence. I think that if I recall my speech I had declared that some people had expressed missivings about that part of the Act and I said that I was in favour of that part of the Act and that I had no misgivings whatsoever. Then I proceeded to explain why, and in arguing with the views different from mine I ended up by saying: would it be reasonable to say that the broadcasting industry should not contribute. The statement in the Act is very reasonable. It doesn't say that the broadcasting system should be a system of propaganda. It doesn't say it should defend any particular constitutional view. It just says that the broadcasting system should contribute to national unity. So I said would it be reasonable to figure that it should not contribute...

The Chairman: I take your point...

Mr. Juneau: Which seemed to be the view of some people.

The Chairman: I felt that you were creating a bit of strawman. I hadn't realized that there were people who took the opposite position. The point I am making, and perhaps making badly, is that the Act, it seems to me, calls for a positive action on the part of broadcasters.

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

The Chairman: And to contribute to national unity.

Mr. Juneau: It does.

The Chairman: Now, how can a broadcaster contribute to national unity?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I think I have spoken to that effect in that speech. I think that by reflecting effectively what is going on in every part of the country, reflecting what Canadians in various parts of the country think, and feel, and say, and how they work, how they think...

The Chairman: And then you say in another speech that it is clear that the views of those who are opposed to national unity must be reflected. How do the views of those who are opposed to national unity contribute to national unity?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I am sure you wouldn't mean that the views of those who are opposed to national unity should not be reflected?

The Chairman: Well, let me give you an hypothetical example. Let us suppose that there is an open-line radio broadcaster on a radio station who is clearly opposed to the principle of national unity. Let us say he is in English Canada and is hostile to French Canadians. Surely he is not contributing to national unity. But would he be tolerated because his views must be reflected? I appreciate that it calls for a judgment...

Mr. Juneau: It does but I don't think you can have pat answers to questions of that kind. I think that whenever you are dealing with the matter of freedom of expression there are no pat solutions. Whenever a regulatory organization has to take action, or to consider a problem which deals with the problem of freedom of expression, it has to hesitate a long, time before taking action.

And so when you quote a hypothetical case like that and say what should be done, I would say: "Well give me the case in detail." Because we are a quasi-judicial body, we will study the case in detail, we will consult our general counsel and we would probably take a long time; and then maybe we won't do anything about it because we will say: "Let the thing proceed; it is the best thing for the country."

However, after the same kind of extremely careful consideration, because we are dealing with the freedom of opinion, we might consider that in a particular case the person in question is creating subversion or sedition and we might decide that in the public interest he should be interrupted; but there is no formula for that kind of situation.

The Chairman: I am going to ask you a question which you may not wish to answer—and please don't.

Are you satisfied that all broadcasters in Canada presently are contributing to national unity?

Mr. Juneau: Well, you know, I have said before that groups of broadcasters and the press have always been, I think, very responsible in dealing with our pronouncements on this matter.

Certainly, we are not satisfied. That is why we are there, in order to represent dissatisfaction, and to express more expectations for better service on the part of Broadcasters. We are telling that to the Broadcasters all the time.

There could be much more done by broadcasters, by the private broadcasters and the CBC in that area. There is no doubt about this. There could be a lot more work done in the whole field of public information, not only in the field of national unity.

The Chairman: Well, just for a moment or two, directing ourselves to this question of national unity, let us take a private radio station.

How can a private radio station contribute to national unity? Are there any special ways or is it simply through its normal broadcast pattern?

Mr. Juneau: Well, let me give you an example.

Some Toronto newspapers have had very good articles about what is going on in the field of popular music in French Canada at the moment.

French Canada, over the last 10 years—if you don't want to be too meticulous about the dates—has developed an amazing number of very good singers and very good song composers. Some of them are popular commercially with rather light types of songs; others are quite significant in the reflection of the thinking and the feelings of French Canada at the moment.

You very seldom hear them outside the Province of Quebec but the newspapers in Toronto have noticed them. The impressarios have noticed them and there have been a few concerts in Toronto. Some of them are very charming, entertaining. They are not highbrow, and some stations have played them also.

At public hearings, when some of us have asked questions about those singers, most of the time the names weren't even known. So this is an example. I think that national unity could be sometimes achieved by transporting charm from one part of Canada to the other. There are a certain number of charming people of both sectors, on both sides of...

The Chairman: Even some from Toronto!

Mr. Juneau: Yes, even some from Toronto.

The Chairman: I would just like to pursue this for one more question, if I may.

I would like to put another question to you that we put to the publishers. Of course you are in the unfortunate position that we are able to ask you to speak for the broadcasting industry. I appreciate that that is very unfair to you.

When we think of national unity, those of us who are I suppose from Toronto and profess to have modest understanding of this issue, are inclined always to look at the responsibility of the English Canadians.

We have put the questions to a lot of publishers about their responsibility to French Canadians.

Do you think that broadcasting in French Canada contributes to national unity, and more specifically to an understanding of attitudes to the rest of the country?

Mr. Juneau: I think that undeniably much more could be done and should be done than is being done at the moment.

The Chairman: That by and large is the answer that the publishers have given.

Mr. Juneau: I have no doubt about that.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: I was very interested to note in this talk which you gave at the Skyline and indeed in the answers you just gave to the Chairman that you interpreted this obligation to contribute to the development of national unity as being one which is squarely put by the Act on the shoulders of the Canadian Broadcasting System.

But I would suggest to you, Mr. Juneau, from a reading of the Act, this is not what the legislators said.

Could we look together at the section—and I don't want to be overly legalistic I assure you. If we could just look at section 2, for example, sub-section (a). We there have a definition of what constitutes a "Canadian broadcasting system comprising the public and private elements."

And then in sub-section (f) we are told that there will be a "corporation established by Parliament for the purpose, a national broadcasting service that is predominantly Canadian in content and character."

Would you agree with me that what is referred to there is the CBC?

And it goes on to say in (g) that "the national broadcasting service," the CBC, should "contribute to the development of national unity."

It seems to me that the legislation imposes this obligation merely on the CBC and not on the privately-owned radio and television networks and stations. Do you agree with me?

Mr. Juneau: I would agree with your reading of section 2(g). However, I would like to draw your attention to section 2(b), which says:

"The Canadian broadcasting system should be effectively owned and controlled by Canadians so as to safeguard, enrich and strengthen the cultural, political, social and economic fabric of Canada."

In sub-section (d) it says that the programming "should be of high standard, using predominantly Canadian creative and other resources."

I would suggest that there is as clear a definition of intention there as there is in the other sub-sections.

Mr. J. Hylton, General Counsel, CRTC: Section 8 is important also.

Mr. Fortier: On the question of conflict?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

Mr. Hylton: It is a conflict as to objectives you know in the two acts, Mr. Fortier.

Mr. Fortier: Yes. We always refer to this fostering of national unity and I find it interesting to note that specific obligation is imposed on the CBC.

Mr. Juneau: If you mean that the word unity has been used in 2(g), I agree with you

But I suggest that the same pre-occupation has been expressed in other words in the other two sections.

Mr. Fortier: This is how you have interpreted it?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

The Chairman: I am going to suggest, Senators, Mr. Juneau and ladies and gentlemen, that we now adjourn for five minutes until 4.20.

Short adjournment

The Chairman: If I may call the session back to order. Perhaps I could put a first question to you, Mr. Juneau.

I suppose if I were to ask you how you would handle a hypothetical situation which might take place five or eight years from now, when some enterprising television station decided to run "I am Curious (Yellow)" on its late night movie, you would answer that you would make the decision five or eight years later.

Mr. Juneau: Well, I would answer that I would hope that someone else would be Chairman of the Canadian Radio-Television Commission.

The Chairman: What would you do now if some enterprising television station decided that it would purchase the television rights for "I am Curious (Yellow)"?

Mr. Juneau: I would call a meeting of the Committee.

The Chairman: What would you recommend to the Committee?

Senator Quart: Go and see it!

Mr. Juneau: Isn't that what all judges do when they have a problem like that—rush to the night club and look at the act?

The Chairman: Well, having looked at the act, what would you do?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I don't know, I haven't seen the film.

The Chairman: Well, what about this problem in general. Movies, as you know, are advertising better than ever and this is surely going to represent a problem on television somewhere along the line.

Mr. Juneau: Well, I think that there has been no serious problem in Canada. I think that the problems that have arisen in Canada up until now where complaints have been more numerous in relation to a particular problem, have been handled responsibly by the broadcasters. I think it would be the opinion of the Commission that that is the better way to handle such problems. It would be unwise to expect a Commission like ours to be too active or to be too concerned with problems of that kind.

I think that the worse thing that could happen for the CRTC would be to become a censorship organization. As I said, I think up until now the broadcasters have taken care of those problems that have occurred. Considering that there are so many hundreds of stations in Canada broadcasting 17 hours a day, there haven't been that many problems.

The Chairman: Well, in essence then you are saying that in this entire area the broadcasters are self-policing?

Mr. Juneau: I would say that from our experience self-policing has been effective on the whole.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier, did you have a supplementary question?

Mr. Fortier: Yes. You say that you do not wish for the CRTC to set itself up as a censor?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I said that I would regret a situation where the CRTC would be pushed into playing a censorship role.

Mr. Fortier: Because you do have that responsibility under the Broadcasting Act?

Mr. Juneau: I don't deny that.

Mr. Fortier: "No station or network operator shall broadcast any obscene, indecent or profane language." You have never had to have recourse to this regulation?

Mr. Juneau: The CRTC hasn't. The BBG, I think, had some problems in this area in the past but not the CRTC.

The Chairman: Are there not instances now of complaints that you are receiving about obscene and profane language on, for example, radio?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I think there may be some occasionally but none have been that serious that they have had to come to my personal attention or to the attention of the executive committee.

In other words they have been handled—those that may have occurred—in a routine way and the normal procedures have taken care of the problems.

The Chairman: In this area are the standards different than those say of ten years ago—and I appreciate that you weren't there ten years ago. There is certainly a more liberal view in society at large, so is there a more liberal view in the community?

Mr. Juneau: Well, let me put it this way. I think that the Commission would be more inclined to rely on the Criminal Code to deal with matters of that kind as an indication of philosophy let's say.

But our regulations in that field, like in many other fields, as you know are not complete or definite, so I can't be more precise than that.

There are many areas of regulations concerning programming that we haven't dealt with but I think the philosophy will be the one I have indicated—that whenever such matters can be left to the court, we would do so.

The Chairman: Well, if I may give you an example.

When I was a boy and when you were a boy...

Mr. Juneau: There was no television.

The Chairman: No, but it was radio that I wanted to ask you about.

If we turned on CBC radio and most private radio stations in the country at 11 o'clock on Sunday morning we would hear church broadcasts.

I happened to be listening to the CBC radio either last Sunday morning or a week ago Sunday morning at 11 o'clock, and at about one minute to 11 o'clock heard a beeped-out if you will, four letter word on CBC network radio.

Does this distress you at all, does it concern you?

Mr. Juneau: Well, let me put it this way. I have been in the field of public communications for I think over 20 years now and on the one hand there is no doubt that people who have the profession of informing the public, have to inform the public. This means that very often, if not always, they precede the public otherwise they don't do anything.

On the other hand, I can say that very often, like a man or a woman in a small town or in a rural area of the country, I do resent, as an individual, smart alecky attitudes on the part of the people in the metropolitan centres who think they have a God-given liberal mission of broadening the minds of the people in the boon docks.

The Chairman: In the hinterland?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, in the hinterland. I think it is a contemptible attitude and to the extent that that kind of thing happens in broadcasting, as an individual I think it is bad broadcasting and bad public communications. It is pretentious, it is contemptuous of the people and, I think, that there may have been a time when there was a public responsibility to liberalize the views of people on the phenomena of human reproduction.

I personally think that time has passed. I think the battle has been fought a long time ago. There may be a few skirmishes here and there that may have some importance, but I think on the whole it is a reactionary attitude and that it is a waste of time. There are so many more important things to do.

The Chairman: Perhaps there are so many more important things to discuss at this Committee, so we can turn to other matters.

Mr. Fortier:

Mr. Fortier: In the same vein...

The Chairman: I said there were more important things!

Mr. Fortier: In the same vein. Other matters, but in the same vein.

This regulation puzzles me because after this reference to obscene, indecent or profane language, we have the reference to "false or misleading news". There is also a reference to a programme on the subject of birth control which is taboo unless presented "in a manner appropriate to the medium of broadcasting," and "to a programme on the subject of venereal disease unless "presented in a manner appropriate to the medium of broadcasting". Have you as a Commission, since you have been in existence, had to censor a station or broadcast operator or network operator on any one of these grounds in regulation number 5?

Mr. Juneau: I am sure we haven't as a Commission. Under the Food and Drug Act, there may have been administrative decisions taken by some officers of the Commission which may in one way or other, perhaps remotely, have been related to that. But the answer is no, flatly.

Mr. Fortier: You have not used this particular regulation?

Mr. Juneau: This is a regulation of the BBG which goes back so many years, and all these regulations are being reviewed by the Commission at the moment. But we really haven't published new regulations in that field because we didn't feel it was very urgent. We had more urgent things to do.

Mr. Fortier: Would it be fair to say that by and large the broadcasters haven't given you a reason to use it?

Mr. Juneau: Well, they haven't given us a reason to apply those regulations. Mind you, when the regulations exist and a serious complaint arises, it tends to create a problem because if you have a regulation you are bound by it.

Mr. Fortier: Could a reader or viewer complain to the CRTC? Does this happen?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

Mr. Fortier: On the use of say four letter words?

Mr. Juneau: Oh, I don't know. Again, I should say that no complaints have been that serious that it had to come to my attention.

Mr. Fortier: Going from one form of content to another, if we may apply our minds, Mr. Juneau, to the proposed new regulation concerning increased use of Canadian content which your Commission issued on the 12th February of this year.

Since these regulations—or proposed new regulations which I am sure you will wish to stress, and I intend to do also—are mere proposals and since they were made public early last month, there have been comments of all sorts voiced by broadcasters.

One of them—which I am sure has reached your desk if not your ears or your eyes—is as to do with the fact that the quality of programming, at least on the English language television stations, will decrease considerably.

Would you care to comment on that view?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I wouldn't comment on that view because it is a view expressed by a licensee who will appear before the Commission to support his views and the Commission will have to make a decision on whether the view of that broadcaster is correct or not.

I think that it is an argument that is valid, and it is a risk that one has to evaluate and measure. I think we are quite prepared to grant that.

We are not prepared to accept the view that any increase in quantity is useless and is bound to have negative effects on quality. Certainly, you cannot obtain quality by decree. Quality is a matter of initiative, creation, imagination and the Commission is concerned with quality also. But I think that in every country of the world where you have broadcasting systems, except the United States, there is a very good reason for that.

I think the Americans are very generous people, but in this instance it is not because of generosity that there are no rules about foreign programmes because it is the most powerful broadcasting organization in the world.

There are no rules—there is one exception—no foreigners can own more than 20 per cent of American broadcasting stations.

It is also very difficult to buy a film company in the United States. It is possible, but difficult, and it is rather difficult to buy theatres also.

In all other countries of the world, where there is a film company or broadcasting industry, there is a very definite system of rules to permit the development of national broadcasting, a film industry, etc.

There is such a situation in Great Britain, in France, in Italy, in Japan, in Germany—in every country of the world where there is a broadcasting industry or film industry to speak of.

All those rules have to do principally with quantity because that is the way that you help an industry to start, and then you hope that because of various other factors quality will develop also.

When Great Britain in the 1950's set up a series of rules to help the development of feature films in Great Britain, there was exactly the same kind of outcry that the films would be of terrible quality.

The British people who had invested money in television and in motion picture theatres and who thought they could attract larger crowds with American films and make more money that way than with the British films (that would have to be made under those rules and made quickly and be of lesser quality, were using exactly the same argument.

Now, Great Britain is one of the most prosperous countries in the world as far as film making is concerned.

Admittedly, much of the activity is helped by the presence of American companies and actors and so on, but there is a very active motion picture industry in Great Britain.

Mr. Fortier: So what you are saying is that by increasing the quantity of Canadian content you are hoping that the quality will also be increased?

Mr. Juneau: I am not saying it is going to be automatic.

Mr. Fortier: No, but you are expressing a hope?

Mr. Juneau: I am saying that it is one of the factors that can have an impact. Before you can have good programmes, you have to have programmes. Before you can have a film you have to have a film maker, or you have to have film companies. If they haven't even the stepping stone to start, they can't start.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: May I, at this stage of our proceedings, congratulate you. I heard you on television the other night explaining the Canadian content and I for one think it is wonderful to give an opportunity to Canadian talent. How else are we going to help our Canadian people.

Mr. Juneau: Thank you.

Senator Quart: And I really believe that some of our Canadian talent is superior to some of the programmes we see coming from the United States.

I am not always in agreement with the CBC—may I just continue for one second Mr. Chairman?

The Chairman: Certainly.

Senator Quart: About three years ago when Mr. Pearson was Prime Minister, there was a Committee, a "clean-up T.V. campaign" established—I think you have heard me mention this on another Committee . . .

Mr. Juneau: Yes, and enjoyed it thoroughly.

Senator Quart: I did receive a lot of compliments.

The Chairman: I wish you and Senator Quart would get down to the facts! I would be very grateful Senator Quart if you would put the question, and Mr. Juneau, you answer it!

Senator Quart: Well, it started out in the West and I had nothing to do with it. I don't know if I signed it or not, but I wish I could have signed it ten times. We had about 65,000 signatures on it at the time and I think it accomplished something.

I think our Chairman—I don't know whether he mentioned it—came to my office at one time about the Committee.

Now a gentleman, I believe of your committee or in some connection anyway with the CBC, called about eight or nine months ago and asked me if he could borrow books.

There was nothing I wanted more than to get rid of those books in my office. So I telephoned the woman who had really spearheaded this and finally got all the books. He could then look them over very carefully and see that no two people signed.

However, what I usually tell people who complain—and I know very well you receive many letters of complaint and telephone calls—that it is no use writing to the CBC. But I said to write to the sponsor—when there is a sponsor—and you will get action. I know that action has been taken in many instances.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: We had a very interesting discussion this morning. Mr. Juneau, with Professor Thomas McPhail, the co-chairman of the department of communications at Loyola University.

Among a lot of other very interesting things he said was something dealing with Canadian content.

I think you might be interested in knowing that he said that the problem of Canadian content is of such importance and so challenging that if we don't do something about it there will be no Canada within ten years.

Is that very much of an over-statement?

Mr. Juneau: It is easier for a professor to make a declaration like that than for a public servant, but I am inclined to agree.

Senator Smith: He went on—I thought you might agree with this also—to put a figure on what we should be willing to pay and the funds should come from the government and from the television industry and from the advertisers I suppose. He put the figure of a billion dollars for getting good Canadian content.

He even suggested that one way the Government could get it would be by abolishing the Senate, thereby saving two million dollars. He felt so strongly that he also wanted to abolish family allowances and so on.

The Chairman: It was a billion dollars a year.

Senator Smith: Yes, per year.

Mr. Juneau: Well, is he a Professor of Economics?

Senator Smith: Communication Arts. I think what his point was, and I think you will agree with me, that he was just trying to shake somebody up and perhaps overstate the case.

But as a young man he felt pretty strongly about the lack of Canadian content.

Mr. Juneau: Well, let me put it this way. I think the economics are exaggerated. I think that it is a difficult problem and there are not unlimited funds in private broadcasting. Although some broadcasting companies can be quite prosperous and make very good profits, if you look at the whole industry and say: "Okay, supposing you cut the profits to 6 per cent or 7 per cent, or what anybody would consider reasonable, suppose it is 10 per cent—because you can get 10 per cent or 8-3/4 per cent from the banks now—how much money is there left?" In other words how many more millions would you have to invest in programming?

It is not a very large sum of money. Money is a problem but I don't think it comes anywhere near that figure.

As far as the philosophical aspect of the question, I think that broadcasting, with certain other areas of life in Canada, newspapers, certainly the media in Canada, in general—and without making too complicated a thesis—are a reflection of what we say and what we think.

It is like an individual, how he sees his life, how he imagines what he is driving at, where he is going, and that is how he expresses it. It is the image he has of himself, the image he develops as to what he wants to make of himself.

Now, anybody who reflects a little bit on his own personal experience knows that unless you decide what you are going to do, unless you have a somewhat precise image of what you want to do, it is no use thinking that you are going to get up in the morning and do something. To get up in the morning and just do what you did the morning before, sort of continue in a sort of pragmatic down to earth way—I am not saying that you are not achieving things this way—you are but you have no hope of going very far.

It is the people who have an image, a picture, and if the picture is more elaborate it becomes a precise purpose, an objective, but this is the result of communication.

If a country doesn't have a lively, vital and active communications system, if all the talk, all the movement of views, ideas, and opinions, and all the images come from outside, then I suggest that after a while you have no common purpose, and if you have no common purpose it is like an individual who has no personal purpose. You are not getting anywhere, and in that sense I agree. I think it is a very important concept to clarify at the moment in Canada.

Of course, if we think of broadcasting as a pipe system to transport goods then of course that is another matter altogether.

I think that there are cheap ways of doing that and we don't need to have committees or commissions and complicated legislation and so on. There are very pragmatic ways of doing that very fast and cheaply and I don't need to describe them. But that is not why my colleagues and myself have accepted the responsibility of this Commission, and I don't think that is why Parliament has taken all the trouble of developing this Act.

If you read it carefully there are much broader and fortunately much more intelligent expectations in this Act than just providing canned entertainment.

Senator Smith: Well, thank you very much for your very interesting response.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Within the context of what you have just said and also Section 2 (e) and (g) of the Act:

Section 2(e): "All Canadians are entitled to broadcasting services in English and in French as public funds become available."

And in Section 2(g): "the national broadcasting service should—be in English and French serving the special needs of geographic regions . . ."

There are 250,000 French-speaking people in New Brunswick out of a population of approximately 625,000 who live primarily on the northern shore of the province and currently do not get French language television to a large degree.

Mr. Juneau: As you know we have made a decision which is being implemented now by the CBC that the CBC should have a real station, a French language station, in Moncton and not only a re-broadcasting station at Montreal as it still has at this minute. Any month now they expect to open an originating station in Moncton which would hopefully at some point cover the whole of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

As far as northern New Brunswick is concerned, you are right, there is no service in northern New Brunswick in French except coming from the Gaspé over Chaleur Bay. We are very much concerned about that.

We would like, once we have finished with northern Ontario, to devote a great deal of energy to that situation and to Sydney and northern Cape Breton, where there is no service at all at the moment.

There is a very small population, about 2500, but it is scandalous that there should be no service at all in either English or French.

Senator Smith: Or maybe Gaelic!

Mr. Juneau: That may be wise. It is difficult of course because it requires two or three rebroadcasters and the rebroadcasters can only be supported by the CBC. Then we are back to the priorities of the CBC and the financial situation of the CBC at the moment.

Senator McElman: Well, I have established your priority so I had better wait for the CBC to establish theirs in that context.

Mr. Juneau: Well, there are communications between the CBC and the CRTC.

The Chairman: Mr. Boyle, you made what I consider a significant and worthwhile speech in San Francisco on the 29th of December last year.

You said in part that we do not really know what television is doing to our children.

Is the CRTC trying to find out?

Mr. Harry J. Boyle (Vice-Chairman, Canadian Radio and Television Commission): Well, Mr. Chairman, I was beginning to think you would never ask.

The Chairman: I have lots of questions.

Mr. Boyle: That particular speech was actually a draft of a proposal for a seminar at the American Law Professors Association.

In passing I must say that if you really want to get publicity for a speech step outside your own country and make it.

In terms of the specific thing you refer to, I think part of the continuing problem of society is trying to determine some of the influence that television has not only on children but on adults.

It is widely debated among sociologists but no one really has any pat answers for it.

I think however there is one fundamental thing to remember, that if a commercial on television will move products, certainly programmes on television will have an influence on people.

We are concerned and continue to be concerned about the effects of television.

The Chairman: Are you doing any specific studies.

Mr. Boyle: Not at the moment on that subject.

The Chairman: Have you done any specific studies?

Mr. Boyle: Not on that subject.

The Chairman: There was a group before us which made a great point about the need for this kind of study.

Do you think that that would be a useful thing?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, it would be useful I think, but you know it is a matter of how many things you can do at the same time.

The Chairman: But you would agree that this is an area where you should be doing some work?

Mr. Juneau: Oh, certainly.

The Chairman: May I read another quote from your speech. I read it only because I think it is one of the most delightful quotes I have come across in a long time.

"There is something ludicrous about middle-aged people, speaking from their vested interests, lamenting the faults and woes of the generation which they allowed to grow up over the last number of years under the care of electronic baby-sitters, namely T.V."

That is a great quote. Would you comment on it?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I would prefer just to let it stand.

The Chairman: Well then, maybe I can draw you out on one other remark you made in another speech.

You talked about the public hearings of the CRTC and you said that the citizens had a chance to come to the meeting, and I quote you: "Unfortunately, too few came forward."

How are citizens informed of CRTC meetings? Is the only way that citizens learn of the public meetings by those dull stereo-type advertisements that the CRTC puts out?

Mr. Boyle: I think we have allies in a group of very active people in other forms of media in this country who are concerned about it and who constantly keep referring to hearings, and incidentally keep referring to the fact that the hearing is a form of democratic expression which could only remain democratic if the public does participate in them.

Now, as to the business of whether we have singing commercials for the hearings—we haven't progressed to that point as yet.

The Chairman: You know, I know I shouldn't have asked you any questions.

Don't you think that if you seriously wanted to get greater participation at those public meetings you could?

Mr. Boyle: I may say that it struck me when I came to the Commission that it was a peculiar omission that when stations, which are broadcasting undertakings, were appearing before the Commission for the very vital part of their life—the renewal of their licence or transfer of their licence—these announcements were only being made in newspapers.

Yet on the other hand they were saying, they were potentially the most vital form of communication in the country. You will notice that in the draft regulations, we are now requiring the stations themselves to publicize the fact that they will appear at a certain time before the Commission.

I feel if I may be allowed to make a personal comment, that the public hearing is a place where all those people who are concerned should make representations about their concerns about broadcasting.

I realize it is difficult because we hold hearings in certain parts of the country, but there is a procedure by which they can make known to the Commission their views in terms of a particular broadcast organization.

And while some broadcasters—not all but some broadcasters—have resisted the fact that we encourage the public to make representations to the Commission, this is a fallacy. Everyone living in a community has the right to express their feelings and views about how they consider the Commission should be discharging its responsibilities.

The Chairman: And they should do it at those hearings?

Mr. Boyle: That's right. They can make representations either orally or make representations by letter.

The Chairman: Would you express an opinion on the people, one of whom Mrs. Pearce used to be, television critics? Surely they have a function. You wouldn't expect them to withhold their opinions until they came before the Commission?

Mr. Boyle: I find the critics most charming.

Mr. Juneau: I was just going to repeat what Mr. Boyle has said. The proposed new policy and regulations that we have published early in February, are proposals which require the broadcasting organizations to announce on the air that they are applying for renewal of a licence or any other application of that nature.

So there will have to be advertisements or announcements on radio or television.

The Chairman: Is it possible that at some of your hearings there are so many applicants there is no room for the public?

Mr. Juneau: That is true.

I know that there is a certain backlog of work to be done in the field of broadcasting, and until some of this backlog has been cleared there will continue to be things that we would enjoy doing very much and which we think are very important but we have to finish the housekeeping so to speak.

The Chairman: I have only two more questions. Perhaps I can put them and then turn to the Senators.

What is your general opinion of the calibre of private radio in Canada?

If the question is too sweeping, perhaps I could be more specific. Are you concerned about those private radio stations which as I understand are programmed in the United States?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, we are, and we have said so many times.

The Chairman: Are there many of them?

Mr. Juneau: I can't tell you. We haven't made any detailed studies.

We have the impression that there is a great deal of format kind of programming—whether the programming is actually done by an American consultant or whether it is just the format that is adopted.

The Chairman: You mean that the “format” is stolen. Perhaps “adopted” or “borrowed” would be better words?

Mr. Juneau: Yes.

The Chairman: But some of them are sold I understand?

Mr. Juneau: Some of them are sold, yes.

Mr. Boyle: The format consultants are put into effect.

The Chairman: Yes.

Could I ask you Mr. Juneau—and this is a question I am sure you will be discussing next week—what is the attitude you have towards commercial advertising on the CBC?

Although we haven't really turned to broadcasting, recommendations have been made to us already that there should be no commercial content on the CBC.

Mr. Juneau: Well, I can discuss it to some extent. I am inclined to think that, although the Commission has no policy on that, that to suppress commercials completely on the CBC would not be a good thing.

For one thing, you would have to replace $30,000,000 and to replace that revenue would be a real problem. I think that the relationship with the world of business is represented by advertising and I suppose you may agree, Mr. Chairman, that that is not a bad thing in itself.

I think that this kind of relationship between the CBC and the world of advertising and advertisers is a good thing. I think that the relationship between a public organization like the CBC and the world of advertising can have beneficial effects not only because of the revenue but because there is a certain down-to-earth effect of having to deal with the obligation of business which is a good thing.

Certainly it can also lead to situations which are not good. There is a problem also that has been raised by some of the broadcasters as to whether the CBC could be inclined to use its strength as a subsidized organization to compete with private broadcasting, and whether this gives the CBC unfair means to compete with private broadcasters to obtain advertising.

The Chairman: Senator Everett?

Senator Everett: You say, Mr. Juneau, that the CBC derives $30 million a year from commercial advertising?

Mr. Juneau: I think that is the approximate figure.

Senator Everett: Does anyone know what it costs the CBC to get those commercial revenues if you exclude from that, programme costs?

In other words, I would be talking about the commercial costs.

Mr. Juneau: I wouldn't have the figure myself. Perhaps Mr. MacDonald would have the figure. I don't know what the costs of maintaining a sales organization for the CBC might be.

The Chairman: Is that what you meant specifically?

Senator Everett: Yes, the whole commercial operation. I was just wondering whether they were making a profit on their commercial department.

The Chairman: Well, we can ask the CBC. Publishers have come here—a great many of them, particularly in the magazine industry—complaining to us about the fact that the CBC sold programmes for less money than it cost the CBC to produce them, and they felt that this was unfair competition.

Is that the case and is it unfair competition?

Mr. Juneau: I think if you look at it carefully I would be inclined to think that it is probably not always unfair.

There may be cases when it is but I would think that you probably have the same thing with large international companies or American companies supporting programmes on NET for the commercial network in the United States when they don't pay the full cost of the programme. Somebody produces the programme and is willing to put up the money, then they receive a large amount of support from an individual sponsor. I think that it would be regrettable if the CBC could never obtain—in a revised commercial policy) support for a programme unless it was 100 per cent support.

If you want to make it completely comparable to a commercial operation it would have to be a hundred and some per cent in order to make a profit. So it would be somewhat ridiculous to take that position.

There may be some hypothetical cases where a programme should be sold com mercially because it is strictly a commercial programme, and if it can be sold by a private broadcaster with a profit then the same criteria should apply.

I think perhaps the general philosophy should be that if what you are doing fits within a commercial pattern, then you should expect to play the commercial game. You shouldn't cheat with the rules of the game. That would be my view. But I think when you talk of certain points of institution sponsorship it is not cheating with the rules of the game to accept support for a programme which you produce on your own.

The Chairman: Mr. Fortier?

Mr. Fortier: Would the game remain fair if the viewers were charged a licence fee to receive CBC programmes for example?

Mr. Juneau: Well, you are talking of another Broadcasting Act now.

I think this poses important changes in broadcasting. It was dropped by Parliament so many years ago, and whether it is feasible or not now I think would require a great deal of thinking.

You have that kind of system in cable broadcasting and cable television at the moment.

Mr. Fortier: With the increasing importance which cable broadcasting is taking in Canada, is it not possible that we will see the day where all viewers will be assessed a fee in order to receive these 50, 60 or even 80 channels in their home?

Mr. Juneau: I think there is an enormous amount of exaggerated literature on that subject.

The Chairman: Well, I think we are getting into the general area which Senator Everett wanted to discuss. Would you like to say anything on the subject of technology?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I don't speak as an engineer, which I am not, nor as a technologist, which I am not either, but I think that we are still coping in Canada with the difficulty of supplying two services, one in English and one in French, to as close to the total population of Canada as possible.

We provide the English television service to 95 per cent of the population and, as we were saying earlier with Senator Smith and Senator McElman, there are areas of the country where that has not been achieved as yet.

The second television service serves 75 per cent of the population and the 25 per cent of the population which does not get service is clamouring for it and using every possible means of getting it. And I suppose those people are right.

French service is provided almost everywhere by 'rebroadcasters'—there are CBC originating stations in Montreal, Ottawa, and Quebec City.

In Northern Ontario where 35 per cent of the population is French-speaking, service is provided from Montreal. At this moment Moncton and the whole of the Acadian population (which is half a million people) get service from Montreal.

So all that to say that the problem of providing the whole population, or close to 100 per cent of it with broadcasting service through cable is, I think, some distance away.

The problem is that if we adopted a course full speed toward not a hundred channels (because that is a little bit further away) but 24 channels which is not very far away, if we tried to serve the whole population with these 24 channels, it would require immense investment, a fraction of which we don't have at the moment, to supply the broadcasting services to the population in English or in French.

I suggest that if we do invest that amount of money to promote this kind of service fast (because you would have to do it fast, otherwise the population wouldn't let you) then we wouldn't have any money to do anything else.

Senator Everett: Would you enlarge on why you would have to do it fast?

Mr. Juneau: Because it is a matter of balance I think. If you do it at a certain rhythm, there is a risk in choking broadcasting.

If you don't do it with a certain policy, a certain course or co-ordination, a certain care for the balance between broadcasting and the new form of communication, you risk choking broadcasting. Then you would lose your people in the rural areas because they would lose all the services, or the service they would get would deteriorate to a point where it wouldn't be interesting any more.

So, one way or the other, the rural areas, the distant areas, the people who need communications more than the others because they are further away from the metropolitan areas, are going to see their broadcasting system, which they get free at the moment, reduced considerably or even lost completely.

It is the smaller places that are going to suffer first.

I have a letter here about a station in Yuma, Arizona which is the result of exactly that; it disappeared, exactly because of that kind of thing.

The cable system progressed in such a way that the T.V. station had to close down about a month ago.

Senator Everett: Doesn't that mean that the cable system served the area then?

Mr. Juneau: In Yuma itself probably. I can't go on discussing the case of Yuma because I don't know it that well.

Take the cases of Lloydminster or Red Deer or Chicoutimi; in all those more distant areas of the country where cable wouldn't be possible, there would be areas outside of Lloydminster—the T.V. station in Lloydminster at the moment . . .

Senator Everett: Is that a rebroadcast station?

Mr. Juneau: No it is a separate station.

Senator Everett: A separate station?

Mr. Juneau: Yes, providing local programmes. So is Red Deer—and there are two broadcasting stations in Chicoutimi. They provide a service not only to Red Deer, Lloydminster, Chicoutimi, Jonquière or Arvida, but to the whole rural population around these places.

Now, if you kill these television stations you might have . . .

Senator Sparrow: Why would you?

Mr. Juneau: Because of unlimited and unregulated competition from CATV.

Senator Sparrow: I thought you said in the case of Red Deer it wouldn't be worthwhile to bring cable systems into Red Deer?

Mr. Juneau: No. I am speaking of rural areas around the centres which are served by—let me give you a certain list of figures.

Take Lethbridge, for example. The population of the city of Lethbridge is 37,000. This population is in the beam contour of the station. The population outside the city, where it is very difficult and expensive to develop a CATV system, is 91,000. So the population of Lethbridge is 41 per cent.

I can give you all kinds of examples: Moose Jaw is 16 per cent; Brandon, 28 per cent; Red Deer is 24 per cent.

Senator Everett: Then what sort of policy is the CRTC likely to follow to prevent this from happening?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I am just saying that we must foster the development of cable but we must be very careful about a theory—it is not a theory—it is a slogan which is expressed quite often—that you shouldn't resist technology, if the technology is there you should use it.

I say it is not a theory. I think any sensible person thinking about that would realize that in 1970 it doesn't make sense. There are all kinds of technologies that have to be controlled today because they were not controlled 20 years ago, and we are now paying for it.

We have not controlled the technology of detergents and we have a considerable pollution problem.

Senator Everett: Let's go back then to a situation such as the city of Toronto where the problem doesn't arise.

What do you see as the future of CATV in Toronto? Will there be 80 channels in Toronto?

Mr. Juneau: I would say that there should be 80 channels in Toronto if we want 80 channels in Toronto. Not we, the CRTC.

If there should be a policy and if there should be 80 channels and if from a policy point of view it makes sense to have 80 channels—and I don't much care if this does happen . . .

Senator Everett: How about 24?

Mr. Juneau: Well, even 24—what do you want to do with them? If 24 channels in Toronto means that you have to import all your material to fill 24 channels and if it means that you have to import all the top American papers into Toronto through facsimile and so on, instead of developing newspapers in Toronto while which can have co-operative arrangements with the American papers like the Globe and Mail has with the New York Times or with the London Observer, if it means to fill those channels just because the channels are there, then I say we should question that.

Senator Everett: Do you feel that the CRTC has jurisdiction over closed circuit broadcasting, or what might be considered closed circuit broadcasting?

Mr. Juneau: No, I don't think it has.

Senator Everett: Do you think it should have?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I really can't say.

Senator Everett: Well I am thinking of an Italian closed circuit operation that's in either Toronto or Montreal.

Mr. Juneau: Well it might be useful if you defined what you mean by "closed circuit?"

Senator Everett: Well, I used the term "closed circuit" . . .

Mr. Juneau: I said we don't have any jurisdiction on closed circuit, so maybe we don't have the same definition of what closed circuit is.

Senator Everett: We probably don't because I am not sure that I understand what I am talking about.

As I understand it, your policy is that your jurisdiction extends to what you take off the air or put on the air. Closed circuit I suppose would be, for instance, a cable television station broadcasting, or if I went to the common carrier (to the Bell system) and said that I would like to rent a cable and I hooked up directly to that cable and the homes were hooked up, I would gather that would be closed circuit. Alternatively, if a newspaper decided they would have facsimile transmission . . .

Mr. Juneau: Well, let me put it this way. If the system is licensed by us because it is an open-ended system, because it has an antenna to pick up signals from the air, we think we have jurisdiction on everything that system does.

Senator Everett: So that if a CATV system broadcast its own material you still have jurisdiction.

Mr. Juneau: That's right, that is what we think.

Senator Everett: What about the situation that you might have when somebody uses the common carrier and doesn't bring anything else in?

Mr. Juneau: You mean if there was completely closed circuit?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Juneau: I have no comment on that. We probably would have jurisdiction on it but I don't know.

Senator Everett: Would you seek jurisdiction?

Mr. Juneau: We wouldn't seek jurisdiction of any kind unless there was a prima facie evidence that it was the intention of Parliament to give us jurisdiction. Unless it was our interpretation that the government wanted us to have jurisdiction we wouldn't seek jurisdiction.

I think that if we think it was the intention of Parliament by reading the Act to have jurisdiction, then it is our duty to go to court and maintain that jurisdiction.

If we think it is clearly outside of our jurisdiction, then I don't think it is up to us to seek jurisdiction. It is up to Parliament to determine whether we should have it or not.

In other words, we are not looking for work.

Senator Everett: On May 13th, 1969, I understand the CRTC stated that it favours local programming on CATV to develop community identity.

Is this programming by the holders of CATV licenses rather than programming brought in by them?

Mr. Juneau: You read from our May 13th announcement I think?

Senator Everett: About your May 13th announcement, that is correct.

Mr. Juneau: And you are referring to the local programming under me?

Senator Everett: Yes.

Mr. Juneau: Well, we think that CATV should develop programmes of that kind themselves.

We are not suggesting that they could not in certain instances have a relationship with a local group who would do part of this programming.

We think that this would be quite normal but we expect that the initiative will come from the licensees.

Senator Everett: Why do you think that? Why wouldn't you use the CATV system as a common carrier?

Mr. Juneau: Well, it seems to us that there is a potential for communications in the CATV system and it is a matter of when the initiative is most likely to come. We think the initiative is necessary in the public interest.

The Act of Parliament has put the CATV system under the Broadcasting Act and made it a part of the Canadian broadcasting system, or to quote the Act, of the "single system" in Canada, that the CATV system provide a means of communications and that the initiative to make that system useful will most likely come from the people who are licensed.

Senator Everett: Would they in your judgment be able to accept advertising?

Mr. Juneau: Up to this point we have said that in normal situations there shouldn't be advertising.

Senator Everett: There should be?

Mr. Juneau: There should not be.

Senator Everett: But in order to sustain this in the future, this move towards the creation of stations out of the CATV system themselves, would you not have to buttress them with advertising revenue? Otherwise, why would they start them?

Mr. Juneau: You mean that they can make a profit without doing any programming?

Senator Everett: Well, they get the same revenue whether they programme or not.

Mr. Juneau: That's right.

Senator Everett: Why would they do this?

Mr. Juneau: They would do this because they have a franchise, and if their franchise brings in enough revenue to provide this additional service to the public . . .

Senator Everett: Your point is well made. Do you see advertising revenue being a possibility in the future?

Mr. Juneau: It is a possibility. I think the Commission said in the document that you quoted in other instances that it should have a flexible attitude on these matters and should consider the problems and the possible solutions that are brought forward by the licensees, it should consider if that kind of revenue is required and if it is the best way or the only way to provide the means to add to the service.

If on the other hand it will not constitute unfair competition to the broadcasters, then we can consider it. There has been opinion expressed to the Commission in that direction.

Frankly I don't know whether the Commission will decide on that eventually. It doesn't have a rigid attitude on the matter. It is simply a matter of waiting.

It may be that it is not the best solution and it may be that there will be some other people in the CRTC executive who think that the best solution would be to increase rates in proportion to the increased services, provided the profits are not unreasonable.

That of course brings us back to the question that Mr. Fortier was asking earlier about the CBC. Should we go back to a licensing system and reduce advertising?

It would be very difficult I think to go back to that system for broadcasting stations. You have that system now for cable and maybe before banning it we should weigh all the factors very carefully. So it is an interesting situation.

Senator Everett: I wonder if I could ask Mr. Boyle what Telesat will do to this growing cable network system and broadcasting generally?

Mr. Boyle: I don't know. I know that is not a popular answer, but I really don't know.

Mr. Juneau: Telesat?

Mr. Boyle: Telesat.

Mr. Juneau: I don't think Telesat is going to do much because Telesat is going to have a limited number of channels. It is going to distribute CBC programmes and it is going to be used by the common carrier.

I haven't seen recent plans of Telesat, but I did know what the original plans were. Once they had put a couple of channels at the disposal of the CBC and a couple of channels at the disposal of the common carrier, and maybe keep another channel for other odd requirements, there wouldn't be much capacity left in the system.

Normally there would be ground stations in three or four places in the country to receive the signals from the satellite.

Maybe a second generation satellite could be useful—a more powerful satellite three or four or five years after Telesat—with more power and more channels and a form of ground antennas that would be inexpensive enough that the CATV system could afford them.

If you had an antenna which, instead of costing a million, two million or three million dollars, costs a few hundred thousand dollars, and if the satellite were strong enough to reach those antennas then it could have a great impact on cable.

Senator Everett: Dalton Camp said yesterday that with the tremendous growth in the number of radio stations, it killed network radio.

Is that your view?

Mr. Juneau: Well, I just don't know.

Senator Everett: He said also if the same thing happened with television, a sort of a CATV approach with 24 channels, it would also kill the network.

Mr. Boyle: Well, network television killed network radio. Radio for a while staggered and then found a new kind of service.

I presume what he was referring to was radio networks. Radio networks had a stated purpose across the country. There is still of course the CBC network and there is still a form of radio networks in the United States. Mutual I think has one.

Senator Everett: If there was a proliferation of stations in television would there be any effect in your judgment on the network?

He said that you couldn't sell advertising to national advertisers if all you could give them is one 24th of the market.

Mr. Boyle: There is something wrong in the logic there. There is something wrong with his proposition.

If you proliferate television stations, you can only exist outside of the CBC if they derive the revenue; and you can't have a network without television stations. So they interlock and I don't see how, if you proliferate television stations, they would survive—they wouldn't have enough revenue to keep them going.

Mr. Juneau: It depends what we are talking about. I think that if you are thinking of 24 channels which would give the same kind of programmes that are given by mass appeal television stations, you probably couldn't sell advertising, because you would split your audience in 24 equal parts.

I think that when you talk of 24 channels you are talking of a certain number of mass appeal channels, Canadian channels, American channels and public information channels which may be directed also to a larger audience.

But then you are talking after that, more and more of specialized audiences and some cable operators are talking about a special cable for doctors, for instance.

I don't think that kind of service, if it is economically feasible would kill T.V. stations more than pocket books killed newspapers.

The Chairman: And one channel for politicians.

Mr. Juneau: Oh, that would have a mass appeal, I am sure.

The Chairman: May I say to the Committee I am very sorry, but I have no choice but to terminate this hearing.

I know there are Senators waiting with questions and I can only apologize.

The Chairman of the CRTC has an appointment at 5.30, and he has already overstayed by 15 minutes. I myself have to catch a plane. I am very embarrassed but there is very little I can do.

Perhaps however I could say, on the Committee's behalf, that we do have some idea Mr. Juneau of how busy you are, and I think for that reason we are doubly grateful for your presence and for the information you have taken the time to send and certainly for the people you have brought here.

I may say, and indeed I have said on many occasions, that since the inception of this Committee, the CRTC has been most co-operative. Whenever we have requested assistance it has always been forthcoming and we are very grateful.

I suppose one problem, sir, of being such a gracious and forthright witness is that I feel compelled to put you on your notice that the Committee may ask you to make a short return appearance, because I am sure the Senators have many other questions.

We won't make a date now, but it may be that we would like to ask you back. Thank you very much.

May I say for the benefit of the Committee that the Canadian Jewish Congress is unable to attend the hearing at 10 a.m. tomorrow due to staff difficulties and previous commitments. They will be sending a written brief before mid-April which may be made public. scheduled. That will be the only brief we will be receiving tomorrow morning.

However, the Consumers Association of Canada will be appearing tomorrow at 10 o'clock rather than at 11.15 as originally scheduled. Thank you very much. The meeting is adjourned.

The Committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Friday, March 6, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we are going to receive only the one brief rather than the two which were scheduled. I think you are familiar with the statement I read last evening in connection with the Canadian Jewish Congress. We had planned on receiving a brief from the Consumers' Association at 11.30 a.m. so perhaps the first thing I should do on your behalf and certainly on my own is to thank you for acceding to our request of meeting at 10 o'clock rather than 11.30 a.m.

Sitting on my left is Mrs. W. A. Brechin. Mrs. Brechin is Chairman of Consumer Studies. On my right is Mrs. B. D. Balls who is the Executive Secretary of the Consumers' Association of Canada.

Now, I am not sure who is going to be the first spokesman—are you Mrs. Brechin?

Mrs. W. A. Brechin (Chairman of Consumer Studies, Consumers' Association of Canada): Yes, I believe so.

The Chairman: We requested a brief from the Consumers' Association because we felt our views would be of interest to the Committee and in compliance with our request you were kind enough to send the brief which we have in front of us. I think it can be said that most of the Senators have had an opportunity of reading the brief and studying its contents. The procedure here is very simple. We would like you to make a brief introductory oral statement, perhaps taking as much as 15 minutes. It certainly is not necessary for you to take that much time, but it is at your disposal and you can comment on your brief, amplify it, explain it, subtract from it or say other things. Following that we would like to ask you some questions on your oral statement, on your written brief, and perhaps on other matters as well. We will direct our questions both to you and Mrs. Balls. Thank you Mrs. Brechin and welcome.

Mrs. Brechin: Thank you Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee. The Consumers' Association is grateful for the opportunity this morning to present consumer views on a subject which affects us so very deeply. We will summarize in probably less than 15 minutes...

The Chairman: Fine.

Mrs. Brechin: But we would also like to cite some examples which may help to clarify some of the points which were raised in our submission.

The Association stresses the need for the widest possible coverage of news and opinion. This should both reflect and extend public opinion by providing an inter-presentation of ideas and an abundance of information. To this end, we feel it important that a regulatory mechanism should exist which would prevent monopoly control of the media and which would also prevent the acquisition of these vital public services by foreign interests. In addition, we would urge that such regulations also require that the ownership of these services be a matter of public knowledge.

We have noted that some programs have already been developed which are consumer oriented. Examples of this would be the CBC's consumer show and "Help Wanted columns", such as are in the Toronto Star and Toronto Telegram.

Our concern with the undesirable aspect of advertising in the media is exemplified by detergent ads, especially the enzyme soaps, some automobile ads as well as by the use of national public hero figures such as Red Kelly which tend to develop an unwarranted confidence in a product or service.

Ours is however not a complete criticism of the advertising industry. Some advertisers have shown initiative and originality in developing ads such as Speedy Muffler King, Volkswagen, Gainsburger—ads such as these which both entertain and inform the consumer. Also some associations—for instance, the Canadian Wildlife Federation, Construction Safety and various health associations have developed excellent informative material often shown by the courtesy of the original advertiser. This is a service which could be extended to good advantage.

We were delighted to hear that rentals would not be charged on National Film Board material seen by over six million viewers in 1968. This material has and should continue to play a vital part in the development of a Canadian identity.

In noting the need for a greater amount of consumer information in the media we would note also our concern that it be correct information. In some popular open-line shows, this is not always the case. We feel a greater flow of factual information should assist in counteracting this tendency.

Since experience with publicly appointed agencies has been sometimes disappointing, we feel that our first recommendation, which would provide greater consumer access to the media, to be the most effective means of developing a greater public awareness and community involvement on the part of all Canadians. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mrs. Brechin.

Mrs. Balls, do you wish to add anything to that?

Mrs. B. D. Balls, Executive Secretary, Consumers' Association of Canada: No.

The Chairman: Well, then, I think we can proceed to the questioning and I believe Senator Sparrow has the first question.

Senator Sparrow: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I don't think it appears in the brief but is your paid membership approximately 23,000?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, between 23,000 and 24,000.

Senator Sparrow: Is it $3 a membership?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes.

Senator Sparrow: Is that the total financing money for the year?

Mrs. Brechin: No. We are supported by a Government grant also.

Senator Sparrow: What Government grant and for how much?

Mrs. Brechin: I believe Mrs. Balls could give you that information.

Mrs. Balls: It is from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs now and this year it was changed from $30,000 to $50,000.

Senator Sparrow: How long has that grant been coming from the Government?

Mrs. Balls: I believe it started in 1961 at $10,000.

Senator Sparrow: From what department at that time?

Mrs. Balls: The Department of Finance.

Senator Sparrow: And last year at $30,000 from the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Department?

Mrs. Balls: That is right—well, the year previous to this year. This year it is now $50,000 from Consumer Affairs.

Senator Sparrow: Any other sources of financing?

Mrs. Balls: We get the occasional donation of $100 or so, or sometimes just from our members $10—you know, this type of thing.

Senator Sparrow: Any industry contributions as such?

Mrs. Balls: Some donations but always given with no strings, no advertising strings at all.

Senator Sparrow: There is some?

Mrs. Balls: There aren't this year. Actually there have been in some years.

Senator Sparrow: In what amounts?

Mrs. Balls: One hundred dollars.

Senator Sparrow: Do you get any other contributions from industry such as expenses to travel to conventions, or that type of thing?

Mrs. Balls: If we are invited to speak we say "All right, but we want expenses." If they are inviting us to go, we usually try to get someone in the city where the convention is being held so we don't have hotel expenses and registration is paid by the CAC. This is one reason that we are very careful about what conventions we go to. For instance, if we don't feel they are going to be useful to the consumer, we just don't go. This is, of course, because of our limited financing.

Senator Sparrow: So your total operating budget then is roughly $125,000?

Mrs. Balls: No, it is not that high. It would be perhaps this year $110,000. Last year it was $88,000.

Senator Sparrow: Your brief is rather highly critical of the press in many of your paragraphs. Are there any particular industries in Canada that are not being fair to the consumer and this situation is not being properly reported in the press? Take for example where you have been able to document certain criticisms against an industry and you are not getting proper coverage. Could you be specific?

Mrs. Balls: I don't think I could say that but for instance Canadian Consumer is the only publication in Canada that does list the Food and Drug prosecutions. Now, one press person told me the reason that they probably didn't in the newspaper was that they felt unless it was someone prosecuted in their own town or city, that the public wouldn't be interested and I think that this is a false presumption on their part.

Senator Sparrow: In your brief...

Mrs. Balls: Excuse me, could I answer that—you were saying where coverage was not being given.

Now, we mentioned that editorial sections should include more consumer information. I think perhaps this is where greater coverage of perhaps some actions that are going on more or less against the consumer could be used. One example is the editorial in last night's Citizen. They had a column in November stating that the city had failed to respond to pleas for a check on phony massage services. Now they report that the City Council is passing a licensing by-law which will permit only certified masseurs to operate in Ottawa and that the city has put a private bill before Queen's Park. This is consumer information and very useful but it is not being done very often.

I think in localized situations such as this we should have more of that type of thing.

Senator Sparrow: What is the circulation of your magazine?

Mrs. Balls: It would be about 25,000 or so.

Senator Sparrow: It goes to each of your 23,000 members?

Mrs. Balls: Right, and we have some bulk subscriptions of 50 where it goes to one address and then is distributed.

Senator Sparrow: By a local consumer group?

Mrs. Balls: Consumer group or some industries take 50 and distribute them through their head office or through their regional offices. We also have the press list and they all get complimentary copies.

Senator Sparrow: Would you have any idea of the readership of the Consumer Magazine in Canada?

Mrs. Balls: Well, we feel it is about 100,000 because when a family gets it, it is read by all the family. Also there are a number of libraries that carry it. Many carry it in all their branches, and so on.

Senator Sparrow: No advertising appears in the Consumer Magazine so there is no other subsidy towards that as such. Do you know what the publication cost would be for that year? I understand it is about six issues a year?

Mrs. Balls: Well, if you take the direct cost of publishing only and not the cost of the time and research and the staff, it is 10 cents a copy for publishing. This is the printing cost and the paper cost.

Senator Sparrow: Well, out of that $110,000 how much goes to the magazine in total?

Mrs. Balls: Oh, it changes every year. Some years we decide on a larger testing program and we are trying to improve this. I think this year $5,000 was allotted to testing. I am sorry, I don't have the exact figures. You see, our editor is also the director of public relations so that you can't give a direct cost.

Mrs. Brechin, would you like to comment?

The Chairman: Mrs. Brechin?

Mrs. Brechin: I think, as you have pointed out, it is very difficult because with a small staff, of necessity, we must overlap and we don't keep records of the hours that are spent directly on the magazine and what goes into public relations. I think in addition to the circulation of the magazine, part of the editor's time is spent in contacting other newspapers and in developing a "news and views column" which has a very wide circulation through monthly and weekly newspapers across Canada. It doesn't contain all the information for the consumer but it is consumer information which is going out to a readership which we can't reach with the magazine itself.

As far as the cost is concerned, I think it is almost impossible to break them down.

Senator Sparrow: In paragraph 4—and you also mentioned this in your verbal remarks in reference to ownership you say:

"Although owners deny the existence of censorship or manipulation of editorial functions, we view potential dangers as so great that we recommend legislative controls to curtail monopoly and multiple ownership of the mass media."

What type of controls are you suggesting? Again, we have asked this question of other groups. How big is too big? What is a monopoly? Do you consider it a threat?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, I think a monopoly is almost complete control of all facets of the information-giving process under the control of one president or board of directors. Our members in New Brunswick in particular have been very critical of the amount of information that they get. They feel that they do not get diverse views—that it is very much one line of information.

Senator Sparrow: You say "we view potential dangers" but you are saying that that danger is already here?

Mrs. Brechin: It has been suggested to us that it is.

Senator Sparrow: You are not suggesting anything in particular?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, I don't live in New Brunswick.

Senator Sparrow: But, you have done no particular studies as far as that is concerned?

Mrs. Brechin: No. Our brief, of course, is based on consumer opinion and consumer comment. It is not a study of News Story management. It is very difficult to ascertain the management at the moment. This is one reason we feel that it would be in the public interest to know where the control lies with any information body.

Senator McElman: But your New Brunswick branch has expressed their views to you?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, our members from New Brunswick have.

The Chairman: May I just ask Mrs. Brechin a supplementary question. I was going to ask that question about New Brunswick and I was also going to ask in 4 (a), the section which Senator Sparrow was referring to, you mention one newspaper city in the first line and in the second where two or more different outlets under the same ownership. As well as New Brunswick, what other specific newspapers did you have in mind?

Mrs. Balls: There was one report from a small town in Alberta, and I don't know what town it was, but it said we don't bother with the local newspapers because we don't consider it worth paying for.

The Chairman: But in terms of a monopoly situation New Brunswick was the only one...

Mrs. Balls: That came in, yes, that is correct.

Senator Quart: Before we drift away...

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: When you mentioned the cost of getting out your Consumer magazine, you should take into consideration the tremendous amount of research done by volunteers. I am sure you benefit from it but it is terrific the number of women who will work unpaid for this service and be very devoted to it. Of course, naturally, as the women are the nation's spenders whether the gentlemen like it or not, it is to their benefit, as well as to ours, to co-operate with the Consumer Branch.

Mrs. Balls: I would like to add to that. One-fifth of our members are men and this is about the working population of our men as well. We have lawyers, economists, professional people who are willing to help us write briefs and do research for us all on their own time and very often with expenditures of their own money.

Senator Quart: Yes.

Mrs. Balls: Our total staff is eight, two of whom are senior, one research assistant and the others are clerical and secretarial.

The Chairman: Do you have any media people who belong?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. I couldn't give you an example...

The Chairman: But you have some?

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you have any advertising people?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. I believe they take a bulk subscription as a matter of fact, one of the associations.

Senator Kinnear: I was just trying to follow—are there eight paid on your staff?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. All the others are volunteers. We do have provincial and local associations which are run completely by volunteers. They have no staff.

Senator Kinnear: Well, yes. At one time I did belong and I was a volunteer.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: In paragraph 6 you say:

"We are concerned that the independence of the editorial sections of mass media be clarified vis-à-vis the advertising sections, as we note the lack of consumer information in the editorial sections of media across the country. Exponents of the consumer viewpoint should have a prominent place and should be protected by management from unfair reprisal from advertisers, government or its agencies or other interests which may be unduly sensitive to honest and forthright comment. At the same time, opportunity for rebuttal should be provided for those who feel that comment has been inaccurate or unjust."

I wonder if you could explain what you mean "unfair reprisal from advertisers"—as to who you were referring to and who it affects?

Mrs. Balls: Well, if an advertiser should say "either you fire a staff member or we won't advertise." This type of thing. Or, that they might say "You cut down on your complaints about this type of thing." Now, I have had one opinion from a press person who said "Well, even if advertisers do quit they come back when they need us in about a week because they have to have the mass coverage of their services."

Senator Sparrow: You say:

"Exponents of the consumer viewpoint should have a prominent place and should be protected by management from unfair reprisal from advertisers..."

Who are you talking about? The staff or the consumer?

Mrs. Balls: Yes, the staff.

The Chairman: These are media staff?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. But there should be more media staff for one thing. There is consumer orientation and there are other areas, of course, which don't concern us such as agriculture in which not all sides of views are being given. However, we do feel there should be more exponents of the consumer viewpoint, we feel, certainly, this happens and there may be many more cases of some form of reprisal being taken.

Now, I don't think there have been that many to date because there aren't very many consumer...

The Chairman: Have there been any? You know, this is a very serious charge. I appreciate that you are not trying to create a strawman and I am not accusing you of that, or of anything, but it is a very serious charge. Can you give us a specific instance?

Mrs. Balls: Well, all right. Not of an advertiser, but of another interest. We did a news release on credit reporting agencies. One paper was persuaded not to run it because the Credit Bureau in that town said it didn't apply to them.

The Chairman: And did it?

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: Which was the newspaper?

Mrs. Balls: The Hamilton Spectator.

Senator Sparrow: Did you follow that through?

Mrs. Balls: We are following it through at the moment. I am not sure that we have this in writing yet.

Senator Sparrow: So you really at this point have done nothing about it?

Mrs. Balls: No, it happened reasonably recently.

Senator Sparrow: In the same paragraph you say:

"At the same time, opportunity for rebuttal should be provided for those who feel that comment has been inaccurate or unjust."

What type of opportunity for rebuttal? Are you talking of letters to the editor?

Mrs. Balls: That is to the editors—yes, a rebuttal is allowed there but we don't feel that this is necessarily good enough. Not everybody reads letters to the editors, and sometimes a very important point can be lost.

Take first page coverage. Now, a good example is the shooting here in Ottawa of a teen-age boy. Now, this boy robbed a bank and it was written up in the newspapers as being just a terrible thing. It wasn't front page, but it was on the first page of the women's section—a half a page on how his mother said what a good boy he was and how wonderful he was. His teachers just did not feel the same, nor the people who knew him; they said he was a trouble-maker. This was—I believe it was reported in a small corner on a back page. This is completely irresponsible reporting. It makes a lovely sob story but it makes the police look like fools. There is a great deal of this being done to people in authority—well, I feel personally that authority is being undermined by this type of reporting.

Senator Sparrow: All right, that particular case—do you consider that a problem of your association? Do you look into areas such as that?

Mrs. Balls: In what way do you mean?

Senator Sparrow: Is that a consumer problem as such?

Mrs. Balls: No, that is not a consumer problem.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to ask a supplementary question at this point. This is a general question but I think this is the point at which—if you don't mind, senator.

Senator Sparrow: Right.

The Chairman: ...the point at which I would like to ask it. Do you regard newspaper readers and television viewers and radio listeners—I shouldn't say regard—I will put the question differently. Do you agree with me that they are consumers, consumers of media?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes.

The Chairman: I have the distinct impression reading the brief that the Association hasn't really been concerned about those people as consumers until the Senate Committee asked you to appear here. I think that you have been preoccupied—I won't say understandably, but I will say preoccupied with goods, textiles, drugs, household chemicals, and so on. This, I am sure, is valuable work and I am not questioning that even for a moment. My wife belongs to your Association so I am familiar with your publication and I can't recall seeing in it a critical appraisal of newspapers, or radio, or television stations. Is that a valid observation?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. I don't think it has been critical publicly to date, partly because we just don't have the research staff or even the volunteers to go over every area. We have tried to make contact with stations and newspapers to get them to do this type of thing.

The Chairman: Mrs. Balls, surely your appraisal of the newspapers—your appraisals of all the media outlets in, let's say Toronto because that is where I live, is surely as of much consequence to me as a consumer as is your advice as to the kind of hardyier my wife should buy. It seems to me that you haven't moved into that area, and I wonder why?

Mrs. Brechin: I wonder if I might comment on that. CAC in the last three years has been moving increasingly into the area of services. We are necessarily limited by lack of funds and lack of personnel. I think you are quite correct in saying that we should think of people who watch and read as consumers of a service. We have perhaps concentrated on parts of that service in that our criticism and our presentation has been to advertisers, to correct something that we feel is not right. It has been fragmented rather than taking the broad picture.

The Chairman: You have been product oriented?

Mrs. Brechin: Product and service, but we have not considered the large service of the media. Perhaps the very existence—the formation of this Committee has made more people realize that they are not fragments but merely parts of a whole and perhaps none of us considered this as a total picture before. As far as service is concerned, we have thought of the media as a method of presenting information about services rather than as an entity in itself.

Mrs. Balls: I might add to that that we have written to Dr. Davidson, the President of the CBC, about a year and a half ago, to ask for increased consumer information in the CBC.

The Chairman: Well, Mrs. Balls, I take that point but the point I am making is really quite a different one. I am saying that the consumers of toothpaste, and hairdryers, and cookies, and evaporated milk are also the consumer of newspapers and radio, et cetera.

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Sparrow?

Senator Sparrow: You did say that you consider readers of newspapers as consumers of newspapers?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. May I just add one thing?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Balls: One thing that is a consumer problem on the topic that we were talking about before is the grape boycott and there has been a great deal of misinformation printed and stated about that.

The Chairman: Well, let's let Senator McElman come to his question and then perhaps we can talk about the grape boycott. Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mrs. Brechin, doesn't the fact the representations you have received from New Brunswick prove that at least one branch of your organization does consider news as a consumer product and it has already shown its concern in this regard?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, you could look at it that way. It may be that they are not considering themselves as consumers but rather criticizing the amount of material that is available to them to consume.

Senator McElman: Well, isn't that one and the same thing?

The Chairman: May I just clarify for Senator McElman's benefit as a reader of your magazine—the February issue or the January issue—I forget which—contained a specific notice that the group was coming before this Committee and asked members to respond.

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Chairman, I understand that.

The Chairman: So it really wasn't a volunteered kind of concern.

Senator McElman: Well, has it been stated, Mr. Chairman, that this representation from New Brunswick came only after that or did it precede that?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, it came as a result of that.

Senator McElman: There has been no other representations prior to that?

Mrs. Brechin: We have had criticism from New Brunswick from individual members. Again, I think that Senator Davey's criticism is just, that we have not spent sufficient time but I must plead the lack of personnel and the lack of expertise.

The Chairman: Well, Mrs. Brechin, please—I hope it wasn't a criticism because I prefer to think of it as an observation. I think the media would benefit and I think all of us would benefit if you became active in this area, so it really is not a criticism.

Senator Sparrow: Let us return to your reference to "an opportunity for rebuttal". Does your Association prepare news releases as such that aren't printed in the press or which do not get coverage. Are there or have there been writers that have prepared great consumer articles that are not being printed as such? For instance, if a good writer prepared an article on consumer problems, would that not appear in the press somewhere.

Mrs. Balls: Well, on our news releases I think it depends a great deal on how newsworthy the releases are and the CAC expects that some of our news releases will be printed in almost every paper in the country and others will be picked up by one or two and won't be printed by others. I don't think you can really generalize in saying that one particular one would not be picked up at all. In some cases we do feel, though,—for instance, in sending out our advance copy of Canadian Consumer if we have a particularly good article sometimes this is not picked up. I know the press work under deadline difficulties, and sometimes they just don't see something as newsworthy that perhaps we do see as very newsworthy. I think they just aren't consumer oriented.

Senator Sparrow: In paragraph 7 you say:

"While stressing the overall deficiency of the mass media in providing consumer information and opinion, we do commend the management of those outlets who do have lively and accurate social action features which inform, direct, represent and champion consumers."

Now, the general message in your brief is that you are not getting the type of co-operation as referred to in number 7. What are some examples of media that are in fact giving you this type of...

The Chairman: Well, I think Mrs. Brechin mentioned some examples in her opening statement. You might repeat them.

Mrs. Brechin: Radio Noon, which gives consumer information, pricing and quality comparisons, and in the newspapers, for instance, help wanted ads, Action Line...

The Chairman: You don't mean the help wanted ads, you mean the "Help Wanted" columns?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, the "Help Wanted" columns. Excuse me. Action Line—this type of thing. And the Consumers' Show which is a television program dealing entirely with consumer matters...

The Chairman: Is it on the CBC?

Mrs. Brechin: It is on the CBC in the afternoon unfortunately. Perry's Probe is another which deals a great deal with this type of thing and I think we could class the series Air of Death and the subsequent water pollution and soil pollution series as being consumer oriented shows produced by the CBC.

Senator Sparrow: Do you feel that there is more opportunity now? I mean, is the opportunity increasing for more consumer coverage?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, I do. I think this is part of the whole picture of growing consumer awareness; that perhaps the general public didn't think of consumer interest as separate from anything else; that it wasn't focused as much as it has been in the last year or year and a half. I think the Social Action program that the CBC has been doing in the last month or drug use dramatizing the problem is also a consumer oriented program.

The Chairman: Well, while Senator Sparrow is looking at his brief and just before we leave that page, it seems to me that paragraph 5 on the top of page 2 is now at hand and that, surely, is an academic concern—that the control of the mass media outlet must be held by Canadian citizens. Isn't that a battle which has sort of been won?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, perhaps we are really lending our support to this.

The Chairman: Well I think that battle has been won. It is not something that needs to be done—it has been done.

Senator Smith: I would like to come back just for a moment to the subject of advertising. I would like to have some further comment on this. It seems to be a very important part of your submission. What do you think, for example, with regard to the kinds of advertising that is directed to children on television? It seems to me that it makes the families of children, the biggest pressure group in the country. Is that fair advertising, good advertising?

The Chairman: I should say—I think I will rule that question in order and I will let you answer it. I think Senator Smith knows and the rest of us are aware that the committee isn't really studying advertising. I am as interested in your answer as he is and I would like you to answer it, but we should all be mindful here that advertising, as such, is not within our terms of reference. However, we come close so please answer it.

Senator Smith: Well, there is quite a bit about advertising in the brief...

The Chairman: Yes, I agree.

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, there is because this has been one facet on which CAC has very definite opinions because we have received many opinions from our members and certainly advertising directed to children, we feel is a very poor way of advertising. We have made representations to the advertising bodies through their associations and to individual advertisers for many years on this type of advertising.

Senator Smith: It seems to me that a lot of the advertising is subject to very definite criticism on the subject of health for children. I have some objection myself as a former member of the dental profession to see these heavily sugared cereals made so attractive on television that the children would eat them all day long if you give them to them and I think it is a bad thing. I think it should be pointed out as a bad thing and I think the Canadian Consumers' Association, you know, should . . .

Mrs. Brechin: Well, I agree, senator, . . .

Senator Smith: . . . put pressure on perhaps even more than you are.

Mrs. Brechin: Perhaps even more, Senator Smith, but this is something which we have done in the past and will continue to do. I think that perhaps from the family budget standpoint, they are a very bad thing as well; and perhaps because many of the children don't eat them that is better for their teeth, but they often want their parents to buy the heavily sugared cereals just because of the car or the toy horn, or something that is inside. They put pressure on the mother.

Senator Smith: Well, I just have one other question on this general subject and then I will leave it.

Are you satisfied with the attempts that are being made by the Consumer Affairs Department to do something about false and misleading advertising? I notice there have been quite a number of prosecutions in this field or his particular area?

Mrs. Brechin: It is a start.

Senator Smith: I don't see publicity or newspaper stories on people being prosecuted in Halifax.

Mrs. Brechin: Well, this is one concern of ours. We feel that publicity about prosecutions will do more to correct the abuses than almost anything else because this is pressure that a large company understands and that it puts pressure on their pocketbook.

Senator Smith: Well, if somebody gets prosecuted in Ottawa, Mrs. Brechin, I don't see it reported in the Halifax newspaper.

Mrs. Balls: This is one of our concerns the same as the Food and Drug prosecutions.

The Chairman: May I ask a supplementary question on advertising? Senator Smith opened up the discussion and I think I could ask a question which is certainly within the terms of reference. I don't mean to be rude to Senator Smith because I think his was certainly a very valid question but at 13 (g) you urge less advertising on the CBC. Would you like to see CBC completely free of advertising?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, that would be Utopia wouldn't it?

The Chairman: Well, would it in your opinion? You are a taxpayer as well as being a consumer.

Mrs. Brechin: Well, judging from the comments which have come, advertising is an irritant. It is an irritant to many consumers.

The Chairman: Well, I am asking this, Mrs. Brechin, about the CBC. Would you like to see the CBC completely free of advertising?

Mrs. Brechin: I don't think we have enough comments. I can give you a personal view. . .

The Chairman: Well, please do.

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, I would. I would be willing to pay for it.

Senator Sparrow: Is the irritant of the advertising greater than the irritant of $30 million worth of advertising to the taxpayer?

Mrs. Balls: Well, we pay for it anyway by buying the products that are advertised.

The Chairman: Well, on that question specifically, and I am going to transgress my own role—in view of the comments you make throughout this brief on advertising, are you against advertising?

Mrs. Balls: No, I can't say we are against advertising as such. I think it does inform people. . .

The Chairman: There is a role for advertising in our system, or economy, or whatever you will. . .

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: But you would both like to see the CBC completely devoid of advertising. I am not trying to put words in your mouth. . .

Mrs. Brechin: Devoid of the type of advertising that we have now.

The Chairman: But not all advertising?

Mrs. Brechin: I think ideally advertising could be devised which is informative and which could be useful.

The Chairman: Like Volkswagen and Speedy Muffler King which were the two you mentioned?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, properly spaced. Certainly at the beginning and at the end of a program we don't get the complaints—it is the ones that come spaced through the middle that seem to irritate consumers, and we have a tendency and I think it is quite a human tendency to turn them off. Under those circumstances, I rather question their value.

The Chairman: It could be that Speedy Muffler King and Volkswagen may not have $30 million to spend on the CBC. I think the question is the one which Senator Sparrow put—are they taxpayers. If there is no advertising on the CBC, the money must come from somewhere—Well, perhaps we have discussed it enough. I was interested in your views on it. Thank you.

Senator McElman: Do you not emphasize that there should be another form of advertising, perhaps not directly but indirectly—public service advertising?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes.

Senator McElman: By corporations?

Mrs. Brechin: There is already a start on this as I am sure you are very well aware that some corporations do give prime time to advertisements prepared by non-profit organizations which are informative and valuable to the consumer.

Mrs. Balls: I may add to that that also some industry associations do this now. There has been an ad on the radio by the coffee associations telling how to make coffee. This is a consumer service, really. You know, you start with the very cold water and you perk it for only so long so that it is not bitter, and so on. This was done by an association, so no particular company receives the benefit but presumably the use of coffee goes up overall.

Senator McElman: Have you considered as an organization approaching commercial corporations to undertake more public service advertising in all of the media?

Mrs. Brechin: I am not aware that we have.

Senator McElman: Would that be constructive?

Mrs. Balls: Well, you see I think some of it is outside of our terms of reference.

Senator McElman: Ours as well, but carry on.

Mrs. Balls: Right. I think as Senator Davey has said, we have not gone into this area primarily because of our very limited resources but should we really be asking for public service announcements and things that aren't of direct concern to the consumer.

Senator McElman: Not announcements, advertising.

Mrs. Balls: Advertising, yes, that are not of direct concern to the consumer.

Senator McElman: Let me put it a little more directly. Let us say that there is a public issue that is hot in the public mind and that you, as an organization, have what you believe to be a highly constructive approach to it. Have you ever thought of going to corporations and asking them to sponsor your suggestion, or devise advertisements in this respect?

Mrs. Balls: No, but that is a very good suggestion.

Senator McElman: Well, you are looking for finances?

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: Well, Senator McElman stole my music there, but then I will go on to ask have you any objections to advertising in your magazine?

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

Senator Quart: Have you ever attempted it?

Mrs. Balls: We do have objections to it. We feel that if we were to advertise in the magazine it would mean that we were supporting certain companies and we just cannot allow this.

Senator Quart: I am sure you would get a wonderful response.

Mrs. Balls: Oh, we could get the millions of dollars, I am sure.

Senator Quart: And then you could release the Government of their $50,000 grant.

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

Mrs. Brechin: I wonder if I might point out what we feel to be a definite danger in this. Advertising in the Canadian Consumer would indicate to the general public that CAC had tested and endorsed the products advertised—as many of the seals of approvals in different magazines indicate, sometimes incorrectly . .

Senator Quart: Yes, I realize that.

Mrs. Brechin: This is really our primary reason for not doing this.

Senator Quart: As a matter of fact, if anyone refused any advertising of you, it would almost be blackmail!

Senator Sparrow: Is that true of Government advertising? Would you refuse Government advertising from the Department of Manpower or Consumer Affairs—that type of thing as well?

Mrs. Balls: Yes, because we are also a critic of Government. While we do work with them to a certain extent, we feel we have to be free to criticize when we feel criticism is necessary.

The Chairman: Well, I would like to ask you about 13 (g). You refer to the CBC as being one of the main pillars of our national life. Would you amplify on that, please, Mrs. Balls? Why do you regard the CBC as “one of the main pillars of our national life”?

Mrs. Balls: Because it is a public agency which can present information which is completely unbiased. It can do a great deal towards developing a Canadian identity because it does not have the problems of having to present only in one area the things of interest to that area—that it can be national. Now, one example that was given to us was that the people in the west like the Don Messer show because it acquainted them with the Maritimes. Not everybody can travel right across Canada and know what the regional identity is, perhaps, and that it has a function in bringing Canadians together.

The Chairman: Well, they cancelled the Don Messer show and it is now on private television.

Mrs. Balls: Yes. I think the CBC could do more in this area.

Mrs. Brechin: Would you like to expand on that?

The Chairman: Mrs. Brechin would you like to comment?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes. The other thing that I would like to say is that the CBC can be regional. The CBC stations can foster regional identity because they are not as dependent on advertising, they can be more unbiased but they can also provide this broader picture of developing a sense of unity in Canada by their national nature.

The Chairman: Senator Macdonald, do you have a question?

Senator Macdonald: Well, before we move on I would like you to take a look at page 3, item 9 (e). Would you expand on that and perhaps give some examples? You say:

“We question whether it is in the best interests of our society to have consumers, especially women, portrayed constantly as mindless, vapid, garrulous proponents of this or that brand of detergent, deodorant, coffee or cigarettes. The bad taste, dishonesty and contempt for human dignity...”

Have you any comment on that? Perhaps it is true, I don't know.

Senator Smith: You can see now why he is a bachelor!

The Chairman: Well, I think before we put this supplementary question—I think he does want you to comment on that. Is that a fair question?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. Do you want some examples?

The Chairman: Yes, I believe so.

Mrs. Balls: Well, I think that for instance—

Mrs. Brechin: Well, in detergent commercials the housewife is portrayed as completely mindless. What housewife would ever believe that a white knight is going to spring out of a box of detergent and help her with her washing?

Senator Sparrow: It would be nice, though!

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, too many of us don't have maids that live in and it might be lovely. Another one which many of our members have found distasteful is the one which shows a cleanser which turns blue and the husband comes in from the bathroom wrapped up in a towel and says "Honey, it turns blue"—

Mrs. Balls: You see, it is not only the women, it is the men too.

Another example is the razor blade which is up on a pedestal and these men going through the forest idolizing this thing once they find it. I have had complaints from men on that one.

The Chairman: Does that make your point, senator?

Senator Macdonald: Yes. I was wondering about an example for "bad taste, dishonesty and contempt for human dignity". Did you give us some comment on that?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, I think this one on the cleanser illustrates that because at the very end, the wife says in a very contemptuous fashion "Get dressed, dear." It doesn't sit well with consumers. It doesn't create a good picture of home life or of a good relationship between the sexes.

Senator Macdonald: These advertising people—from their point of view—are out to sell something, so I conclude that they must think this type of advertising sells these products?

Mrs. Balls: Right, but they only talk to other advertisers. They don't talk to consumers.

The Chairman: Yes, but marketing is a pretty sophisticated science and I think Senator Macdonald's point is that they have the sales result.

Mrs. Balls: Yes, I think they do or obviously this type of advertising would have been gone a long time ago. I think this is perhaps partly that the CAC must educate consumers more in this area. First you have blue crystals and then you have blue-green crystals and it is the sort of thing which indicates that your product is new and better and probably also higher priced by this time. Consumers must learn that this doesn't necessarily make the product better.

Senator Macdonald: Would you care to comment on this. It seems to me to be a fact that in this age and day, we are spending more and more on education and more and more people are becoming more highly educated and yet the type of advertising seems to be appealing to what I might call the lowest common denominator—the uneducated. Do you think that is a fact?

Mrs. Balls: Yes, but I think they are the most easily reached as well. I think that many well educated people, shall we say, tend to pass this type of thing off.

Senator McElman: Do you not think that a mother in a household with earnings of $2,500 a year and a grade 6 education is equally revolted by the type of advertising you speak of as the doctor's wife with a PhD. and their $50,000 income?

Mrs. Balls: I don't know. I would say that some of these detergent ads show people in a laundry talking about how white their clothes are—you know, a lot of people do sit in laundries and do this. I really couldn't answer your question.

Mrs. Brechin: I think it is perhaps easier to influence the person who has a lower educational level. They may be revolted by the same things but they do not in many cases have the inclination necessary to make comparisons. So they may be influenced by what they consider as information in an ad much more easily.

Again, detergents—I don't mean to dwell on this, but the enzyme detergents which have been promoted extensively and which sell at a higher price—the enzyme does nothing to aid a wash in an automatic washer. There is simply no time. It is a pre-soak additive. Yet, in the detergent, it is not used as a pre-soak. But the consumer, who isn't well educated, will not have the information available to them to counter this type of advertising.

Senator Kinnear: Well, it says presoak on them so you don't have to be too well educated to read that.

Mrs. Brechin: Well, it says that on the enzyme alone; it does not say that on the detergent with added enzyme. I am sorry if I didn't make myself clear.

Mrs. Balls: There is one now as well that says "Just put it in with your regular wash." This is one of the products, which has the enzyme in the detergent.

Senator Kinnear: But aside from the pollution value, if you want to think of some of the ads, and I must be terribly uneducated because I think some of them are funny. I think my sense of humour must be perverted because I really enjoy some of them.

Mrs. Balls: Oh, I do as well. However, I don't think everybody sees that side of it.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps we could turn away from our discussion on advertising.

I would just like to ask a question which flows out of 9(e) as well. You are talking about young people and you say that:

"—young people have found their own answer—'opt-out'—don't buy anything but basic necessities, and—a society which is based on lies and hypocrisy."

Why, Mrs. Balls, in preparing the brief did you use a blank in that quotation?

Mrs. Balls: We were very polite.

The Chairman: Well, when you say you were polite, are the young people not polite?

Mrs. Balls: Oh, I don't think that is true. Perhaps we should have put in "damn a society" or whatever the word might be.

The Chairman: Is "damn" the word that the young people use?

Mrs. Balls: I am not sure what the current expression is actually.

The Chairman: The point is as we move into an increasingly permissive society, I asked the question neither to embarrass you nor to confound you, but I am genuinely interested in why you would feel compelled when using the phrase in this kind of a document, to use a blank—because young people certainly don't.

Mrs. Balls: Well, I really can't answer your question. The brief was drafted not by myself and it was used—well, maybe Mrs. Brechin could comment on this.

Mrs. Brechin: The criticism has been levelled at our Association that we are middle-aged and middle income.

The Chairman: You are "middle class, middle-aged and uninformed" according to Mr. Thomas Skinner, the Toronto marketing and management consultant who I believe was the person who said that and you deny it of course.

Mrs. Brechin: No, I don't deny we are middle-aged because I can produce figures that prove it, although I must say that in the last three years more of our members are younger. I think the reason that it was not put in, was that it would have been objectionable to some of our members.

The Chairman: Surely it is not there to help create a new swinging image of the Consumers' Association. That is not what you are suggesting, is it?

Mrs. Brechin: No.

Senator Smith: On page 6 I was interested in one of the principles that you state in paragraph 20. You refer to the things that you should have the right to and one of the rights is the right of professionals to appear before the Canadian Radio-Television Commission. If I recall correctly, the chairman of the Commission yesterday said before our Committee that they were quite disappointed that the public had not heretofore participated more in the deliberations and hearings which they have held on applications for licences and licence transfers, and so on. He welcomed people to attend and he welcomed them to send briefs and if they had something to say, he said they would find a way to listen to them. Is this only directed to the lack of financing that can give you the kind of professional assistance to do what the chairman even wants?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, primarily. There are opportunities available but the average citizen does not know how to take advantage of them. He is afraid of looking foolish in front of a Government body. He doesn't have the funds necessary to develop his points and he lacks the expertise to present them properly, and I think that most citizens would be deterred. There are a few individuals who are not. I wish we had more of them. We feel that if the funds were available to help these people obtain assistance in making a presentation, they would articulate their wants better.

Senator Smith: I think there is something coming up rather soon in one of the hearings and it is very important in a lot of people's minds. I am speaking of the proposals that have been made by the CRTC with regard to a vast improvement in the Canadian content of radio and television, and it seems to me that that should be right down the alley of the Canadian Consumers' Association.

Mrs. Brechin: We were delighted to hear of the additional Canadian content because we feel that this will be, or will give a great boost to the smaller local station in making time available to consumers to talk about problems in their area and to get information out which is relevant to people in the area in which they serve. I think this will be an impetus to the type of information we feel should go out to the consumer.

Senator Smith: Apart from that doesn't your Association in principle approve of the idea of moving toward a higher Canadian content in the mass media?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes.

Senator Quart: Yes, you mention it in your brief.

Senator Smith: Yes, there is some mention of it in there. Are you not then prepared at least to send a brief in time—you know, not to be read at the hearing but to be part of their records? I think it is in the public interest to have people like you represent the public—the housewives and the consumers, and so on.

Senator Sparrow: Was this brief written before those proposed regulations came out?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes it was.

Senator Sparrow: So at the moment—the brief says we request more Canadian content . . .

Mrs. Brechin: It should be changed to say that we are delighted that there is going to be more Canadian content.

Senator Sparrow: At the moment at least you feel that that new proposed regulation would be satisfactory?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes.

Senator McElman: It is a fact, I believe, that all renewals of broadcast licences require public hearings and notice of this appears in the media. Has your Association at any point where it has felt that a station perhaps was not performing at the level that it should—has your Association ever made representations at those hearings with respect to renewal or non-renewal of such licences?

Mrs. Brechin: No.

Mrs. Balls: We did in Vancouver—there was one hearing to which some of our consumer representatives went, and I might say they came away completely befuddled because there were a bunch of business like people and the air was absolutely blue with smoke and they didn't understand too much of what was going on, and I think this is what the consumer is up against at some of these hearings. This is only an example of the direct interest we have expressed so far. We do watch the hearings. But submission of briefs is one of the things that we haven't done.

Senator Macdonald: Are you in favour of more Canadian content simply because it gives more opportunity for local stations to put on programs of consumer interest?

Mrs. Brechin: Oh no. I think this is only one area in which it will improve programming. There are many other things that theoretically will be given a better chance by more Canadian content.

Senator Macdonald: I may say first of all that I have never been too impressed with this idea of more Canadian content. I always figured that if Canadian content was any good it should be able to compete with any other content.

Mrs. Balls: Oh, we would agree with that, but we do feel there is probably a great deal of information in Canada which is not being given to the public and if there were increased Canadian content we would get more of this type of information.

Senator Quart: On page 4, paragraph 12, you say:

"We are concerned that a consequence of recent budget cuts has been a reduction of the creative staff of the National Film Board."

Has the National Film Board ever made a film of consumer problems?

Mrs. Balls: They made one back in 1949, I think, when the Association was first formed, or in the forming stage but that was the only one that has been made.

Senator Quart: Was that used very much across Canada?

Mrs. Balls: I think at that time it was and it was shown once recently but it was so completely wrong as to the image of the Association now, that it really provided a great deal of misinformation.

Senator Quart: Did you ever ask them to update that one or make a new one for you?

Mrs. Balls: We did have some contact with them about two years ago and there was some cost factor involved, and I can't give you the direct details. It was our editor and director of public relations who made the contact.

Senator Quart: Because I see that you are objecting to the cuts?

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

Senator Quart: Also the rentals, I suppose, on the films now?

Mrs. Balls: Yes, but that has been eliminated.

The Chairman: In section 15 of your brief you talk about your magazine and you say "the low income groups take little interest in reading." I really have two questions.

Number one, does that "little interest in reading" in your opinion, apply to the reading of daily newspapers as well as your magazine?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. I think they may look at the headlines, but not necessarily go into the details.

The Chairman: Well, when you say look at the headlines—do they buy daily newspapers?

Mrs. Balls: Not necessarily, no.

The Chairman: Well, when you say not necessarily...

Mrs. Balls: Well, a great many can't afford it and some are not interested. A lot have TV, of course.

The Chairman: Well, that is my second question. You say:

"—printed information must be supplemented by regular consumer information programmes in radio and television media."

Do you think lower income groups watch television and listen to the radio to the exclusion of reading daily newspapers?

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you Mrs. Brechin?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, I think I agree with that. For one thing, often this is their major expenditure. They often do not have the loose cash to buy daily newspapers, but they will have a television set.

The Chairman: You talk about lower income groups, would you apply this same observation to more fully educated people, because there is not always the correlation between the two as I am sure you know

Mrs. Balls: By poorly educated you mean formally educated?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: Could you make any regional comment as for example between urban audiences and rural audiences? Do urban audiences tend to read more?

Mrs. Balls: I couldn't say.

The Chairman: You couldn't break it down regionally

Mrs. Balls: No.

Senator Smith: Just on that point, may I suggest that—again, I am depending on my memory—there were two surveys of readers of farm magazines which indicated that 70 per cent of their readers do not read a daily newspaper. One of the surveys was in the Province of Quebec and the other one was out in the Prairies.

The Chairman: Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Excuse me, senator. In some areas only.

The Chairman: That was in some parts of the country, yes.

Senator Smith: Well, the area was rural Quebec and out on the Prairies. The Maritime provinces had the highest readership of any.

Mrs. Balls: I think often a daily newspaper is not available—well, it is available by mail but not by delivery that very day.

The Chairman: Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: You said earlier that unfortunately that your programs were carried more in the afternoon. Don't you think it is a wonderful, almost captive audience in the afternoon of various groups?

Mrs. Brechin: Oh, yes.

Senator Quart: Shut-ins, and so on and so forth? Personally, I love the afternoon programs.

Mrs. Brechin: Well, I think the afternoon programming is excellent and I agree with you that you have a very fine selection of programs in the afternoon.

The Chairman: When do you find time to watch them, Senator

Senator Quart: Not since I have been on Mass Media!

Mrs. Brechin: My reason for using the word "unfortunately" is not that it is in the afternoon, but that it is limited to the afternoon, and an increasing number of consumers are not able to view the afternoon programming. Men and working wives just don't have the opportunity to see afternoon programs and we would like to see it extended into the evening hours.

Senator Quart: I agree, but I do think that the women who look at the afternoon programs are—I am not saying the working wives, but the housewives, or the domestic engineers as I prefer to call them, whereas probably in the evening our husbands would probably prefer a hockey game or something like that.

The Chairman: Do you think he comes home and his wife tells him everything she watched on television?

Senator Quart: No she doesn't because probably he would make her turn off the television. However, we do hear some of these programs by very ardent feminists against some of the men and I don't agree with them at all. I think team work is everything in this world, even with bachelors around! And I did notice that you Senator Macdonald, dodged one word when you read that paragraph—I don't know whether you were shy or not, but you did—I forget just how you put it—let's look for it, but sexual implications or something like that! I know that some of these ads—really some of these advertisements really do take when there is a little bit of that word which we used not to have used but now which is used very freely "sex" thrown in.

The Chairman: Well, I think Senator Macdonald, like Mrs. Balls, was being polite.

Senator Quart: Oh, I see. Well, I am rather brazen, as you know, and I don't mind at my age!

Mrs. Balls: I would like to add something on this scheduling of programs. Many educational programs are held late at night and we feel that they should perhaps be on either in the afternoons or early in the evening.

Senator McElman: Mrs. Brechin, what activity do you have in the French language areas? Do you have a branch? Is there a separate organization? Or just what is the situation?

Mrs. Brechin: No, it is one association but in the Province of Quebec we have a provincial association as we have in other provinces of Canada. Our magazine is published in both French and English and we have a very active association in the Province of Quebec. We also have French-speaking members in other provinces in Canada. Our magazine is bilingual.

Senator McElman: You have spoken in your brief about concentration of ownership and multi-media ownership, et cetera. Have you had any representation from that branch with respect to such ownership in the Province of Quebec?

Mrs. Brechin: No, I am not aware of that.

Mrs. Balls: No.

Senator Quart: The other morning when I was in Montreal—it was on Monday morning I believe—you had a whole hour and a half over one of the stations in Montreal and one of the members of your Association, a very active one, was answering all sorts of questions about consumers.

The Chairman: Is this French or English, Senator Quart?

Senator Quart: She was French but it was on the English network.

Mrs. Balls: This has been a development in the last four months that this provincial association has become very active and they have been going out and soliciting this type of program.

Senator Quart: Yes, it was very, very good.

The Chairman: Mrs. Balls, I don't want to detain you long and I certainly do not want to delay the Senators, but I would just like to ask you one or two questions about your rather significant, I think, observations on a press council. You say in paragraph 22 that a press council "within the necessary (apparently) political framework." And then in section 23 you say that the council "should be appointed by the Government." We have received many briefs from publishers and others opposed to the idea of a press council, but in fairness we have received many briefs from publishers and others supporting the idea of a press council. But, I think without exception the supporters of the idea have all felt that the press council should steer away rather directly from any form of Government involvement.

This is the first brief we have received in which someone proposes a press council in which there would be some degree of Government involvement. I would like you to comment on why you feel the Government should appoint it—obviously it is your opinion. So in the light of what I have told you that most people don't take that position, would you care to comment on this?

Mrs. Balls: I think Mrs. Brechin would comment on that.

Mrs. Brechin: It is obviously our members' feeling that this is probably the only fair way in which it could be set up. I should point out that this would be our secondary choice—it is an alternative to what we see as the better method. I can't say why members felt that it should be Government appointed except that perhaps they are influenced by the feelings that the Government is a more impartial body.

The Chairman: I am grateful to Mr. Spears. He sent me a note which says—The Canadian Church press brief also favoured Government involvement in a press council. I had forgotten that. Thank you Mr. Spears.

You feel that a press council to be meaningful would need Government involvement, is that correct?

Mrs. Brechin: In the original setting up.

The Chairman: And this was a feeling of the members?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes. I wouldn't like to voice an opinion on that.

The Chairman: Well, I said I had two questions on the press council. Let us for a moment take the position of the briefs unlike ours and unlike the Church Press brief—the opponents of the press council who feel that a press council should not have any form of Government involvement. In that kind of a setting, why would not, long before this, the Consumers' Association have taken the initiative in either establishing or promoting the establishment of a press council in which the Government wouldn't be involved?

Mrs. Brechin: I think, Senator Davey, I must point out again that this is not what we consider the best way.

The Chairman: Well, what is the best way?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, in paragraph 18 we say the right of access to the media and programs and financing consumer groups in helping them to state their needs—self-policing rather than a press council.

The Chairman: So you are not in favour of a press council?

Mrs. Brechin: Well, we would prefer to see the other.

The Chairman: You would prefer to see the media improved...

Mrs. Brechin: By means of regulations.

The Chairman: Of Government regulations?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes.

Mrs. Balls: Not just regulations about by means of its own improvement through allowing or soliciting consumer access.

The Chairman: In other words by self improvement rather than Government imposed improvements.

Mrs. Balls: Yes, just on those two areas.

The Chairman: Those two areas being the ownership and concentration and news of consumer activities?

Mrs. Balls: Yes. I believe it is explained in 17 where it says "only in relation to foreign control and multiple ownership."

Senator McElman: Do you have in mind here, Mrs. Brechin, the trend that seems to be developing in the United States? I see you have made one reference to a ruling there where the government as such is developing the principle of right of access for equal time in certain situations.

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, that is so.

Senator McElman: That was the precedent you had in mind?

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, that and the setting up of consumer advocates and the provision of funds to help consumer groups make their wishes known and do research to back it up.

Senator Kinnear: On page 3 in the introduction of your brief here, some of the Association's future objectives are—I think they are very worth while objectives and I would like to say quite a bit about some of them. I am wondering about this one. What about the lower sugar content in canned foods?

Mr. Spears: Excuse me, Mr. Chairman. Senator Kinnear is reading from the briefing book, not from the brief.

The Chairman: Oh, I see. Senator Kinnear that document was prepared by our research staff but I am sure Mrs. Brechin will be able to answer your question.

Senator Kinnear: Lower sugar content in canned fruits.

Mrs. Brechin: Our reason for asking for this?

Senator Kinnear: Yes.

Mrs. Brechin: Well, this is because of a survey that we have conducted and requests made by member and non-member consumers. There have been methods developed for the provision of good quality canned fruit with a lower sugar content and we made representations to the industry to have this type of thing done on a test basis. It hasn't been done as yet because at the moment the commission is sort of working on a minimum standard of sugar. At the moment we have specified sugar syrups and...

Senator Kinnear: The reason I say this is that I think the canned fruit is better now than it has ever been.

Mrs. Brechin: Yes, but many consumers are very worried about the 40 per cent or 50 per cent sugar content, and it is possible to produce a very good product within the case of pears, 25 per cent and peaches 35 per cent sugar syrup.

Senator Kinnear: Well, that is fine. As long as you have a good product which is edible—some of the fruit used to be so bad that we didn't want to buy it but now it is lovely and everyone is using it.

Mrs. Brechin: Well, I think the increased control—increased quality control in our packing plants has had a great deal to do with it other than the sugar syrup. We know more and more plants have used it.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps the discussion of sugar content in canned fruits may not be within our terms of reference. I am going to terminate the meeting unless there are other questions. I believe Senator McElman has one.

Senator McElman: Yes, Mr. Chairman. On page 4, paragraph 14 you say:

"It is the only non-government publication in Canada which prints the government prosecutions under the Food and Drugs Act and false advertising section of the Combines Investigation Act."

Surely you don't mean that it is the only—these are published in the daily media are they not?

Mrs. Balls: Not in full. We did have originally "in full" in there but we no longer print the prosecution for drug users because we were told that this gives people the names and addresses where they can go and get drugs. So now we just say that there were so many prosecutions for drug abuse and the terms range from six months in jail to two years, or whatever it is, rather than printing the names and addresses; but as far as we know there is no other publication that prints the listing of company prosecutions.

Now, the false advertising ones—if the court cases are held in a city—yes, that is written up but the year-end report of the Combines Director is not necessarily printed in full. It tends to be only the companies that are prosecuted in that city. Again, I think, because the media feels that that is all that is of interest to the readers. We think it would be of interest to readers right across Canada.

Senator McElman: Yes. I get your meaning now. You mean the only nationally distributed magazine?

Mrs. Balls: Yes.

The Chairman: Well Mrs. Balls, Mrs. Brechin, I think most thoughtful Canadians commend your organization's activities and think the Committee might agree that it would be to everyone's benefit—that is the media and the media consumers—if you continue to display a greater interest in those areas as well. We would like to think that w have stimulated such interest and certainly you have returned the favour because this has been a very useful morning. Therefore, on behalf of the committee I want to thank you both very much.

Senators, the committee is adjourned until 10 o'clock on Tuesday morning when we meet the Underground press.

Thank you very much.

The Committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA EVIDENCE

Ottawa, March 10, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10.00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, today we turn to a study of the "Underground Press" which, in Canada, is a relatively new phenomenon, but notwithstanding its newness, it is very much part of the overall Canadian media spectrum, and I think a study of the type we have undertaken really couldn't be meaningful without some study in reference to the role and function and purpose of the "Underground Press".

Perhaps before I proceed any further, I should introduce our guests, in no particular order.

At this end of the table is Mr. Dan McLeod who is the editor of the Georgia Straight from Vancouver.

Sitting between Mr. McLeod and myself is Mr. John Laxton from Vancouver who is the lawyer or legal representative of the Georgia Straight.

Sitting next to Mr. McLeod is Mr. Hans Wetzel who is representing the Harbinger from Toronto.

Mr. Paul Stevens is the editor of Sweeney, in Oakville, Ontario.

Sitting next to Mr. Stevens is Mr. Chris Johnson editor of The Sudbury Free Press also known as Cabal 6, and sitting next to Senator Hays is Mr. Len Anderson editor of Omphalos of Winnipeg, Manitoba.

I have two self-explanatory telegrams which I should read. One is from the editor of Logos of Montreal in which he says, and I quote:

"I am at home today my country will have to wait."

Laughter

The other is from Mr. J. F. O'Brien, of the Montreal Free Press. He says:

"Unfortunately I do not have the money for transportation to and food and accommodation and expenses in Ottawa. I therefore regret I am unable to attend the Special Senate Committee on Mass Media on Tuesday March 10, 1970."

So, there is no one here from Logos and no one from the Montreal Free Press.

It is my understanding that the only other person who will be here is Mr. Stephen Harris, who is the editor of the Octopus. Mr. Harris is here? Why don't you come up here, Mr. Harris, please. I am sorry. I didn't see you.

Mr. Harris is the editor of the Octopus here in Ottawa. There are two of you? You are Mr. Cain? How do you spell your name, Mr. Cain?

Mr. Cain: C-A-I-N.

The Chairman: Today has been structured as a round table discussion. I think a useful way of beginning would be to ask the various representatives of underground publications to make some kind of opening statement, and in a moment or two, I am going to put a question to all of them and let each one in turn answer. The senators will be familiar with the quotation I am going to read, but the representatives of the underground press and other people might be interested in this quotation, which appears as a prelude to the research paper on the Underground Press which the Senate Committee has had prepared.

Those of us who have young children are quite familiar with Kenneth Graham's book, "The Wind in the Willows". In that book, you will find the following couple of paragraphs which, as I say, form the prelude of our paper on the "Underground Press", and I am quoting the author. Mr. Graham wrote this, I believe in the first part of this century.

"Presently they all sat down to luncheon together. The mole found himself placed next to Mr. Badger, and as the other two were still deep in river-gossip from which nothing could divert them, he took the opportunity to tell Badger how comfortable and homelike it all felt to him. 'Once well underground', he said, 'you know exactly where you are. Nothing can happen to you, and nothing can get at you. You're entirely your own master, and you don't have to consult anybody or mind what they say. Things go on the same overhead, and you let 'em, and don't bother about 'em. When you want to, up you go, and there the things are, waiting for you.'

The Badger simply beamed at him. 'That's exactly what I say', he replied. There's no security, or peace and tranquility, except underground. And then, if your ideas get larger and you want to expand—why a dig and a scrape and there you are! If you feel your house is too big, you stop up a hole or two, and there you are again!—No builders, no tradesmen, no remarks passed on you by fellows looking over your wall, and, above all, no weather. Look at Rat, now. A couple of feet of flood water, and he's got to move into hired lodgings; uncomfortable, inconveniently situated, and horribly expensive... No, up and out of doors is good enough to roam about and get one's living in; but underground to come back to at least—that's my idea of home."

And that's the end of the quotation. Now, the question I might put to you as representatives of the underground press is—Could you discuss for us—and I am afraid, gentlemen, I am going to have to ask you to do this in about three minutes because I want to get some kind of discussion started here. In about three minutes, could you tell us—could you describe for us really what the underground press is and then perhaps has a supplementary question, and more importantly because I think we have some understanding of the underground press, could you tell us why you publish your particular publication. As I say, I will go around and ask each of our guests to discuss this question, and then we will turn to a round-table discussion.

Perhaps, Mr. McLeod, I could start with you. I am aware that you have a brief of which the Senators will soon have copies. Is that correct?

Mr. Dan McLeod, Editor, The Georgia Straight, Vancouver, British Columbia: Yes, we were told that it would be here soon after ten.

The Chairman: Would you like to proceed with somebody else?

Mr. McLeod: Oh, we have copies that we can refer to or read.

The Chairman: Fine, Mr. McLeod. Before we begin, I might say your brief, if you read it in its entirety, would probably take about half an hour; so, could you summarize it for us?

Mr. McLeod: Well, I could—Most of the first page is in answer to this question.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. McLeod: And I could just quote from that.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. McLeod: The term "underground", I think, is not really that applicable to what we are doing because we are not really underground.

There are underground papers in more oppressed areas of the world and countries in Europe where the papers are truly underground. They are outlawed. If they appear on the street, they are seized. We have been in that position once, but we feel that the term "free press" more adequately describes what we are doing, and I have prepared a statement of why we felt that an underground or free press would be desirable and beneficial, and I will read from that:

"We felt a free press was desirable because young people are not allowed freedom of expression—and thus creative and/or political action—the way mass media are now set up. Young people, or more accurately free thinking people for the young in mind and feeling can be any age—are neither wanted nor needed by the mass media or society, and we have set about to change this situation by producing an alternative newspaper, and through this newspaper, alternative life styles which sometimes necessarily operate outside the limitations set down by the ruling class."

Now, the thing about young people, being wanted or needed, I think, is important. Jerry Rubin goes into this in depth, quite a lot of depth, but the society, the way it is set up now—is economically self-sufficient. It doesn't need young people to perpetuate it.

Free people do not take their freedom lightly in this society. Anyone who is not practising freedom in his day-to-day life is not free. Freedom does not exist in the abstract. You do not have freedom unless you use it.

A free press was necessary when it began to publish because a truly free culture and life style was being born in many, many people at the same time. This free culture and life style had to grow. It either had to express itself or die.

The Georgia Straight and the so-called underground press are visible examples of the expression of the lively, growing and free people.

We need a free press because we need to live and communicate freely.

And then in answer to the question: Is the free press beneficial?, the free press is ultimately beneficial to the city. Its goal is not to destroy the city, but to change it for the better; however, it can never force its goal on the people of the city, because the people decide for themselves whether to change the society.

Conversely, the people must not force limitations of free expression and the press, for to do so, suppress the need for change.

The Chairman: Thank you that is a good statement.

I think, Mr. Laxton, I won't call on you, because I want you to get into the discussion later on but I think at this point perhaps I should call Mr. Hans Wetzel from the Harbinger.

Mr. Hans Wetzel, Editor, Harbinger, Toronto, Ontario: I can't—don't want to say anything yet.

The Chairman: You don't want to say anything yet? Okay, that's fine. Will you say something later on?

Mr. Wetzel: Sure.

The Chairman: Okay, fine.

Mr. Johnson, The Sudbury Free Press.

Mr. Chris Johnson, Editor, The Sudbury Free Press, Sudbury, Ontario: I think I should perhaps start giving a brief outline of how the paper is formed.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Johnson: And how I came to be associated with it. It started one day, I was walking downtown in February and a friend came up to me and said he was thinking of starting an underground paper and would I like to do the art work. I had been studying art for the three years previously. This was last March or—end of March, beginning of April, and we got half a dozen people together to work on the paper, and by the time May rolled around, we hadn't produced anything, and it ended up with two people doing most of the work; so, we just said, "Well, to hell with this. Let's get something out anyway."

We just threw together a publication which was largely poetry and art work, just whatever I could scrape together at that time, and to a certain extent that's what the paper has been since—scraping together whatever I can get from the people of Sudbury, which isn't very much, and what I can produce myself.

Since the first two issues, I have been producing it entirely on my own; so, the paper is very much a personal expression for me. It's rather like another art form, but unlike some art forms, the newspaper is one which goes out to the masses. It is produced in large quantity, and therefore it has to serve more than any other art form. It has to serve the people.

I am attempting to do this. I am attempting to provide a forum for ideas for the people of Sudbury. I am attempting to provide something which will be visually interesting, which will make good reading, which I hope can do something towards improving the City of Sudbury.

I have been getting involved with City Council and hoping that through that, things can be changed and the paper is to help accomplish this.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Next is Mr. Paul Stevens who is the editor of Sweeney from Oakville, Ontario. Mr. Stevens?

Mr. Paul Stevens, Editor, Sweeney, Oakville, Ontario: What we are trying to do with Sweeney is...

The Chairman: Can everybody hear these people?

From the floor: No.

The Chairman: Could you speak up just a little, please?

Mr. Stevens: What we are trying to do with Sweeney is more or less promote a different life style. Then if we can give the people a different viewpoint throughout the paper and a different way of looking at things, then we more or less feel that we have done something.

In our first issue, the editor said we were trying to promote social change, and this is more or less what we have been trying to do. It's turned into more than just a paper. It's turned into more of a community thing.

People who were on our staff are now involved with the community workshops in town, such as drug crisis centres, drop-in centres. It's not just a newspaper any more. It's more or less a community of people just working for social change in Oakville.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Len Anderson from Winnipeg, editor of Omphalos, Mr. Anderson?

Mr. Len Anderson, Omphalos, Winnipeg, Manitoba: It's pronounced "Omphalos", Senator Davey.

The Chairman: We had a great discussion about this earlier, and I was informed that my pronunciation was as correct as yours, but I, of course, defer—(Laughter).

Mr. Anderson: I find myself in substantial agreement with everything that has been said. Our experience at Omphalos has been the experience of all these other underground papers. I didn't submit a brief because every time I started to write something down, it sounded awfully pretentious; so, it all boils down to one thing, I suppose, and that is that myself and Kelly Clark and Professor Adamson who started Omphalos, are agreed upon one thing, and is that the direction of society is precisely the wrong direction. That is, the direction that society is taking towards progress and prosperity and the resultant and massive ecological damage to the environment and a diminishing of the values of life.

The immediate reason we started Omphalos is because the Provincial Government of Manitoba was going to flood South Indian Lake, and both newspapers and the media in Winnipeg were not particularly critical of what seemed obviously a disastrous undertaking; so, Professor Adamson and myself and Kelly Clark decided to put out a paper in which we would solicit views from engineers, biologists, zoologists and so on, people who are concerned. And it began, in other words, as a kind of ad hoc paper criticising one thing, but once we got started, it was difficult to stop; so, we decided to try for a community paper, and we solicited articles from the community at large.

Nobody is paid at Omphalos, and there's only two or three people working full time and consequently we just went on from issue to issue. We have brought out fourteen issues now. We seem to have turned the corner. We are no longer in debt. In any event, the one thing that holds us all together is an agreement that progress and prosperity, the shibboleths of the politicians are, in fact, extraordinarily damaging notions, and we want to try to get people to think about what is really underlying these ideas of progress and prosperity. Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you, and then next we have Mr. Stephen Harris who is the editor of the Octopus which is an Ottawa newspaper. Mr. Harris?

Mr. Stephen Harris (Co-Editor, Octopus, Ottawa): Will you go over the...

The Chairman: Yes, I am sorry.

Mr. Harris: What are we doing?

The Chairman: Well, really the question is just to get the discussion started—Why do you publish your paper?

Mr. Harris: Okay, right for basically the same reasons again. The newspaper coverage for the City of Ottawa is the two daily papers and a French daily, all three of which are so far inferior to even other daily newspapers that there has to be something done.

From the floor: I am sorry. We can't hear.

The Chairman: I am sorry, Mr. Harris. They tell me they can't hear you.

Mr. Harris: Just basically that the daily papers are insufficient. That's simple. And then there is the whole anti-progress, anti-capitalism, essentially, philosophy which has to be expressed and which nobody hears and we have to do that, and in order to basically let people know—people who otherwise are oblivious to various facts of life—we have to provide those facts. Basically people who have done the paper and all these papers have gone through a certain number of changes themselves to arrive the way they are, and I would just like to make that information available to as many people as we can; so we don't get just one person thinking he is the only person in the world that knows.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Wetzel, would you like to say something now? Mr. Wetzel is from the Harbinger in Toronto.

Mr. Hans Wetzel, Editor, 'Harbinger', Toronto, Ontario: I think my feelings as to why I would be involved with the starting of any paper or the starting of 'Harbinger'...

The Chairman: Can you hear him?

From the floor: No.

From the floor: Not too well.

The Chairman: I apologize to the people who are here. We usually meet upstairs where we have a sound system. Here we don't. I apologize to everybody, but everyone will have to speak more loudly.

Mr. Wetzel: The other thing is: we did have a brief that we printed in our paper.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Wetzel: If you can just pass them around.

The Chairman: Can I have one too, please? Now, why don't you go ahead.

Mr. Wetzel: Yes, well, 'Harbinger' probably will continue to exist as long as the doors are locked, as long as we have banks, as long as we inject our beef with stillbestrol, as long as we continue to sell people rice that has no food value because they have milled off the ayer of the rice that contains the food value. As long as people are locked up in jails, 'Harbinger' will exist. It is that simple.

The Chairman: Can you hear that?

From the floor: No.

The Chairman: I am sorry, I think it's worth repeating, if you don't mind. Mr. Laxton has suggested that we might ask everybody to stand up, but I don't want to do that. Those at the back want you to stand up, but I don't.

Mr. Wetzel: Who are they?

The Chairman: Well, they are press people. It is quite easy to distinguish the Senators from the representatives of the press.

Mr. Wetzel: They are older.

The Chairman: Do we need that repeated not? Yes, would you mind, please, Mr. Wetzel? I am sorry.

Mr. Wetzel: Harbinger exists because there are doors that are locked; because we have banks; because we have people locked up in jails; because we sell beef and other meat that is injected with stillbestrol which is a hormone that makes cattle grow faster, but it really screws around with the meat; and as long as people continue selling white rice which has no food value because they have milled it...they have milled out the particle of the rice that has the food value. People are getting screwed and we are just trying to change that. That's all.

The Chairman: Okay. I think I will perhaps say now we will begin our discussion. I am very anxious that what we have here this morning is a discussion so I put it first of all to the Senators that you need not wait for formal recognition from the Chair to chime in either with a comment or more particularly with a question; and I want to say the same thing to the people who are here from the various newspapers, and I certainly include you, Mr. Laxton. You needn't feel that you have to wait to be recognized by me. We would be delighted if you comment on anything that the Senators say, but also I think you should feel free to comment if for example Mr. Harris says something and you, Mr. McLeod, disagree, why don't you say so, and we will have hopefully some kind of a discussion.

We will now turn to that discussion, and I think perhaps Mr. Harris wants to add something, so let's start with him.

Mr. Harris: Well, it's just that in my explanation of why we were doing the paper, I emphasized the more negative aspects of what we were doing. There is also the creative aspect of the newspaper. We use the paper as our creative outlet, and I think the other people do too, and I think that is probably a greater reason for doing our papers than merely filling some kind of void. It is more of a creative thing.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps I could just say to Mr. Anderson... you began your statement by saying, as I understood you, that the reason for your paper is because society is moving precisely in the wrong direction. Do you believe that a paper like yours is the most effective way to correct these ills? Are there not more effective ways?

Mr. Anderson: If there are any more effective ways, I don't know about them, Senator Davey. This is so probably for a lot of reasons. One of the reasons is because of the phenomenon of the underground press itself in the United States, which is truly an amazing thing when one considers around 1955 that there were no underground papers in the United States, and within three years, there were about 400.

It has all the earmarks of something far more important, I would guess, than just university students or hippies simply wanting to put out papers. In other words, I think that the success of the underground papers is indicative of the fact that society at large is enormously unhappy and probably finds it very difficult to articulate its unhappiness; in other words, I see the underground press as not an excogitated thing, but a kind of almost naturally historical phenomenon.

I have no doubt in my own mind, for example, that the underground press will grow and flourish until finally it will make itself felt at every level of society very shortly.

Mr. Johnson: If I could comment on the question "Is the newspaper an effective way of doing it?"

The Chairman: Go ahead Mr. Johnson.

Mr. Johnson: I think that probably there are other ways of accomplishing the change, but I think that the newspaper can be a necessary adjunct to it; for example, what I am trying to do now is work with the City Council in Sudbury.

The Chairman: How?

Mr. Johnson: Well, I attend Council meetings. I talk with the aldermen and try to get my ideas across, and to a certain extent, they are coming up in Council. I feel that the City Council, for example, is the least structured of all levels of government and should be given much more autonomy than it is, and I feel that this should be where action should begin.

Now, the newspaper, I feel, is necessary to get what has been happening at the council level—this is just one aspect of it—to the public because the average newspaper carries very little.

The Chairman: How does "overground" media in Sudbury respond to your efforts?

Mr. Johnson: They ignore it.

The Chairman: Totally?

Mr. Johnson: In print, they ignore us. Shortly after I came out, I had a half hour interview on the local TV station. One of the local radio stations has carried interviews with me. I have been received quite well by them.

The Chairman: This is perhaps an unfair question, you may not be able to answer this, but in your opinion would you say that the Sudbury Star is about like the average Canadian newspaper? Is it better or worse or could you comment?

Mr. Johnson: I would say below average.

The Chairman: You say below average—Why?

Mr. Johnson: Well, from what I have seen of papers, Toronto papers, B.C. papers, papers across the country, it is far below the standard in editorial writing and reporting. I think there are very few instances of events that I have known or in which I have been involved in Sudbury which have been well covered by the paper. In just about every case, there has been some mistake in reporting; invariably, I would say.

The Chairman: The point I wanted to make really was that you particularly indicated that the paper is zeroing in on municipal affairs; is this because of a particular deficiency in the Star; is it particularly in local coverage that they are bad?

Mr. Johnson: No, it is just one of the things. I look at it as an art form, but also as a method of getting into the political aspect, and that's one aspect where I think the Star does fall down and something can be done.

The Chairman: I wonder if I could go back to Mr. Anderson for something he said and perhaps put this question to you, and also to get a comment from Mr. McLeod on it.

I am going to read a quotation from the story which was written on the underground press in a recent issue of 'Canadian Dimension'. It is an article by Richard Dahrin on the "Underground Press in Canada."

Before reading the quotation, let me make my own position pretty clear. I am a nationalist. I don't make any bones about that. Now Dahrin is talking about the Georgia Straight, but I am going to put the question to both of you. He says:

"Although relatively few of its readers"—meaning 'Georgia Straight'—

"are Americans-in-exile, and Americans contribute hardly at all to its existence the 'Straight' is still plugged into the U.S. westcoast scene, and, just like the rest of us, it is much less familiar with the comparatively weak, uncreative underground culture in the rest of Canada. Jerry Rubin and Allen Ginsberg and Herbert Marcuse, when they came to Vancouver were treated, in the 'Straight' like visiting nuncios. Underground is American!"

You made the point as to the vitality of the underground press in the United States—and I think you indicated—perhaps you didn't—that the underground press in Canada is a phenomenon which has been imported from the United States; so, what is the position of the underground press in Canada, vis-a-vis nationalism, and vis-a-vis this whole American thing? Well, perhaps we will go to you first Mr. Anderson and then to Mr. McLeod.

Mr. Anderson: Well, nationalism is—Let me put it this way; I am not a nationalist, and I don't apologise for it. I think that nationalism is one of those profound notions that's undergone a fantastic change in the last little while, just as so many other notions have undergone fantastic change.

What I mean to say is that perhaps a few years ago, it was acceptable to talk about nations and countries, but it's no longer acceptable to me at any rate, and I think probably it is true of most of the people involved in the underground press.

There is only one political reality and that is the American empire, and we are part of it.

The Chairman: Are you happy about that?

Mr. Anderson: Oh, on the contrary. I am very dissatisfied with it, but the point is that to be a Canadian nationalist—80 per cent of our economy is owned by American corporations; for example, when even Prime Minister Trudeau admits that about 15 per cent—I think that's the figure he quoted; He said our foreign policy was probably in the area of 10 per cent to 15 per cent where we can do something; in other words, we at Omphalos—we simply don't care about discussing national products.

The Chairman: You just throw up your hands?

Mr. Anderson: No, we think, to quote Che Guevara, "If you are going to go for the head, you have to go for the belly of the beast", and the truth of the matter is we are not of the American empire and we are anti-imperialist.

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod?

Mr. McLeod: I feel much closer to California than I feel to Ontario.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. McLeod: I feel that the area west of the Rockies is a geographical and cultural area of its own, and I think that the official boundaries of walls between countries are gradually dissolving; but in America, it is becoming more isolated. I think that may change—the fact that America is shutting off the border to more and more Canadians who are going down there, especially people from the underground press. That may force us to get closer to our neighbours to the east.

The Chairman: You feel closer to California than to Ontario?

Mr. McLeod: Yes, culturally.

The Chairman: How about politically and economically?

Mr. McLeod: I think even the RCMP feel closer to the U.S. than Canada. They turned this deserter over to the American authorities in British Columbia—we had a story about it in our recent issue. They cooperate quite closely with the American authorities, but when we try to get across the border, we get hassled or turned back. All of our staff are on a list that they have at the American border; there is no one from the staff of the Georgia Straight or who has anything to do with the Georgia Straight who can be allowed to go through, not even people who are just carrying copies of the Georgia Straight.

Mr. William Hesler: Does it work the other way around? Do Americans coming to British Columbia get the same treatment?

Mr. McLeod: From what I hear, they receive very good treatment. One time I was turned back because I had copies of the Georgia Straight in the back of my car. I was met by half a dozen uniformed officers who said "There are still people who feel proud when they see the Stars and Stripes flying in our country". Then we turned back and we got to the Canadian entry point, and there was a friendly, smiling girl—she just passed us through; so it seemed like day and night, the difference.

The Chairman: Did you have any difficulty getting into Ontario?

Mr. McLeod: When we flew in?

Mr. John Laxton, Legal Counsel for 'Georgia Straight': We had difficulty getting a meal in Ottawa.

The Chairman: Tell us about that. It is not within the terms of reference of the Committee, but we would be interested.

Mr. Laxton: We went to a number of restaurants last night.

The Chairman: You say "we". Do you mean the whole group?

Mr. Laxton: Yes, there were a number of people from the underground press, lawyers and other people who had given briefs, secretaries to Ministers and so on, otherwise respectable people. We tried a number of restaurants, and we were turned down for a variety of reasons; it seemed that each restaurant would phone up the next restaurant and suggest that they offer another excuse because the number of excuses we got for being refused food were quite unique.

Senator Smith: What were they, by the way?

Mr. Laxton: Well, one of us didn't have a jacket on; at another place the jacket didn't matter but somebody didn't have a tie on. At another place we got there at twenty to nine and they said, "Well, the food is cut off at nine". We said, "Well, it's twenty to nine" and they said, "Well, just a minute, I will check". Five minutes later he came back and said, "No, the food is cut off now. You are too late." At still another place we went to, they said, "Well, you can have food, but you can't have anything to drink", and we wanted wine with dinner and we couldn't dance. Eventually, somebody gave us a meal.

The Chairman: Well, in fairness to Ottawa, I think we should know where you finally did eat.

Mr. Laxton: Well, it was a particular secretary to one of our ministers...

The Chairman: In a private home?

Mr. Laxton: In a private apartment, yes.

The Chairman: We won't pursue it.

Mr. Laxton: We only just got through, so...

The Chairman: Are none of you nationalists or do you all agree with the opinion expressed?

Mr. Johnson: I would differ slightly in that I feel that one effective method of opposing the "American Empire Canada Limited" is to promote self-government in Canada—to get the Canadian economy under Canadian control. To that extent, I am a nationalist.

The Chairman: Is that important to you, Mr. Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, but for one simple reason. I will assume the mantle of nationalism if it means that we in any way can weaken the American empire, but ultimately I don't care.

The Chairman: You said, I think that it was 80 per cent of the economy that was owned by the Americans and apparently there wasn't a protest movement.

Mr. Anderson: Well, it just goes to show the 49th Parallel was the loser.

The Chairman: Someone else was going to comment on that.

Mr. Stevens: The question I have is the quote you read which ran something like "The underground press is more or less an American phenomenon".

The Chairman: There it is, it is the part I have circled.

Mr. Stevens: As was mentioned, the underground press did get its start in the U.S. A lot of the culture we are living with now also got its start in the U.S. and a lot of the important people who belong to this sub-culture also live and operate in the U.S. You will find that a lot of the papers have what is called more or less "U.S. viewpoint" because, as was mentioned, a large part of our economy is owned by the U.S. and the things they are saying are also applicable in Canada.

As to the Georgia Straight, they are operating under a geographical boundary, not a national one, but as far as say, producing Sweeney goes—you can't draw a borderline on a community; the underground is a community, and you just can't take the 49th parallel and say, "Well, the community stop here, and Canada is something else". It's life style and you can't draw borderline across life styles.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps I am wrong but what it seems you are saying to me is that those of us who are—notwithstanding your observations, Mr. Anderson—those of us who still are nationalists, can look to you fellows for help. That's what it really amounts to.

Mr. McLeod: Not exactly.

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod?

Mr. McLeod: Not exactly—I think there has been some suggestion that our content is American.

The Chairman: There is the quote, if you want to look at it.

Mr. McLeod: Well, this story by Richard Dahrin—This is the first time I have seen it, but it seems to say a lot about us.

The Chairman: It talks a lot about your paper, about all papers, but mostly about yours.

Mr. McLeod: Right, and I never met this fellow. He interviewed me by telephone from Vancouver, just like the man from Time Magazine last week interviewed me by telephone and never came down to see me. I have heard he does all his interviews by telephone.

The Chairman: You don't have to grant telephone interviews.

Mr. McLeod: I thought that he would at least come down to the office.

The Chairman: Why didn't you say you wouldn't talk to him unless he came up to see you?

Mr. McLeod: Well, I heard this fellow never does anything but telephone interviews, but I didn't know that before. I have always done personal interviews. I was going to meet this fellow but we didn't get together.

The Chairman: Those at the back can't hear you. Could you just speak more loudly please.

Mr. McLeod: The content in our paper—the latest issue for example—80 to 90 per cent of the articles are local articles having to do with the Canadian scene, an article on the pass-over of immigration sheets here in Ottawa, the American deserter who was "kidnapped", the story on all prosecutions for obscenity, B.C. Hydro, Skagit Valley and Vancouver 1980, recipes, articles done by local people, drug misuse, gossip columns, an article on seashells in B.C., "Four Heavies in Search of an Independent Canada", Robin Mathew's interview with Bob Williams of the NDP and the Social Credit Party in B.C., a review of a local poet, movie reviews, international women's day, the National Press Club's discrimination against women, the Society for Pollution and Environmental Control in Vancouver, "Time for Surreal" which is an article written by a local artist, and ads and events going on in this city, and a column on how to help yourself, abortion information, VD clinic, legal air, Hare Krishma feed-ins, Vancouver University, transcendental meditation. That's all local.

The Chairman: So, you are making the point that it is Canadian content?

Mr. McLeod: It is.

The Chairman: Yet, notwithstanding the fact that it's 80 per cent Canadian, you still say you feel closer to California than Ontario; notwithstanding the fact that you are turned back at the border these days in California.

Mr. McLeod: As far as government of human beings is concerned, which is culture, I feel closer to California.

Mr. Hesler: Do you think you benefit from being a Canadian in the production of your publication?

Mr. McLeod: That border separates us from the more oppressed people of the west coast.

Mr. Stevens: I was going to say it separates us from the draft board.

The Chairman: Mr. Stevens says the border separates him from the draft board.

Mr. Stevens: When you talk about the underground, you are talking about a sub-culture—I hate to use clichés—the, "hippy culture" isn't a national phenomenon. It is not American; it is worldwide. It is international, and if somebody reads an article about something that happened in the U.S., he says, "Aha, this paper has an American bias or it is writing about American events". It is not applicable because you are talking about cultural and social and community activities that apply to everybody. You know, you don't erect borders on the underground.

The Chairman: Well, then, if you don't erect borders on the underground, and if, to use your phrase, the "hippy culture" which you used and I didn't...

Mr. Stevens: Cliche.

The Chairman: Yes, but if it's worldwide, it is also true to say, is it not, that it had its origin in the United States?

Mr. Cain: We can take it one step further and say it started in places like Afghanistan. That's where it started. They have been through three civilizations there. We are only on the first one.

The Chairman: Well, explain it. Expand upon it.

Mr. Cain: Well, at least three come to mind. Three emperors have been through the whole of the Middle East and they have been up and come down, but we are still on our way up, still building computers, space programmes and it's not worth it.

The Chairman: How do you relate this to the American things?

Mr. Cain: Well, we were getting at that—You said hippies were American. I said hippies were not American.

The Chairman: I said they began there—Wrong?

Mr. Cain: Okay, hippies began—Yes, hippies as a cliché began in the States.

Mr. Stevens: What is the hippie anyway?

The Chairman: I did not first use the words, you did.

Mr. Cain: I am terribly sorry.

Mr. Stevens: You would have, you know, a sub-culture that believes in, practises ideals that have been around for five thousand years, six thousand years. Well, what it's all about. The ideas are not new its just that you have a group of people practising them in this century, and they happened to practise them in the United States first maybe or they got their attention in the United States first.

The Chairman: We are drifting a little bit but I want to put the same point to Mr. Laxton and perhaps I could put the question to him.

You will appreciate that the concern of this Committee is the total spectrum of the mass media in Canada and this whole question of American influence is one which is—I won't say it's uppermost in our minds, but it is a major consideration of the Committee, and that's why I think the discussion does have some relevance for us. Mr. Laxton, as well as being the legal counsel for the Georgia

Straight, was an NDP candidate in the last federal election or was it provincial?

Mr. Laxton: Provincial.

The Chairman: Provincial election. He is presently the president of the New Democratic Party in British Columbia. That party takes a certain and rather dramatic policy on economic investments; therefore, I would ask you to comment on this discussion and perhaps I could more specifically ask you for your views on the recommendations which Pierre Juneau has made to the broadcasters in Canada, as I am sure you know, stimulating the greater degree of Canadian content? You are familiar with these proposals, that's where I think the cogency is.

Mr. Laxton: Well, let me say that I did not come here as an NDP candidate or president of the party.

The Chairman: I appreciate that.

Mr. Laxton: I came here as legal counsel because if anybody is interested in my views I am interested in expressing them on the question of nationalism or anything else that we are discussing.

My first thought about nationalism is to recall the words of H. G. Wells who said that nationalism would be a childish thing if weren't such a dangerous business. I am opposed to nationalism because I think that nationalism after religion has been the cause of more bloodshed in the history of mankind than any other "ism"; nevertheless, I think there is a situation in Canada today where nationalism perhaps is a necessary evil, at least certain forms of it. I agree with the gentleman here who said—I am sorry, I have forgotten...

The Chairman: Mr. Anderson.

Mr. Laxton: Mr. Anderson, who said we are a part of the American empire; and a lot of people don't like being a part of the American empire, not because we are controlled by a foreign country, but because we don't like the value system of the people who are controlling us. We don't like the life style of the people who have control; therefore we say that nationalism can serve a useful purpose if it helps us to sever our connection with people whose ideas about the kind of society in which we have to live, can be severed.

I think, perhaps, Senator Davey, you are making a false analogy when you say that the underground press is controlled by the Americans in the same way as our economy is controlled.

The Chairman: In fairness, I don't think I said "controlled". I said important influence.

Mr. Laxton: Important influence. Well, I think those are loaded words. What is happening is that in the United States and in fact all over the western world, there is a movement against the existing value system, against the existing institutions, against the existing life styles, and that is not a movement of weird cranks. It is a movement that I think is being felt in an inarticulate way by a large portion of the population; and the underground press insofar as it carries articles and statements by Americans is merely showing an identity of interest with the humanitarian ideal which they have in common. I don't think that because these stories are carried in the Canadian underground press on the United States that that means that something subversive is happening, that control is being manipulated by a foreign government.

The Chairman: Can we put it this way. Would it be fair to say that the underground press in Canada is not nationalistic but neither is the underground press in the United States? Is that a fair statement?

Mr. McLeod: That's true.

Mr. Laxton: Yes, but I think it's less concerned with national boundaries than it is with the common problems of humanity wherever they are.

The Chairman: Well, we have talked a lot about that. Perhaps we could turn to another subject. Senator Hays...

Senator Hays: Yes, I would like to ask Mr. Anderson a question.

You intimated that there was a gap between the present mass media and this is part of the reason for your becoming involved with the publication of your particular paper. Would you enlarge on where the gap is? Is it a credibility gap or do you think that the reporting that is done in your papers in Winnipeg is being influenced by the editors and the editor is being influenced by the publisher? I would just like to know your views.

Mr. Anderson: Two newspapers we have in Winnipeg are both reactionary, particularly the Winnipeg Free Press, but they are both very reactionary indeed. I don't know who the demon is behind the structure of the Win- nipeg Free Press. I have heard that it's someone called R. S. Malone who has written one book in his life and it happens to be on war. In any event, Winnipeg returns four Members of Parliament every election—traditionally, we return two NDP members, from Winnipeg North and Winnipeg North-Centre, yet both newspapers, as I say, are reactionary in that they in no way—it is self-evident that they don't even reflect the political thinking of the Winnipeg society.

The Chairman: How does the Winnipeg Free Press demonstrate the greater degree of reaction than the Tribune? Why do you say that?

Mr. Anderson: Well, Senator Davey, you have to live in Winnipeg really to feel the tentacles of the Winnipeg Free Press; it's a disturbing experience to pick up that newspaper and to read its editorials. They are wildly reactionary. I can't find words strong enough to indicate. They are concerned with one thing and one thing only, and that's money. Any time there's any fooling around with money, the Winnipeg Free Press sends out the editorial writers and off they go and they do their thing.

The Chairman: Have you lived in Winnipeg for a while?

Mr. Anderson: All my life, yes.

The Chairman: Do you think that that paper has changed its editorial posture over, say, the last 25 years?

Mr. Anderson: It seems to be going more and more to the right all the time, if that's possible.

The Chairman: I interrupted you, please go ahead.

Mr. Anderson: I just want to make one point. Perhaps this would clarify it. I think that there is a conflict of interests if the newspaper is a money-making proposition. I don't think it can be a newspaper. It becomes automatically a business once it becomes big business; consequently it reflects the thinking of those people who are involved in big business.

One of the things about the underground press is that I don't think that financially anybody is really making any profit out of them. I noticed that Dan McLeod has just very recently been paying for articles. Is that right? We don't. As a matter of fact, we are in debt. It's costing a thousand dollars of my own money, but the point I am making is that once a newspaper becomes a business, once it becomes a profit-making business, it seems to me inevitable that it's not going to be a true paper.

Mr. Hesler: Mr. Anderson, would you describe Omphalos as being more of an opposition paper than an underground paper?

Mr. Anderson: Yes, the word "underground" is just a word of convenience.

Mr. Hesler: I think Mr. Stevens used the words "the borders of the underground" and I would assume that you go beyond the borders and appeal to...

Mr. Anderson: It's just an alternative media. That's all.

Senator Hays: May I get back and ask another question, Mr. Chairman? Would you hire a reporter that might be working for the Winnipeg Free Press or the Tribune? Would you consider him a good reporter, or how are his thoughts orientated, in your opinion?

Mr. Anderson: You mean, just hypothetical...

Senator Hays: The editorial content generally comes from one of the news stories.

The Chairman: Editorial content of the dailies in Winnipeg?

Senator Hays: Yes, generally in the first section or some section, there will be a story and then the next day or two days later there will be an editorial. How does this come about, in your opinion?

Mr. Anderson: Senator Hays, I am afraid I don't understand.

Senator Hays: Well, does the editor send out and say, "Well, we want to write an editorial on—" Well, say, there is an election campaign on. Go out and get a story on the NDP candidate. Probably they are going to clobber him in Winnipeg. Is this right?

Mr. Anderson: Probably, yes.

Senator Hays: Yes, and then the editor picks out the headlines from the story and then the editorial staff go to work on it two days later and then you read it.

Mr. Anderson: Well, one of the things I should explain, and I think this is a phenomenon of the underground press in general, and that is that they have no editorials as such. I think the news stories and the editorials all run together. One of the things an underground press tries not to do, is to have that kind of objective faceless kind of reporting of facts, which is not as objective as it seems to be on the surface anyhow. I think the people who write for the underground press have the greatest freedom of expression and they interpret the news as they go along; in other words, they let their prejudices all hang out.

The Chairman: But that's what you were being critical of in the Free Press.

Mr. Johnson: But there is a difference. They pretend that they are unbiased which they cannot be. They hide it.

The Chairman: Following Senator Hays' question, how has the Free Press and the Tribune treated your paper? Have they covered your activities?

Mr. Anderson: Well, the Winnipeg Tribune hasn't mentioned it once, ever, ever, but the Winnipeg Free Press has, in fact.

Senator Hays: They were kind to you?

Mr. Anderson: No, they weren't.

The Chairman: Is that the article by Mr. Chris Clifford? I have an article written from Winnipeg which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on the 16th of December by Chris Clifford from Winnipeg, and I was wondering if he was the Winnipeg Free Press correspondent?

Mr. Anderson: I think that's a pseudonym for someone who works for CBC. I am not absolutely sure.

The Chairman: You made a point about your $1,000. This person says that the paper has become a financial success. I am quoting now?

"The paper has become a financial success; It's making enough money that it now has an office where the editors and hangers-on can meet and talk."

Are you a financial success?

Mr. Anderson: Oh, we are not a financial success at all. We operate from issue to issue. We always have to raise that $300 for printing costs. It is always a hassle.

Senator Hays: You take advertising?

Mr. Anderson: Oh, yes, we will take advertising.

Senator Hays: And if you made a lot of money, you wouldn't object to that?

Mr. Anderson: Ah, I see where you are leading me, Senator. I don't object to money at all, but the money I would make I would put back into the paper and try to produce a better paper.

Senator Hays: How many do you sell in Winnipeg?

The Chairman: Mr. Laxton wants to jump in with something.

Mr. Laxton: Could I just add on this question of profitability because I also see where the Senator is attempting to go, and the Georgia Straight is probably the most successful underground paper in Canada today. It has a circulation, I believe, at the present time of over 20,000. Until Mayor Campbell illegally suspended its business life, it had actually received a circulation of 70,000, and it is getting some small amount of revenue in advertising. But I know, and that is why I wanted to make this statement—I know that all the money that they make doesn't go into paying fines and exorbitant legal fees. All of the money they make goes back into the paper.

They are constantly hiring new people and attempting to improve their general facilities, and all the time they are attempting to put out a better paper. If you look at the development of the Georgia Straight since 1967 when it first came out, you would see that today it is a much superior paper; and if the prosecutors would get off the backs of this paper, so it could survive economically, then I am sure that it could put out one of the finest papers in this country. There is nothing wrong with making a profit, if it is going to be put back into the paper.

Senator Hays: You feel then that there should be a ceiling on profits insofar as newspapers are concerned?

Mr. Laxton: Well, I don't see how you could impose a ceiling, really.

Senator Hays: You just don't agree with that. If you wanted to make a lot of money, why all the more power to you.

Mr. Laxton: That's not all we said, though. We said we are not interested in making a lot of money—I am speaking of "we" meaning the Georgia Straight—they are not interested in making money for its own sake. They are interested in making money so that they can turn out a better paper. If you have a reporter, a man who has three children, he has got to have money to take home to buy bread and pay his rent. A paper that can't afford to pay its reporters a decent living wage, can't last very long, and that's what happened with people donating work voluntarily, and that necessarily has to be limited.

Senator Hays: Isn't this the object, though, of all newspapers in all the news media, to earn enough to put out a better product?

Mr. Laxton: Well, that's a subsidiary concern. They are businesses, as Mr. Anderson said, whose primary concern is not to educate, not to challenge, not to inform, not to criticize, not to really perform any vital function in society, but rather to make a profit for the people who own it. We are not saying that there is anything wrong with the profit concept necessarily, but if you apply it to newspapers, you end up with the kind of newspapers that we have in this country.

The Chairman: Senator McElman wanted to say something.

Senator McElman: Yes, does the Georgia Straight own its own physical plant, or is it printed by another?

Mr. Laxton: It is printed by a printer. It's a separate company.

Senator McElman: Amongst the objectives, would it be an objective to establish your own plant?

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod?

Mr. McLeod: Well, we would like to get our own printing press, but only for the reason that our printer has been threatened by the city prosecutor.

The Chairman: On what basis?

Mr. McLeod: The city prosecutor called three representatives of the printer into his office and warned that if they printed any genitals in the paper any more, that he would charge the Georgia Straight and our printer as well with obscenity and close down their business as well as ours.

The Chairman: How did the printer respond to that? Did he call you and talk to you and tell you he was concerned?

Mr. McLeod: He talked to me and said he was concerned, and I said that we would impose some selfcensorship in that area, as we have been forced to do in other areas, in the area of criminal libel and area of counselling to cultivate marijuana, which are the charges which have been laid on us.

Mr. Hesler: Mr. McLeod, just to get back to your relations which your printers, I would like to ask you this question, but I would like, perhaps, the others here today to answer it as well. Do you find that you are being fairly treated by the people in the printing business?

Mr. McLeod: We are treated very fairly by our own printers. We have had five or six different printers in our history.

Mr. Hesler: Do you think that they are charging you an extra premium just to produce the kind of publication you are producing, perhaps because it is more dangerous for them to do so?

Mr. McLeod: That's possible. That's possible, but I wouldn't say that for sure.

Mr. Hesler: I would like to ask Mr. Wetzel...

Mr. McLeod: Our printer is one of the most reasonable in price and in his attitude of all the printers in Vancouver: but of other printers I wouldn't say the same thing. We have been turned down several times by printers, by all the printers in Vancouver and we had to print our paper in Victoria, on the Island several times and bring it over by truck because nobody else would print it.

Mr. Hesler: But at the present time your printing arrangements are fairly stable?

Mr. McLeod: Yes, the last time there was a threat was in September when a police officer threatened our printers outside the courtroom that the printer would be charged with criminal libel because of something that we said about the police officer. The printers were then being summoned on two or three different court cases, and they were very nervous. There was a feeling of uneasiness throughout the whole printing plant, and they just told us that they felt so bad about it they couldn't print it even though they really wanted to. So, for one week we printed in Victoria, but during that week we were acquitted on some charges of obscenity, and the printer reconsidered and we have been back with him since then.

The Chairman: Mr. Laxton?

Mr. Laxton: There was a postscript to that. After the Straight was acquitted on the obscenity charges for the first time in two years there was editorial comment in the Vancouver Sun, the Vancouver Province, the effect of which was that it was obvious that the Georgia Straight was being singled out for prosecution, and both editorials called on the Chief City Prosecutor to explain why the Georgia Straight was so obviously being persecuted in this fashion. Following the editorial support for the Georgia Straight, the atmosphere the tension eased quite a bit and the printer came back home and started printing for us again, and a lot of other things started to go a little easier.

Mr. Hesler: Perhaps we should discuss in detail in a few minutes this whole question of what we might call "suppression" on a local level in various forms, but before we get onto that, I wanted to get away from the Straight and ask the other papers how they survive financially because I think as you may know, one of the concerns of the Committee is to look into the financial problems of all Canadian forms of mass communication.

Mr. Wetzel: In his brief has made a very interesting comment, particularly since freedom of the press is another one of the concerns of the Committee, "Freedom of the press"...

The Chairman: You are quoting now from the...

Mr. Wetzel: I would like to say that I didn't write that brief. Dave Bush wrote that.

Mr. Hesler: Well, I might just ask your comment on this very interesting sentence: "Freedom of the press is very much a joke..."

The Chairman: This is at page 14 of this issue of Harbinger which we were given this morning. Where are you quoting from?

Mr. Hesler: It's the last sentence of the first paragraph.

"Freedom of the press is very much a joke when the only people who have the equipment for mass communication are the wealthy."

That may be so, but what can we do to correct the situation?

The Chairman: Mr. Wetzel?

Mr. Wetzel: We can stop ownership of property, ownership of business. My feeling of business are that they shouldn't be run as businesses. Papers shouldn't have editors and publishers. If you are going to have a community paper which Harbinger is trying to do, it is run by the community. Its editorial content is decided by the community, not by an editor or an editor-in-chief.

Mr. Hesler: Do you think the community should make equipment available to the people who wish to express themselves?

Mr. Wetzel: Oh, yes, we have a Gestetner machine that's available for anyone to print anything they want. If we had rotary offset presses, we would make that same equipment available.

Mr. Hesler: If I had something that I wanted to get across to a large number of people, would you let me print it in your papers?

Mr. Wetzel: That would be up to all the people in Toronto who are directly involved in the paper. It wouldn't be just up to me.

Mr. Hesler: What sort of material would you reject?

Mr. Wetzel: I couldn't say that either because I don't know what would be rejected. In this last issue of Harbinger, there were three pages in it done by three other groups of people. One was the 'Coach House Press', Rainbow Bridge Trading Company and Rag-arokr all three of which are groups just as Harbinger is a single group, but they don't publish their own papers, yet we allowed them the freedom that they use our pages, and we have no control over what they say and do in their page.

Mr. Hesler: Do you charge them?

Mr. Wetzel: No, no, we do not charge them.

Mr. Hesler: How are you doing financially?

Mr. Wetzel: We owe about $2,000.

Senator Hays: Would you publish something that John Bassett wrote for your newspaper?

Mr. Wetzel: There again, I can't make that decision.

The Chairman: Well, in this editorial, you say John Bassett controls The Telegram and CTO Television and part of the Maple Leaf Gardens. Supposing John Bassett sent a letter to the editor of this paper; would you print it?

Mr. Wetzel: Yes, that is one of the good things about underground papers. They can allow that interplay between people who read and people who write. If a person writes a book and if a person buys that book, he reads it and that's it. There is no interaction between the author and the reader. Newspapers give you that. The readers can write back.

The Chairman: Do you think that's true of the daily papers?

Mr. Wetzel: No, they chop up the letters; they don't print the letters as is.

The Chairman: Well, the Toronto Star, for example, when they were here before our Committee, they told us they started a new—what they call "participatory journalism". They have turned page 7 over entirely to anybody who wanted to write for it. Do you think that they would accept a piece from you? Do you think that they would accept a piece from you? Do you have any doubt that they would accept a piece from you? Obviously you do.

Mr. Wetzel: I do.

The Chairman: Why?

Mr. Wetzel: Because we were running into the same difficulties with our printer. He is getting hassled.

The Chairman: But not by the daily papers, surely?

Mr. Wetzel: No, but because of our content and the people who write for the paper. If you read through the paper, you get some idea of where their heads are at. If we were going to write for the Star, we wouldn't change the way we wrote, we wouldn't come here wearing a tie, because we have never worn a tie, just because you expect us to wear a tie.

The Chairman: I didn't expect you to wear a tie.

Do you think that the Toronto daily papers would reprint this "The Medium is a Mess" with all its dollar signs? Do you think—Would they reprint that?

Mr. Wetzel: Probably not with our mistakes.

The Chairman: Typing mistakes... Well, perhaps on the point of typing mistakes, we could recess for a few minutes. We will reconvene in about seven minutes at 11.30. Thank you.

Short recess.

The Chairman: If I could call the meeting back to order, Senators...

Perhaps before we begin, there are two more representatives of the underground press who spoke to me during the adjournment and should perhaps be introduced and identified, and if they wish to participate in the discussion, they will be more than welcome.

We have the editor of Aquarius, St. Catharines, Ontario, Mr. Dennis Westley. Sitting next to him is Mr. Terry O'Hara, who represents an underground paper in Kingston, Ontario, called This Paper Belongs to the People.

Now, we can resume. I think, Senator McElman, you wanted to start off now.

Senator McElman: Yes, I would like to get back to this matter of the physical plant and try to learn from each and all whether any actually do own a physical plant of their own for publishing. Secondly, if there are none, I would like to determine for the record what problems they have had in getting printed in their specific areas, the nature of those problems, and if there has been discrimination against the publishers.

The Chairman: Do you want to put that to each person in turn?

Senator McElman: Yes, I would.

Mr. McLeod: We have thought of going public, and we would have to fight a legal funds to buy a press, but we have been informed that Victoria, the government in Victoria, would try to oppose our going public, and we would have to fight a legal battle in order to get permission to go public; so that's being held out now.

The Chairman: Mr. Wetzel, do you want to comment on Senator McElman's question?

Mr. Wetzel: We have been talking to our printer about buying some rotary offset presses, but we have found out we need about $35,000 before we could really realize that. The only thing we are just trying to do is find people who do have print shops, do have offset presses which can be used by people and we are trying to free them when they are not being used. Our people are still paying a commercial printer. That's only because we haven't found a press big enough to use yet. As soon as we do, we will probably do our own printing. There again, us owning a press—we would like to have a press. We would consider owning it. We would have that press available for the people in Toronto wanting to do things. It would be that simple.

The Chairman: Okay, thank you. Mr. Stevens?

Mr. Stevens: We can't even afford to pay rent for offices; so I don't think we will be buying a press in any short time. We have never really run into troubles with printers.

Well, I should give you a short run-down on the offset process, maybe. You have to shoot the negatives of the thing and then you expose them, put them on a chemically treated plate; that is how you make your print, which we used to do if the negative was shot in one place and then the plates made in another place and have the paper printed some place else. The only trouble we ever had was when the guy refused to do it, one issue, because he saw obscenity in the paper. Since then we have never had any problems getting the paper printed.

The Chairman: Mr. Johnson, Sudbury?

Mr. Johnson: Well, as far as owning a press, I am in more or less the same position. I am having trouble paying off my printer. As far as trouble with the printer, the first issue I went to one printer in New Liskeard and this printer makes a practice of reading every word in the paper before he will print it, and he read every word, and he saw several words he didn't like in one article in particular, and said he wouldn't print it. Anyway, I changed printers and I have had no problem since then with the printer.

The Chairman: Are you printed now in Sudbury?

Mr. Johnson: No, there is no press in Sudbury big enough to do this and we go down near Barrie.

The Chairman: That's a long way. How many miles is that?

Mr. Johnson: Two hundred miles—it's not far, a few hours, not far.

The Chairman: A few hours by some... Do you hitch-hike down? Mr. McLeod says the Sudbury Star has a big press. Mr. Anderson, do you want to comment on that question?

Mr. Anderson: We have had no trouble with our printer at all. We are printed by printer in Steinbach, Manitoba, which is about 40 miles south of Winnipeg. It's a Mennonite community. We have had no difficulty, but then on the other hand, I think we probably have an understanding with our printer, and consequently we don't use words that are considered obscene excessively; when we pick up something from another underground paper or from Liberation News Service, but we ourselves don't use four-letter words and we don't publish pictures of nudes because we are gutless, I suppose. So, there is just no problem; and the arrangement we have now is satisfactory. We are not thinking of buying our own presses.

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod?

Mr. McLeod: We don't just have an agreement with our printer. We have a legal agreement which we call an "indemnity agreement" which says that, in effect, that the printer is guaranteed that if he is charged and convicted and fined for obscenity or anything else resulting from the paper being suppressed, that we would reimburse him for the fine or whatever costs would be involved.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Harris is next.

Mr. Harris: The main thing with printers that I found in Ontario, apropos of Mr. Johnson's comment about the printer reading every word—Well, the printer isn't liable in Ontario. It doesn't matter what he prints. It is the publisher that is liable; so that when we take a paper to the press, if it gets busted on the street, we are the only ones responsible. The printer might have the negatives or the plates, but there is no problem beyond that. Printers basically are not operating on the basis of their own ideas, and we have had troubles there.

Mr. Johnson: There are pressures put upon them by various official organizations which could be embarrassing for them.

Mr. Harris: That is possible. We have run around.

The Chairman: I think Mr. Laxton wanted to say something.

Mr. Laxton: Speaking as a lawyer, I don't think you are quite right when you say that the printer could not be charged. The Criminal Code applies in Ontario as it applies in every other province, and there is no doubt in my mind that the printer can be charged under the obscenity section, for example, and possibly under many other sections, but it's not generally the practice to bring charges against printers, but that doesn't mean that they are legally immune. I think that they could be prosecuted.

The Chairman: Does that answer you?

Senator McElman: Well, Mr. Laxton has led me to my next question.

Can any printer be enjoined in actions against any of the newspapers?

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod?

Mr. McLeod: There is one more type of harassment of printers we haven't run across yet, but in Los Angeles where the Los Angeles Free Press is published—it is the largest underground paper with circulation over 100,000.

The Chairman: Is that a weekly?

Mr. McLeod: Yes, it is a weekly. They have finally bought their own press because their sixth printer was bought out by the Los Angeles Times and they immediately stopped printing the L.A. Free Press; their seventh printer was being pressured. He was their seventh and the last printer in Long Beach when they went and bought their own press and now they are operating with their own equipment.

The Chairman: Do you fellows from St. Catharines and Kingston want to comment on this at all?

Mr. Terry O'Hara Editor, This Paper Belongs to the People, Kingston, Ontario: It is very important to realize that there is more than one kind of control that a printer is encountered with. There is one kind of editorial control where he reads every word, but there is also a certain amount of financial control. No printer actually has to say, "I don't want to print this paper because I don't agree with your policy. I don't agree with what you are saying." He just gives a shut-out bid; so that for this kind of publication, it is quite often hard to get a printer in the first place.

When we started our paper in Kingston, we talked to an awful lot of printers, and the prices that we had for exactly the same basic price for just the printing of an eight-page tabloid paper on total offset varied from $55 to $1,072 for exactly the same thing.

Now, what this forced us into was that we could not in Kingston get a printer to do the same job that could be done in Toronto for $55 for less than $175; then again local bids went as high as over a thousand dollars. This means that if we were going to get a price that we could afford, we would have to make a 165 mile round trip to Toronto every time we print, but we have to do that in order to get a price that we can afford.

The Chairman: Mr. Westley?

Mr. Dennis Westley, Editor, 'Aquarius', St. Catharines, Ontario: Well, we get ours printed in Toronto, the same as the Harbinger. They are pretty cool. They are pretty reasonable and we haven't had any problems.

The Chairman: Senator McElman, do you want to pursue this at all? Does that answer your question?

Could we, perhaps for a few minutes discuss the role of advertising in your papers? Do you all accept advertising? Is there anybody who doesn't accept advertising? So, you all accept advertising; do you get much advertising?

Mr. Stevens: Well, speaking just for Sweeney our advertising rates have varied. The amount of money we have got for advertising varies between $117.00 and $28.00 for, any given issue, and we have had to cut back the size of the paper or tried to sell a little more. We have lowered the price to get wider readership, and consequently a larger percentage of it paid by readers but this doesn't work very well. That's why our paper is more or less on a month to month basis. We can't plan ahead. I read some place in a handbook for writers of trade journals, small publications of this sort, that you were supposed to plan six months ahead for a monthly, but this is not feasible in our kind of operation.

The Chairman: How do you sell advertising?

Mr. Stevens: We have a list of rates drawn up and as to the individual soliciting, we have a person in charge of ads, and he goes out and bugs everybody he can.

The Chairman: In Oakville?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, more or less local and if they want it they buy it. We have had some good support from some quarters and some not so good. Other people won't even listen to us. They are paying for it, that's their privilege. It's more or less on a month-to-month basis, how much we get in.

The Chairman: How much advertising does the Harbinger get, Mr. Wetzel? Do you get a great deal?

Mr. Wetzel: We did. In Toronto, there is another paper called Tribal Village. They have the policy of soliciting advertising and telling the advertiser, "Buy an ad and we will do a story on you".

The Chairman: Doesn't the Tribal Village concentrate on entertainment?

Mr. Wetzel: I wouldn't want to make a judgment on it.

The Chairman: It seems to me when I read the Tribal Village, it is about television programmes, theatre, arts and music. Do they get more advertising than you do?

Mr. Wetzel: Oh, yes, in fact we have lost a lot of our advertisers because we have refused to do stories on them, at which point they get very upset, because they feel we should do a story on them—you know, say they are nice guys. The people on the paper that are writing that just don't want to do that, so it doesn't happen.

The Chairman: Yes, As I am sure you know, about 90 per cent of the national advertising in Canada, as opposed to the local advertising, is placed by advertising agencies in Toronto. What attempts have you made to secure national advertising for your paper?

Mr. Wetzel: Ours isn't really an affluent paper so we haven't made any attempt.

The Chairman: I think you are misunderstanding my concern.

Mr. Wetzel: From national advertising?

The Chairman: From the soft drink companies, from the automobile dealers—What attempts have you made?

Mr. Wetzel: Actually, I don't think any attempts have been made other than the record companies and the book companies.

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod, have you made any attempts to sell national advertising in your paper?

Mr. McLeod: National agencies have approached us. I don't know how we are dealing with them at the moment. Advertising is separate from my department.

The Chairman: The point I am making is in reading your papers for the last few days, almost all of the advertising is local advertising, which I suppose leads naturally to a criticism—why don't the national advertisers use your papers. Before we put that question, I suppose you have to ask have you ever tried to get national advertising?

Mr. McLeod: We have a national advertising representative which reaches many of the underground papers and they get mostly record ads, some ads from publishers, but we haven't got much from them recently.

The Chairman: I saw a Columbia Record ad, I think, in this issue of your paper, which is the 25th of February.

Mr. McLeod: Yes, but Columbia has local offices in Vancouver, so we get it straight from Columbia as well as the other record companies.

The Chairman: Somebody told me that Columbia Records are the largest international advertiser in the underground press. That's a local ad, is it, this one here?

Mr. McLeod: Yes, Columbia was the largest advertiser in the American underground press till they cut out all underground press ads because of pressure from CBS.

Mr. Weizel: I think the Rolling Stones have a lot to do with that. They got into a lot of discussion with Columbia as to why they advertised heavily in the underground press rather than place more ads in the Rolling Stone papers because they reached the market in advertising that the underground papers wanted to reach and that's why Columbia cut down their advertising.

The L. A. Free Press has a circulation of over 100,000 and certainly they wouldn't be ignored for any specious reason.

Mr. Hesler: What was the effect of Columbia dropping their advertising?

Mr. McLeod: Well, I think it severely hampered the quality of the underground papers. We still are getting Columbia ads because I suppose the head office hasn't notified Columbia of Canada that they are not supposed to advertise in the underground press, or maybe they have some independence of their own.

Mr. Stevens: You have to look at it realistically, Sweeney, for instance, is a 16-page tabloid, and we have a maximum circulation of 1,000 in Oakville only. We have gone to various places that are national more or less with branches in all different towns, and they have said, "Take it up with the head office". They didn't seem particularly interested, and the odd time we have followed it through, they ask, "Well, how many issues? How many people are seeing it?" It is a small paper, let's face it. A lot of people don't want to pay for the coverage they would get in Sweeney and also we haven't—I have to be perfectly honest—a lot of times we haven't had the time, inclination or money to be taking trips to Toronto to see head office.

The Chairman: Do any of you know what the total underground circulation is in Canada?

Mr. Harris: 100,000—That depends on what time you are estimating it on.

The Chairman: Weekly, I think, you know.

Mr. Harris: Well, if only one paper comes out weekly, bi-weekly.

The Chairman: How often do you publish?

Mr. Johnson: As often as I can. Sometimes I get out two in a month; sometimes I don't.

Mr. Harris: Maybe 100,000 to 150,000 a month, the bulk of that coming from the States.

The Chairman: If you are selling, let's say, 150,000 a month collectively, presumably you are reaching a select kind of audience, a kind of audience which would use specific products; for example, cigarettes are a pretty good case in point. Wouldn't this be a place for the cigarette companies?

Mr. Stevens: You need an organization.

The Chairman: Why haven't you got one?

Mr. Harris: We don't want that.

The Chairman: Why? You say you haven't enough money.

Mr. Harris: Oh, we can use more money.

The Chairman: You accept advertising, but you don't solicit it?

Mr. Harris: If people want to give us advertising, that's fine. We solicit local advertising.

The Chairman: Why don't you solicit national advertising?

Mr. Harris: Can't be bothered. I don't really care.

The Chairman: It's not a question of whether you care. It's a question of whether or not you need the money.

Mr. Cain: That's exactly the point between the underground press and the uptown press.

The Chairman: But you are being inconsistent. Why do you accept local advertising and not national? It seems to me if you are consistent, you would say there is no advertising in our paper. Why don't you say that?

Mr. Cain: If you go through the papers, you will see that the majority of advertising comes from boutiques, music stores, local music stores, rock shows, things like that; so, there is consistency in that our advertising is local and also a part of a life style.

The Chairman: Does everybody agree with that? Does Mr. Wetzel agree with that?

Mr. Wetzel: I think Octopus would probably accept national advertising if it is being offered.

Mr. Stevens: To set up an organization that could handle national advertising would take time and effort and money that the majority of us don't have available now.

Mr. Harris: There are agencies, but what I am saying is who is advertising in Canada on a national level?—maybe a couple of book publishers?

The Chairman: Not a cigarette company?

Mr. Harris: No.

The Chairman: Why? You are smoking Players there. Why not?

Mr. Cain: We are not smoking Players tobacco though.

Mr. Harris: I don't think people want to pick up the paper and read about cigarettes or Firestone tires. Advertising is content to the point that it tells people what is happening in town. You can tell people that they can smoke Players cigarettes or listen to Columbia records but as far as I am concerned that is pretty well irrelevant to what we want to communicate.

The Chairman: If Columbia Records came to you and said they wanted to rent a quarter page in every issue, would you accept it or not?

Mr. Harris: I would have to think about it.

The Chairman: You would have to think about it. Would you have to think about it, Mr. McLeod? If Columbia Records came to you and wanted to run an ad?

Mr. McLeod: If they could get a contract—We have had contracts.

The Chairman: Well, does anybody else want to comment on this?

What is the policy of your paper on national advertising, Mr. Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: Well, I was amused to think that you would make a pretty good editor of an underground paper, because you think big. It never even occurred to us to get in touch with an ad agency in Toronto, but maybe when we get back we will.

The Chairman: Well, I am sure you will perhaps be offended at having the underground press described collectively as a "market"; so, apologizing for that description, it is a market which would interest some advertisers, and I am wondering why those advertisers haven't been approached.

Mr. Anderson: It just never occurred to us.

The Chairman: The fellow from Ottawa here said they don't want them. Do you have that attitude in your paper?

Mr. Johnson: It's just a question of haven't had the time to go after it. It is a question of time, but to a certain extent it is a question of the content of the ads that would be placed.

Mr. Laxton: Isn't it a question of priorities? The papers aren't primarily concerned with building up advertising revenue. The only concern with advertising revenue is to have sufficient to enable the paper to function as an economic unit; but the first motivation of these papers is to communicate a message, what they think is important, and only secondarily are they concerned with building up the business. That's why I think most of the papers have neglected the business side of it. It wouldn't be surprising the find that they hadn't developed a very large campaign.

The Chairman: We live in a real world, and it costs. Don't you think we live in a real world?

Mr. Harris: You wear that suit because it is pushed to you.

The Chairman: Pardon?

Mr. Harris: You wear that suit because it is pushed to you.

The Chairman: Why do you wear that sweater?

Mr. Harris: Because I like it. It's made by somebody I like, my mother.

Mr. O'Hara: I think you have to remember that all underground papers, all I have ever come into contact with, work with very limited facilities in terms of human resources as well as financial resources. In terms of the kind of thing we try to communicate, it is much more important to use those resources to be having people knocking on doors selling papers rather than fishing around for national advertising so that you can turn out even a slightly better paper. It is a much more important thing to the people who read that paper.

I think even Thompson once admitted that paper should be able to support itself on its own circulation, and he's notorious for not reading the contents and perhaps not reading the ads enough. I think possibly there's a certain amount of distaste for advertising revenue which has been perhaps reflected, and there is a certain amount of control inherent in that kind of thing however well you attempt to say no.

The important thing is the editorial content. If you, for example, got used to having the quarter-page Columbia ad every week on every issue and that's cut off, that could conceivably put you under some kind of pressure which would take a definite step to overcome that kind of pressure. It's not that bad an idea not to allow yourself to be placed in that situation.

Mr. Westley: Yes, there are other problems too. I find in our experience that if you haven't got a good circulation, advertisers don't want to look at you.

The Chairman: I am sorry?

Mr. Westley: If you haven't got a good circulation, advertisers don't want to look at you. If you can't circulate, you can't get advertisers. When you take the paper around, people don't want it in the stores because it doesn't have advertising. This has happened in a number of cases; and again you are sort of trapped. Then you get a bunch of people who are thinking, "Well, if you are going to reduce an ad for Stelco Steel and put it beside an article on pollution, you are crazy, because that's a contradiction." And so it gets down to that too.

So, in the end you can't do it anyway so you just leave the paper alone. You forget about the advertising revenue. I think advertising on the whole is part of the problem and

I think our underground newspapers are part of the solution and I don't think you can compromise the two.

The Chairman: Well, how do you mean. Would you expand upon that?

Mr. Westley: What, advertising?

The Chairman: Well, you say that the underground press is part of the solution. In what way?

Mr. Westley: I think we are trying to get out that problem. I think we are trying to demonstrate not just through keeping a paper going and not having all the advertising in, because people aren't dumb. People are tuned in and they will see that there is a contradiction right on that page. I think I feel anyway that we are trying to do without any contradictions to make it pure and simple, and I think that works out a lot better.

The Chairman: Well, I wonder if Mr. Cain and Mr. Harris pay their contributors. Do you pay them, Mr. Harris? Not at all. Nothing. So the only thing you pay for is the printing?

Mr. Stevens: Production costs, yes.

The Chairman: And you defray those production cost partially with local advertising?

Mr. Stevens: Yes.

The Chairman: And as long as you can meet those bills, that's all you want to do?

Mr. Harris: Well, no, we do want to get bigger. We want to come out more often and at a more professional level. We are attempting to increase our circulation and our advertising in order to put together a more commercial paper.

The Chairman: But circulation revenue is more meaningful and more important?

Mr. Harris: No, about 60 per cent of our revenue comes from advertising at least.

The Chairman: Are there other questions on advertising?

Mr. Westley: Yes, and there is another important point too.

The Chairman: Mr. Westley?

Mr. Westley: Yes, it is very important if you have a community newspaper and you want to involve people in it, I find that once people get involved—there are all kinds of people with journalistic talent, people who have got views about change in that particular community. The paper doesn't stand by itself. At least our paper doesn't. It's a joint effort going hand-in-hand with action, political action, in that community and there are no doubts about it.

People who get involved, I find, like to get out there and write articles and it is sometimes harder for somebody to take to knock on doors, talk to people about the paper. You know, you can talk to people right there on the street. You can involve them. You can start talking to them personally, so the paper becomes a personal thing rather than an impersonal piece of mesmerizing—whatever it is. So that in that way we are working towards that too.

Mr. Hesler: Would you say that distribution with that method is part of what you are trying to do?

Mr. Westley: Yes.

Mr. Hesler: You wouldn't like to see a situation where you could easily distribute your paper on the stands?

Mr. Westley: Oh, I would like to see that very much, but unfortunately where the press has a monopoly in our political activity, it forces the rule very strongly; it is very difficult to do that.

Mr. Hesler: But, if you still could do that, would you still distribute in the street?

Mr. Westley: Oh, yes, I would do everything possible to have personal contact and personal involvement in that paper. Everything possible.

The Chairman: I think it might be useful to talk just a little bit about how you do circulate and distribute the paper.

Mr. McLeod: I would like to just...

The Chairman: Yours is on advertising too, Mr. Johnson, isn't it?

Mr. Johnson: It is partly on advertising.

The Chairman: Why don't you go ahead.

Mr. Johnson: When I took my paper to a distributor who distributes all magazines to the newsstands and they took a look through the paper, the first thing he mentioned was the advertising. I had about two 6" x 4" ads. This is the question he was asking, but I think there is a large trend in the underground press, away from advertising, mostly through the use of the offset press rather than the typeset, linotype or whatever, which reduces the costs tremendously. Circulation alone can pay for the newspapers produced this way once you get a decent circulation. There is this trend in that direction.

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod?

Mr. McLeod: There are two points I want to make about advertising. First of all, I want to say something about the market of the underground press.

Marketing research communicates that an ordinary newspaper would be read by about three people; and so if you have a paper like the Sun which has a circulation of 250,000, their actual readership is 750,000.

A friend of mine from Chicago, who is the editor of Chicago Seed, was in Vancouver just last week and he says that some people have done market research on the underground press and they found that each underground paper was read by between five and ten people and thus there is a larger readership for the number of papers that are printed. So, there is a market there for advertising, but there are two problems with advertising that I see.

One is that we are wary of depending on advertising to support the paper, as that could lead to pressure groups or pressure from the advertisers. We think we would have that problem, I think, if we got more advertising. There are two examples which I mentioned in the brief.

One of the reasons the Vancouver Times failed is because Woodward Stores, the most influential advertiser in B.C. collaborated with the civic press to keep ads out of the Times and so the Times died of financial starvation. It's well known that if Woodward advertises in any paper or in any media that other advertisers will follow without question if they want to reach the people through that media. Another smaller example...

The Chairman: Have you ever approached Woodward's to ask them to advertise in your paper?

Mr. McLeod: A couple of salesmen have and they have been kicked out on their ear literally.

The Chairman: Carry on.

Mr. McLeod: Wednesday, which was a small community newspaper in Vancouver in Kitsilano died because the Kitsilano Ratepay ers Association, which is the local pressure group with head people in that community, canvassed the paper's advertisers and warned them against advertising in the paper. Many of the advertisers dropped out and that caused the paper to collapse. Then there is the example in the underground press of the Helix. Helix is a paper in Seattle which was just about to fold when Columbia started placing ads in the underground press. This is a happy example, and they got the money to survive for that period of time, but if Columbia had decided to drop out at that time or decided not to advertise like they did later, the Helix probably would have folded.

Mr. Hesler: Would you suggest that Columbia might start telling a paper like that what to print?

Mr. McLeod: I think that any advertiser who advertises in the underground press is pretty well aware of the policies of that paper and that as far as I know they don't try—they haven't tried to pressure us. Sometimes advertisers will ask us to print a photo of a band or something—something like that. We do not do that kind of thing. We don't care what they do. Whether they drop out or whether they stay, because we are not that dependent on it.

Mr. Stevens: It is a little more subtle. They do try to exert a little pressure. For instance, when we first got started—well, an individual store started advertising. They usually bought a fairly good-sized ad like a quarter of a page and we got so that we were looking forward to their ad coming in; and then they saw a copy they didn't like. They said if any more of this kind of stuff got in, they wouldn't advertise with us. We just didn't bother going after their ads any more because we didn't believe that they should have that right. If we had built up more dependence on them, we would have folded at that time.

Fortunately, it was only about a quarter of a page. If they had been buying, full pages, that would be paying a third of our costs. We might have had to fold, and so, as I say, the pressure is a little more subtle than just sending a letter to the head office.

Mr. Hesler: The pressure is there all the same.

Mr. Stevens: Yes, don't get the idea that all the advertisers are breathing down our neck, though, to control the paper, because they are not, at least in our case; but, the possibility is there certainly, and this is why we have tried to get away from advertising as much as possible and depend more on the money coming in from circulation because you are never put in the position to have to rely on advertisers to that extent.

The Chairman: How much is your advertising space, can you tell us?

Mr. Stevens: For our paper, considering we only have a thousand per issue, we charge $40 for a full page.

The Chairman: $40 for one full page?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, one full page any place in the paper except for the editorial page. We charge special rates for the back page. A lot of times we will advertise for someone who doesn't pay if we think that it's something good; for example there was a more or less free festival in Oakville in September and we gave them a full page because we felt it was a good idea. And then there was a place for kids to go for the summer. They had a bit of money to throw around. We did it for free because it is a community thing.

The Chairman: Mr. Harris?

Mr. Harris: Columbia has in a way, tried to influence us because they have said they are not going to advertise in the underground papers. They are advertising in music-oriented papers; so that they are saying to underground papers, "If you want Columbia to advertise in your papers, become music-oriented, totally music-oriented". A lot of papers haven't done that. Then you have springing up, especially in the last while, community papers devoted solely to the music market, like the Rolling Stone; it is visibly cutting into the Canadian Market and is subsidized essentially by record companies. If you look at the Rolling Stone, there are ads which used to appear in the underground papers.

The Chairman: You quarrel with that policy? Surely Columbia Records have the right to advertise where they want?

Mr. Harris: Definitely, but again they are saying to the underground papers—"If you want to print that kind of stuff, you can't have our advertising."

The Chairman: And the underground press is in some cases going under to this? Newspapers are starting on entertainment?

Mr. Stevens: They are just getting a little bit more down to a political thing. I don't know, maybe they just want to start a trade journal.

Senator McElman: Mr. Chairman, has Mr. Harris been told that directly by Columbia?

Mr. Harris: That was made clear in the United States, not directly to us, because we have never had a record ad, but this was made clear to the American papers.

Senator McElman: This is what you have learned from them. Has this been published by them?

Mr. Harris: I think that's been published in various underground papers. It's a well known fact. I don't think anybody at Columbia would dispute it. You have papers like Rolling Stone devoted exclusively to rock and roll, and I don't know what its situation is. It's far above any other papers. It's probably as much as all the other papers put together. So you have this entirely new field of journalism springing up.

The Chairman: Are there other questions on advertising? We have had comments from Mr. Anderson on the papers in Winnipeg and Mr. Harris on the papers in Ottawa.

Mr. McLeod: I have one more point.

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. McLeod: The first point was that if our business did depend on advertising as much as some papers do, the pressure groups probably would form to try to put us out of business. The second point is the point of censorship of ads, and a lot of people in the free community believe that certain ads should be censored and should not be allowed to appear and so we have...

The Chairman: Could you give us some examples of ads which—I don't mean you, some of your people or some of your friends may think should be censored?

Mr. McLeod: Well, cigarette ads that come up here and/or ads for any industry that's involved in pollution, or sex ads which are exploiting women that appear in U.S. papers and some of them appear in our own papers. Some people even want to censor all ads entirely. So there is a problem within the community as to which ads should be accepted because if we all basically disagree with the system, why should we support it by advertising it?

The Chairman: Yes, I think that is a pretty important point.

Mr. McLeod: It's a very basic problem, and I don't say that I have the solution to it, but it's a problem that we all are going to have to deal with in the future.

The Chairman: And perhaps the way you are dealing with it in sort of an ad hoc way is by not concerning yourselves with national advertising.

Mr. McLeod: Well, we are going after national advertising. They have approached us, and we are also going after some, but I think it's mainly in the field of the record industry, but at the same time, we are trying to expose what we call the rip-off, of our culture by the music industry, the use of musicians in rock groups, to sell records, at the same time suppressing the message which the groups are trying to present, and there are numerous examples.

The Chairman: Could you give us one?

Mr. McLeod: Well, the Jefferson Airplane wanted to put out an album called "Volunteers of Amerika", spelled with a "K" in America, A.M.E.R.I.K.A. which is, you know, the connotation of the fascist America. They wanted to censor that and they finally just called the album, "Volunteers"; they wanted to censor the lyrics as there are certain words they found offensive, and it took months to get this album out, but they finally got it out. This is a major victory for a rock group, to get an album through like this. In the past, albums like that wouldn't even have been considered; so, the pressure for change is being brought to bear upon these companies.

The Chairman: I think the question I was going to ask I will perhaps ask after lunch.

I would like to instead come to another point which relates to you, Mr. Anderson. As to the article I mentioned by Mr. Chris Clifford, I must apologize—Mr. Spears has corrected me—Mr. Clifford as a Special Correspondent. The Citizen is a Southam paper and not a member of F. P. Publications, so presumably if it appeared at all in Winnipeg, it appeared in the Tribune. Presumably it didn't, but for the record, it was in Southam rather than F. P. Publications that we saw it.

He said, after he had discussed your success, which we have discussed—

"And with this success come larger dreams. Mr. Anderson hopes some day to establish an underground radio station in the already overcrowded radio scene in Winnipeg"

And then he quotes you as saying that:

"radio statinos here are just like the newspapers. They are all run by an establishment, with one aim: to make money. And they're just poisoning our minds with the garbage they're putting out."

And it asks how would you finance a new radio station? You said:

"By private subscriptions from interested people to the tune of an average of $10 a year. 'Surely there are 5,000 people in Winnipeg who would support us.'"

Then you say that "the difficulty would not be in getting the capital to establish a station; but it would be in getting a licence." Then you are quoted as saying: "That's dipping into the arena of politics, but we sure would like to get that radio station".

The question I would like to put to you is, assuming your dip into politics was successful, and assuming you got a licence to start a radio station in Winnipeg, how would you programme it?

Mr. Anderson: Well, the people involved, and myself thought there would be six hours of public affairs and six hours of music; we would be on the air twelve hours a day. We thought we would be on the air from perhaps 7.30 in the morning, probably to 12.00 or 1.30 or something like that in the afternoon, come on again during the supper hour and then finally from seven o'clock until one with uninterrupted music. That was what we would be thinking in those terms.

The Chairman: Would the public affairs programmes?

Mr. Anderson: Oh, well, we would have panel discussions, we would be discussing politics. We would be discussing what's in the news. Oh, it just seems endless. It seems to be a problem of getting public affairs covered.

The Chairman: Would the public affairs programming reflect your bias or would it attempt to be objective?

Mr. Anderson: No, it would reflect the bias of the underground press' period. It would certainly.

The Chairman: I wasn't being funny.

21474-3

Mr. Anderson: We would certainly take a stand against the establishment, no question about it.

The Chairman: For example, on public affairs, presumably you would deal with political matters, or would you?

Mr. Anderson: Well, yes.

The Chairman: You might report the Legislature in Manitoba?

Mr. Anderson: Or something like that.

The Chairman: Would you report as objectively as you could the position of the opposition?

Mr. Anderson: Oh, certainly.

The Chairman: What kind of music would you programme?

Mr. Harris: How does this apply to the freedom of the press? I don't understand why we are talking about a radio station in Winnipeg.

The Chairman: The answer to that is that the Committee's terms of reference, and that's all we have to work within, are the ownership and control, the impact and the influence of the mass media in Canada, and I think you would agree with me that radio in Winnipeg falls within the ambit of the Committee's jurisdiction.

Mr. Anderson is here as a representative of his newspaper and he is quoted as saying he would like to start an underground radio station. I would like to know what an underground radio station is; and then I would like to ask you another question about the reference to underground television. I think it's very relevant. I am sorry you don't agree.

Mr. Harris: I sort of think it's a matter of programming, not to present this theoretical underground radio station.

Mr. Cain: It's conjectural.

Mr. Harris: If you want to find out about it, listen to WBAI in New York.

The Chairman: Well, I am sorry but I don't know that station. I don't know where it is on the dial. Can you get that in Ottawa?

Mr. Harris: No, you can't.

The Chairman: Well, you are suggesting I should listen to a station I can't get. Perhaps you could tell us about it.

Mr. Harris: Well, if you are really interested in underground radio, there is a whole network in the United States.

The Chairman: Can you hear it in Ottawa?

Mr. Harris: No, it isn't. I am worried about wasting my time.

The Chairman: I am sorry but it is my intention to pursue this line of questioning. I hope you will stay. If you feel you are wasting your time, you are perfectly free to leave. I hope you don't. If you feel you are wasting your time, then I suggest that that's what you should do. I hope that you will stay.

Mr. Harris: Okay, I still think there are more important questions to be discussed.

The Chairman: Well, we are going to be adjourning in a few minutes for lunch. We are coming back this afternoon. I agree there are other questions to discuss and we will be coming on to this.

Mr. Harris: Okay.

The Chairman: Is that okay?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

The Chairman: Okay, thank you.

Now, I was asking Mr. Anderson what kind of music he would programme.

Mr. Anderson: We have done some talking about that and we have thought probably there would be rock music, classical music, but the subscribers would be given a list of all the music that would be played the following month. Each month the subscriber would get it. And so that he could tune in and hear what he wants to hear. As I say, it's all up in the air.

The Chairman: Well, as Mr. Harris points out, it is an academic consideration, but I think that it has considerable validity before the Committee and I would like perhaps to come from that to a question I have put to Mr. Wetzel.

I was going to ask you to comment on the newspapers in Toronto. I still can do that after lunch, but right now I would be interested in the comments you might make on the radio stations in Toronto. There are, I guess, six private stations and two CBC stations?

Mr. Wetzel: In Toronto, there is a person, Kim Calloway who has personally set up a subscription radio station. He was a former disk jockey on CHUM-FM. He is trying to get the backing to set up a subscription radio station—in Ottawa...

The Chairman: You may not be able to answer this and I appreciate that if you can't, but the people who purchase Harbinger, presumably sometimes listen to radio in Toronto. Do they listen to radio, and what stations do they listen to, if they do?

Mr. Wetzel: CHUM-AM.

The Chairman: CHUM-AM?

Mr. Wetzel: And CKFH.

The Chairman: How about CHUM-FM?

Mr. Wetzel: CHUM-FM supposedly only has about 50,000 listeners. It is very small compared to CHUM-AM.

Mr. Westley: But of lot of people don't listen to the radio stations.

The Chairman: Mr. Westley?

Mr. Westley: But a lot of people don't you would like to see on a radio station.

The Chairman: Well, I think—the answer to that question might possibly be something which would be ultimately in the report which we hope to produce. I have some views.

Mr. Cain: We would not be able to have a dialogue going until views are passed around, in other words, till you answer questions like that, we will not be able to discuss what we are talking about. We are talking politicians' lingo and we are not getting anywhere.

The Chairman: Well, that's your judgment. I think we are. I think we are beginning to understand some of the things. Personally to me so far at least it's been valuable in terms of understanding you. I am sorry it hasn't been as helpful to you in understanding me. As far as the question that's been put to me by Mr. Wesley, I honestly don't know the answer to that. I listen to radio a lot, frankly, I listen mostly to CBC, but I listen to private stations as well. I listen to CKFH, to CHUM-AM, as apparently do the people who read the Harbinger. I listen to the St. Catherine radio stations, both of which come in Toronto. I have listened to the so-called underground radio network which my friend from Ottawa have been discussing.

Mr. Harris: If you want information, this is the place to do it. If you want to understand this, we should do something very informal, and if you want to understand, I really do see how this information will say anything. If you want to find out anything about the freedom of the press, what we are up-tight about, we will give it to you, but I don't think anybody is going to understand me today.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Harris, I am sorry that you feel inhibited.

Mr. Cain: Our limits are larger.

The Chairman: I am sorry that you find that. This is the hearing format that we have employed with all of the mass media.

Mr. Wetzel: Yes, but we are not part of that mass media. We are an alternative to that mass media.

The Chairman: You asked me a question. I will answer it. I read your papers, but in terms of the question which was put to me by Mr. Westley, which is how would I programme a radio station, I honestly don't know. The reason I put the question to Mr. Anderson is that he is quoted as having considered the establishment of an underground radio station. I did not put that question to Mr. Cain or to you Mr. Wetzel, because to the best of my knowledge it is not your intention to form an underground radio station, but I think Mr. Anderson has talked about it. I think it's perfectly valid.

Mr. Westley: I think everybody should form an underground radio station. I think that in the future you are going to see some radio men told that they aren't going to require a licence, and I think that is going to be a very useful way of putting across a lot of the ideas that are stamped upon by the establishment. You can't operate the bourgeois radio station or the bourgeois television station so we will have to do our own.

The Chairman: So, when you say, "bourgeois radio stations" do you include, presumably, all the private stations in Canada?

Mr. Westley: Well, I don't know. I can't listen to all the private stations in Canada.

Mr. Harris: There is not a radio station in Canada that is not bourgeois.

The Chairman: Do you include the CBC in that?

Mr. Westley: I don't know. I sort of like the CBC at times. They are cutting back on all their stuff because of the austerity thing, but I think it's pretty good, you know.

The Chairman: Mr. O'Hara?

Mr. O'Hara: I tend to agree with Dave that it's irrelevant to talk about the counter-media, only in terms of counter-newspapers, although that's probably the kind of media that we are most familiar with, but there are the other kinds of counter-media too. The necessity for counter-media is becoming more and more obvious, and the attempts at different kinds of counter-media are becoming more and more diversified, and I think that the power, for example, of a counter-radio station can be seen when we look at what happened in Czechoslovakia when Stalinists came in. Whole radio stations, you know, all the necessary translating equipment was taken underground and they would go ahead and translate for six hours, and then they would pack it up and then they would translate again, and they kept people informed of what was really happening and countered the propaganda for a long time that way. The same thing happened in France in May of '68 and I think that when we look at the kind of things, the influence that those things had, perhaps would put our increasing efforts here into some kind of perspective.

The Chairman: Mr. Harris was mentioning the station in New York, which is called...

Mr. Harris: WBAI.

The Chairman: What city is that in?

Senator Kinnear: It's hard to hear down here.

The Chairman: The station in New York is WBAI, and I was going to ask is that an FM station?

Mr. Harris: It is subscription supported. There is a whole network in the States of ten or twelve FM stations.

The Chairman: Well, I am sorry. I was handed a note and I am sorry I didn't hear your answer.

Mr. Harris: I was just saying that there is a network of FM subscription supported stations in the States that don't exist up here.

The Chairman: This is an FM station, is it?

Mr. Harris: Yes, it would be nice to have them here.

The Chairman: How many of these stations in that network are there?

Mr. Harris: I think there is ten or twelve.

The Chairman: Do you know who owns the network?

Mr. Harris: It is completely subscription.

The Chairman: Totally?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

The Chairman: It is in ten or twelve cities?

Mr. Harris: To my knowledge, yes.

The Chairman: What kind of music does it play? Rock?

Mr. Harris: I don't think it is limited to anything.

The Chairman: Well, there are many other things which I know we want to discuss, but I am now going to suggest that we adjourn for luncheon. The Committee will again meet the representatives of the underground press at 2.30. Thank you.

The Committee adjourned at 12.40 p.m.

The Committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Chairman: Honourable Senators, if I may call the session to order. I think it is perhaps important to realize and again to underline something I said this morning, and perhaps it deserves repeated emphasis at this time and that is that we are really not here to study the underground press except as it relates to its role and function as part of the overall spectrum of Canadian mass media. We are interested certainly in the underground press but we are interested also in the role of the underground press in the overall media picture.

I think perhaps we will begin the questioning this afternoon with Mr. Hesler.

Mr. Hesler: Senator Davey, I have one very short question which will perhaps require a very long answer that I am going to direct to Mr. John Laxton. It is a point which we have discussed today and yesterday evening.

Mr. Laxton, I come from Montreal and I know that the sidewalks in Montreal are very crowded. We have a municipal bylaw there empowering the police to clear the sidewalks of people who are cluttering them up. By a strange coincidence, the only people in the past few years, who have been the object of this bylaw, have been the vendors of Logos. I am wondering whether the prosecutions which have just been maintained by the Quebec Superior Court on review—I am wondering whether these prosecutions were designed to clear the sidewalks or to clear out Logos. I think I know the answer but I am going to ask you to relate your experiences with regard to the use and abuse of local municipal ordinances of this nature and then perhaps of the Federal Statutes such as the laws on obscenity.

Mr. John Laxton: Well, I think the authorities in Vancouver have been a little bit more subtle perhaps than the authorities in Quebec. In any event, they certainly have not been limited to using bylaw infractions as a method of attempting to suppress the Georgia Straight. Just about every law in the book, at one time or another, has been used to quieten the voice of the Georgia Straight and we have complained on a number of occasions in court and publicly about the abuse of the powers of various authorities in British Columbia.

Mr. Hesler: Has any of these complaints been successful?

Mr. Laxton: Yes. The tide turned recently; we were successful in having the Georgia Straight acquitted on three counts of obscenity and in the course of making our defence, we suggested that the laying of at least one of the charges constituted an abuse of the judicial process. One of the charges of obscenity that was laid as the result of a cartoon of a dog urinating against a fire hydrant; we went into court and said that there is no way under the laws of Canada that this could constitute obscenity. The judge agreed and dismissed the charge. We went on to say that the laying of such an obviously frivolous, vexatious, serious charge constituted an abuse of the power of the authorities laying the charge.

Now, our claim in that regard was not dealt with because the judge felt it was sufficient for him to dismiss the case on the merits but the judge did go on to say, and I quote his exact words: "That it was a mystery to him why the Georgia Straight is constantly singled out for prosecution." That was a remark by the judge as picked up by the local paper and I believe I have already mentioned that they expressed editorial comment favourable to the Georgia Straight and asking the same question that the judge had asked: "Why was the Georgia Straight being constantly singled out for prosecution."

The only response we got from the authorities—in this case it was the prosecutors' office—was their bringing of an appeal from the acquittal. The appeal is significant in that one of the grounds alleged by the Crown in the appeal was that the judge was biased against the Crown; biased in favour of the Georgia Straight. This caused a great deal of laughter in legal circles in Vancouver for the obvious reason that it seemed inconceivable that any provincial court judge would be biased in favour of the Georgia Straight, especially due to the fact that it was the judge who three or four months previously had found the Georgia Straight guilty of a criminal libel and had fined them a rather heavy $1,500; so the Crown appeared somewhat desperate in bringing this appeal.

The appeal came up for hearing and we were again successful. Again, we alleged that the Crown was abusing its process by firstly laying the stupid charges in the beginning which had no merit, and the Court agreed they had no merit; and secondly by now alleging an obviously frivolous and vexatious ground of bias, the bias being because the judge had said it was a mystery to him why the Georgia Straight was constantly being singled out and that in law, that could not constitute bias. That was not really in controversy and I am sure all lawyers here and all the lawyers in Vancouver, except those employed by the prosecutor's office, agreed that that could not constitute bias.

The appeal court judge found that it didn't constitute bias and said that there was absolutely no grounds for the Crown bringing this charge whatsoever. Now, the appeal court judge had dismissed the case on the merits; he said there was no obscenity but left the whole question of abuse of process open.

In other words, the Georgia Straight is in this position that if the Crown lays any more frivolous charges then we can continue to press our arguments on the abuse of the process and we hope next time it will be successful; if that happens then I think we have made a very important step forward in establishing civil rights in the Province of British Columbia.

I think perhaps the case is of importance, not only in the Province because it is an application of the law under the Criminal Code. It is applicable to the whole country. In our brief which I think has not been circulated, I would like to refer more specifically to the charges that we make.

The Chairman: Have you got a copy of that brief?

Mr. Laxton: Yes.

Mr. Hesler: Mr. Laxton, before you go on, here is one thing that I wanted to emphasize in my question so at least at this particular juncture, we can confine remarks to one specific point. What I am interested in is not the number of charges that were enumerated against the paper—in other words, how much trouble you have had with the law in Vancouver, but more specifically concrete instances of the use of laws, whether they be municipal or federal for purposes for which they were not designed. In other words, the use of obscenity laws not to stamp out obscenity but to stamp out a newspaper.

Mr. Laxton: Yes, I appreciate your point.

Mr. Hesler: Have you ever in your experience with this problem, encountered a definite statement or admission on the part of the authorities in Vancouver that this was their intention?

Mr. Laxton: Well, I wouldn't say that we have ever had an admission—certainly not from the prosecutor's office or from any person in that area of the administration of law. The mayor of Vancouver has from time to time made some very undiplomatic statements from his point of view.

Mr. Hesler: What has he said?

Mr. Laxton: Well, he has said that he is going to put the Georgia Straight out of business no matter what, and he stated under oath, and I believe we have somewhere a transcript of his statement, and he went on television some time and he has been in the newspapers every day making the same kind of statements. The effect of these statements was that he was searching every avenue for a way to put the Georgia Straight out of business. This was before any obscenity charges had even been laid and Mayor Campbell decided that the paper was filthy and he was going to see to it that it was put out of business.

However, he would not, at that time bring any charges of obscenity which could be tested in the Criminal Court because there was literally nothing in the paper that could constitute obscenity at criminal law, so he was really at a dead end in that regard. He couldn't even get the prosecutor's staff to go along with the laying of even a frivolous charge in those days.

Consequently, he made a statement to the press saying that perhaps he thought he could find a bylaw and charge them under that. As the Mayor he could sit as the Magistrate and judge the case. He actually went on television and admitted that he considered laying charges and then sitting as the judge in the case. The Chief City Prosecutor advised him that such a procedure would not be very wise on his part and he was discouraged from doing that.

The paper has in fact been involved in a Supreme Court lawsuit in which the Mayor was named as a defendant. The lawsuit was partially successful to the Georgia Straight in that the Court declared the actions of the Licensing Inspector, who was operating under the instructions of the Mayor, as completely illegal in suspending the Georgia Straight's business licence. The judge found that as a result of the illegal action of these civic officials the Georgia Straight's circulation had been severely curtailed and that it had lost a considerable amount of money. But the Court went on to find that even though a civic official had acted illegally, and even though his illegal act caused considerable financial loss to the paper, the paper could not recover that damage against the official on the ground that an official is protected if he is acting in good faith and honestly. We couldn't say that he wasn't prosecuting the Georgia Straight in good faith and honestly. We couldn't prove that. We were left without a remedy even though we had proved that the civic authority had acted illegally.

If you just glance at page 2 and 3 of our brief you can see the way in which we say the law has been applied unfairly against the Georgia Straight. We are not merely documenting the number of cases, we are attempting to point out the subtle way in which the law has been manipulated against the Georgia Straight in a discriminatory fashion. We say, if I could just read the bottom paragraph...

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Laxton:

"The Georgia Straight has been subjected to constant severe economic and 'legal' harassment. The 'legal' harassment has been initiated by the police, prosecutors, and civic officials and has taken the following forms:

The laying of so many charges that one Provincial Court Judge was recently prompted to remark, 'that it was a mystery to him why the Georgia Straight is constantly singled out for prosecution'."

You will see in Appendix "A" that we have set up the whole of the chronology of the harassment of the Georgia Straight.

"(2) The laying of obscure or unusual charges such as 'criminal libel' and 'counselling the growing of marijuana'."

Now, until the Georgia Straight had been charged with criminal libel eighteen months ago, there had only been four cases of criminal libel in the history of Canada that were reported and were of any significance. The last charge was in 1938 when the Social Credit Party published a pamphlet against the bankers of Calgary calling them "creepy, crawly things, toads, snails, which should be exterminated." They were charged with criminal libel and they were convicted. That was the last major case of criminal libel.

"Counselling the growing of marijuana" was another case that was an extremely odd case because accounts of how to grow marijuana had appeared in almost every magazine—not every magazine but almost every magazine. Time Magazine, Maclean's Magazine had stories on how to grow marijuana. The Georgia Straight had a story on how to grow marijuana—which incidentally I don't think would work in British Columbia because of the climatic conditions—but there was a story. It wasn't clear whether it was genuine advice, that is if you followed it whether you would actually produce the marijuana plant but for publishing the statement as to how marijuana was grown they were charged with the obscure offence of counselling the growing of marijuana and were convicted and fined $2,000 plus legal fees.

"(3) The laying of charges out of minor and insignificant statements tucked away in the less obvious parts of the paper."

For example, one of the obscenity charges concerned a two-line advertisement that was hidden away in the personal column at the back of the paper and the personal column of the Georgia Straight as you can see is in very small print and it has hundreds and hundreds of personal advertisements. That was a charge which also was dismissed but it is obvious that somebody is sitting down and reading every part of the Georgia Straight. There must be some civic official who spends all of his time scrutinizing the Georgia Straight from cover to cover or else he wouldn't find these little offences tucked away.

"(4) Constant use of the 'arrest procedure' rather than 'summons procedure'—although the Georgia Straight has never failed to appear in court and always retains the same legal counsel who is well known to prosecutors and police alike as the Georgia Straight Counsel."

In other words, the Crown if they wanted to lay these charges could use the summons procedure—you know, the blue paper in the mail or delivered and turn up in court one week later. Every time the police come and make an arrest there is a hassle; sometimes it is at an inconvenient hour in the night and the people have to go down to jail and they have to post bail and it is the same procedure over and over again even though when we come to Court we often make many admissions that help the Crown prove its case because we have always taken the view that we want to defend on the merits of the case rather than on legal technicalities. We have to be hassled this way every time.

"(5) Frequent seizure of large quantities of papers often illegally and frequent searches of Georgia Straight premises and staff members.

(6) Use of the indictment procedure in obscenity cases resulting in fines, possible gaol sentences and criminal record rather than procedure under section 150A of the Criminal Code which allows merely for determination by the courts of the question of obscenity with confiscation the only result without other sanction or penalty."

Now, all of the leading cases in Canada on obscenity, in all of those cases the procedure has been followed where the court has been merely asked to determine whether the word, the book, or what have you was obscene but with the Georgia Straight they lay a charge which results with Dan McLeod having a long record with fines and so on, so that there is a special procedure being used for the Georgia Straight unlike anybody else who is charged with the same offence.

"(7) The frequent use of 'breach of the peace' charges against Georgia Straight reporters if they attend public functions or incidents to report them."

A number of those charges have been laid and some of them have been acquitted and it usually happens when a policeman is attending a meeting and a Georgia Straight reporter is there and when the policeman asks the Georgia Straight reporter to move on and he says "I am here on behalf of the Georgia Straight covering a story and I would like to stay here with the other press" and the policeman promptly arrests him for refusing to leave the scene and the charge that they use is breach of the peace.

"(8) By police and prosecutor threats of prosecution against the Straight's printers if they did not cease printing the newspaper."

"(9) By civic authorities suspending business license (Vancouver) or refusing to grant a business license (other Municipalities in British Columbia.)".

So far every municipality in the Province has refused to grant a business licence to the Georgia Straight.

"(10) By civic authorities having the police arrest and, seize papers of, street vendors for alleged breaches of by-laws. Most of which cases were dropped without prosecution."

In Appendix "A" you will notice we have given specific instances of vendors being arrested, their papers seized, being sentenced to jail and sometimes being held there for days at a time and then either no charge has been laid or the charge has been dropped. The reason the charge is not laid or dropped is because the by-laws under which the police purported to act were never intended for that purpose and when it became clear that they couldn't be used for that purpose, the charges were dropped but not until after someone had spent several days in jail.

Now, we point out a complete résumé of our legal troubles which is set out in the Appendix and I hope the Committee would do us the courtesy of studying that Appendix because I think it says a lot for the way the criminal law is being administered in this country and certainly they are not being administered fairly.

Mr. Hesler: May I interrupt on one point. While we are discussing the little usage of accusations, I understand that one of the experiences of a Logos in Montreal has been to be accused of the crime of spreading false news which in itself is rather an unusual accusation and one which has been invoked extremely rarely. I would ask you to comment on that accusation. Have you ever been threatened with proceedings under that?

Mr. Laxton: No, we haven't seen that one yet and I would like you not to speak too loudly because they might get wind of it, but if such a charge was laid then I would think that there isn't a paper in this country that couldn't be found guilty at some time or other of publishing false news. If that is the latest trend, I am sure it will become fashionable in Vancouver in the very near future. So far it hasn't hit us.

Mr. Hesler: In the course of these experiences with the use or the misuse of various laws, have you found that it was the law that was at fault or the people who administered the law?

Mr. Laxton: Well, our complaint is twofold. Firstly we say that the laws themselves are bad and when I say the laws, I am really referring to the criminal libel laws which are completely anachronistic.

In the United States they have declared criminal libel unconstitutional. In Britain it is almost unheard of and it is only in Canada that we preserve this old-fashion remedy which arose at the time of the Star Chambers in England as an alternative to the breaches of peace that were being created by duelling. The government at the time thought that if people could find relief in the court, they wouldn't duel as much and that was the basis for the criminal libel laws. Duelling doesn't seem to be much of a phenomenon today in Canada except in the House of Commons, but certainly we don't see much of it in Vancouver.

Mr. Hesler: Perhaps when you say that the use of criminal libel laws is limited you are referring to cases that have been reported. It may be very difficult to determine how many actual cases of criminal libel are made in various parts of Canada in the course of one year.

On page 6 of your brief in the very last paragraph you say:

"If a person's reputation is damaged then the remedy of an action for civil libel should be sufficient."

Now, you have just complained that the use of criminal libel brought against you had caused you a great deal of legal expense; that this in itself is a severe penalty. Isn't it true that for instance if you were to publish a damaging statement about myself in your client's publication and if you were suggesting that I exercise my recourse before the Civil Court aren't you also suggesting that in order to protect myself, in order to recover my damages, I would have to go to a great deal of legal expense as well? The penal accusation in a sense is free to me in order to protect myself but to take a newspaper to court if I am a private citizen is...

Mr. Laxton: Well, if you are successful, Mr. Hesler—I know you are asking me to give the answer but you already know. If you were successful in a civil lawsuit you will win damages and you will win costs so it won't cost you anything and you may make a profit out of the loss of your reputation if you had any to lose.

Mr. Hesler: Well, another question on the same point. Given the amount of damages which people can recover in this country for libel and given the natural resources of a successful newspaper, is this recourse really sufficient to protect the individual. Would a $10,000 condemnation against your newspaper really protect me from a second attack and isn't the most effective means a criminal charge?

Mr. Laxton: Well, I don't think so and neither does the Supreme Court of the United States, nor does the Privy Council in Britain, nor the House of Lords in Britain and I think that your civil remedy is completely adequate. If we libelled you a second time and you could come against us the second time for even more damages but it remains a private dispute between you and the Georgia Straight or whoever it is who is attacking your reputation. We need not involve the state; we need not involve criminal sanctions. It is essentially a private dispute between two people.

Mr. Hesler: When you speak of libel dispute between two people do you make any distinction between the person who is libelled in his capacity as a public servant such as a magistrate or police officer or mayor and the person who is libelled but has no official capacity. Don't you think the latter person the private individual should have some guarantee of protection that perhaps the person in the public limelight does not require?

Mr. Laxton: Well, I don't see that there need be any distinction in the law between statements made against a public person as opposed to private persons. The Georgia Straight, when it was convicted of criminal libel, was convicted because of remarks made about a judge. I think that the right to speak out against public officials is even more important a right to protect than the right to speak out against private individuals.

Mr. Hesler: That's what I was asking, yes.

Mr. Laxton: You see it is the institutions of government that have to be curtailed and the only method of curtailment in a democracy is by the use of freedom of speech and by having a truly courageous free press. The Supreme Court in the United States recently declared criminal libel unconstitutional; the case involved Garrison who was the attorney in New Orleans who attempted to prosecute various people for the Kennedy conspiracy which he alleged. Garrison had said that the judges in Louisiana were associated with the Mafia and were thugs and were making a racket out of various things; this is a much stronger statement than has ever been made in this country about anybody. Yet the Supreme Court of the United States said, and I am quoting from the judgment:

"Debate on public issues should be uninhibited, robust and wide-open and may well include vehement, caustic and sometimes unpleasantly sharp attacks on the government and public officials."

The Privy Council in England has said insofar as attacks on judges are concerned—and I quote again—this is a case in 1899,—it is not a new doctrine in Britain where the traditions of democracy run very deep, and they say:

"Courts are satisfied to leave to public opinion attacks or comments derogatory or scandalous to them."

The courts in Britain have discouraged the use of either contempt proceedings or criminal libel proceedings for statements made against judges.

Now, if I may digress for one second and just refer to the article that was written about this judge and make a few comments about that—I think perhaps you will understand this particular offence in true perspective. I would like to point out something that is very significant. The statement that was made against this judge was contained in the information which charged the individual involved. The Vancouver newspapers, both the Province and the Sun with a circulation between them of over 300,000, printed the information which contained the whole of the libel and yet for circulating the same libel, perhaps to 300,000 readers, no charges could be laid. Whereas the Georgia Straight for circulating this same libel to approximately 20,000 readers was fined $1,500. I will read you a part of it. It is by Bob Cummings and is entitled: The Straight Awards O.A.F. (O.A.F. award stands for Order of Abundant Flatulence.)

The awards will be bestowed in several categories so as to properly recognize each facet of distinguished ineptitude. Each division will bear the name of an outstanding historical personage whose deeds, words and reputation have besmirched his chosen field. In this way the mistakes of today will be a living memorial to the blunders of history. No lesser honour could any man bear.

The selection of the award winners in this founding year was extremely difficult due to the uncommon fertility of idiocy in the city. Many who deserved recognition had to be passed over in favour of those of truly outstanding merit.

The Selections Committee makes no apologies and commands to your attention the 1968 recipient of the Order of the Abundant Flatulence, Magistrate Lawrence Eckhardt—the Pontius Pilate Certificate Of Justice, (unfairly maligned by critics, Pilate upheld the highest traditions of a judge by placing law and order above human considerations and by helping to clear the streets of Jerusalem of degenerate non-conformists.)"

The citation reads;

"To Lawrence Eckhardt, who by closing his mind to justice, his eyes to fairness, and his ears to equality, has encouraged the belief that the law is not only blind but also deaf, dumb and stupid. LET HISTORY JUDGE YOUR ACTIONS—then appeal."

Now, if I can just briefly tell you what that award arose out of. It concerned a decision by this Magistrate that certain people who were standing in front of the Court House fountain, which is a new minor memorial built by the wonderful Social Credit Government in British Columbia—were guilty of transgressing a regulation under the Public Works Act, that clearly did not have the purpose in mind of removing people from looking at a public monument. The judge in his judgment had said that the law is stupid and absurd because it means that anybody, even a tourist who stands looking at the fountain would be charged with this offence—therefore he said he was going to convict these people only because some of them have unusual forms of dress. He actually made it quite clear in his judgment and made no apologies for it that he was applying this particular law in a discriminatory fashion.

Now, for that he received this award and for giving him the award, the Georgia Straight received a conviction. Now, since that time—and we are not concerned really about this judge except insofar as this example of abuse of process is of some interest to you. This same judge has given four times the maximum for a vagrancy offence. A Hungarian immigrant received two years for being a vagrant even though the maximum was 6 months and when it was pointed out to him that he could only give 6 months he “regretfully” as he said changed it to 6 months.

We had printed the whole of the transcript of that proceeding and if you read it you will see that at no time did this Hungarian immigrant, who did not understand the language—at no time did he ever plead innocent or guilty because he was never given a chance. He was merely asked if he was ready to proceed and he said no because his witness was sick in the hospital; and the judge said “Well I am not going to give you any more adjournments” and went on to convict him even though he hadn’t even pleaded guilty.

Mr. Hesler: But, Mr. Laxton, surely there are many more points...

Mr. Laxton: Well, may I just finish the point. I realize I am belabouring it but the point that we are making is surely there has to be uninhibited robust criticism of that kind of judicial incompetence and the authorities should not use the laws to repress fair and honest criticism of our institutions where criticism is obviously well placed.

It is clear that the newspapers in Vancouver are not adopting the role of being the guardian of the rights of people and when the Georgia Straight attempted to do it, it was severely repressed by this charge. That is really why the Georgia Straight came to these hearings—because it felt that there should be another forum besides the courts in Vancouver for expressing this point of view that the laws are being applied unfairly and in a discriminatory fashion. We would like this Committee to make some recommendations in that regard so that perhaps other authorities in this country would listen to the wisdom and authority of this Committee in the way the laws are being applied. That is our earnest request that in the Committee’s report you make some reference to the fact that the law is being applied unfairly and in a discriminatory fashion and calling upon the authorities to exercise caution and fairness.

Mr. Hesler: In the context of that position which you have set forth in a well-illustrated manner, I would like to clarify this one point. If you deny the right of the state to exercise controls over a publication such as the Georgia Straight, do you advocate that the publication itself exercise control over its own activities or should collectively the underground press institute some form of control over what it does? When I ask this, I am asking the question when you say uninhibited do you mean completely uninhibited or are there some limits to what you would like to be able to do?

Mr. Laxton: Well, this raises another problem which I think you are alluding to and that is the whole question of censorship generally. It is our view that censorship does not serve a good purpose but on the contrary helps to stifle what otherwise might be good influences. Surely the Georgia Straight as with all the other underground newspapers—they exercise a certain degree of self-censorship. I think this will continue even if censorship was completely outlawed, even if the obscenity laws were taken off the books, and even if the criminal libel laws were taken off the books. I think the Georgia Straight and other responsible underground papers would still exercise some self-censorship but there is no need for penal sanctions. These matters could be left to individual responsibility.

The Chairman: Could you describe this self-censorship? How does it work—by the editor himself?

Mr. Laxton: Well, it depends on each paper I would think.

The Chairman: Well, let us talk about the Georgia Straight.

Mr. Laxton: Well, maybe you should ask Dan McLeod.

The Chairman: Mr. McLeod, how does this self-censorship work?

Mr. Dan McLeod: Do you mean do we think that there are certain things that we should censor?

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Laxton says you do. He says that there is a process of self-censorship at the Georgia Straight.

Mr. McLeod: Yes.

The Chairman: How does that work? What things do you censor?

Mr. Dan McLeod: Well, specifically, things that we have been prosecuted for. Material on sex for example. In the courts we have been prosecuted for material on sex and marijuana.

The Chairman: Well, let me put a question to Mr. Laxton. You say at page 6, as I read your recommendations, you say that the Criminal Code should be amended by the complete repeal of the obscenity provisions.

Mr. Laxton: Right.

The Chairman: Assuming that that repeal took place, would there be any self-censorship in this area?

Mr. Laxton: Yes I think so. I point out somewhere in the brief that I think that censorship, self-imposed censorship is likely to continue for a long time because censorship has to do with etiquette, what is nice and what is not nice—in the sense that I think people will probably for a long time to come still lock the bathroom door when they go in. I think that women on buses will cross their legs rather than expose themselves. I think that people left to their own devices will not necessarily—will rarely act in an obscene fashion.

What we are saying is that if you leave the people alone they will behave responsibly and decently towards each other with some understanding and some sympathy towards other people's position.

We all live very close together, we all have to get along and most of the rules of behaviour that have been devised, are rules that have been devised to help people get along with each other. I think that these same rules can apply in the newspaper business and they will apply because people will prefer to lock doors to bathrooms rather than to do it in the street.

In the same way, the Georgia Straight will prefer not to be unduly obscene if it doesn't make a point rather than to expose themselves to the street if you like.

Mr. Dan McLeod: If we were to go around calling names all over the place it would damage our own credibility to our readers. We would have to act in some kind of a responsible fashion.

Mr. Hesler: This is a point Mr. McLeod that I would like to explore a little bit. Professor Anderson will correct me if I am being inaccurate but he has been quoted as saying—this is a quote from the Ottawa Citizen in December—that the underground papers have to be obscene in an attempt to shock but they have lost their impact as a result. I would like your reaction to that because I think that is perhaps what you have just said. Isn't it true that in order to communicate, you have to be a little bit more subtle than total uninhibitedness will allow you to be?

Mr. McLeod: Yes. The papers that shock are obvious. They are on every news stand in the country and they aren't suppressed at all. You know, once in a while there is a charge against them but they are in every grocery store.

The Chairman: It isn't the underground press?

Mr. McLeod: Not the underground press.

Mr. Hesler: Could you give us your views on exactly that kind of press. What do you think for example of a publication such as Midnight? What category would you put that into? Is that the underground press?

Mr. McLeod: No. It is another enterprise, capitalistic enterprise. I don't think it is truly interested in sexual liberation.

Mr. Harris: What does it believe in? There are many things. I wouldn't suppress their freedom to publish.

The Chairman: Mr. Harris asked you, if I heard him correctly, how does that differ from your paper?

Mr. Harris: Yes. You seem to be putting down Midnight because it is capitalist. Well, aren't we all capitalistic?

Mr. McLeod: Well, they are also violent and violence and sex go hand in hand. I am not putting them down to say like they should be suppressed or anything. I don't think they are in the same category as the underground press.

Mr. O'Hara: The dichotomy between what gets prosecuted and what doesn't—you don't even have to go to something as obvious as Midnight or News of the World or what have you. You look at a good centrefold in Time and Life Magazine and look at some of the ads for various deodorants and then at the definition of what obscenity is, which is dealt with in the terms of the exploitation of sex, and the definition is very, very clear in what sense that exploitation is being made. The contrast is very obvious I would think.

Mr. Hesler: Are you able to say that there is no element at all of exploitation into reporting, study or writing of sex in your publication?

Mr. McLeod: No.

Mr. Laxton: No, not at all. That has been decided by the Court of Appeal just recently insofar as the Georgia Straight is concerned. Both the Trial Court judge and the Appeal Court judge said quite categorically that looked at as a whole there was no exploitation of sex in the Georgia Straight.

The Chairman: I wonder if Professor Anderson would care to comment on the statement you have just read. I don't think he has it in front of him.

Professor Anderson: Well, I don't think it was an entirely accurate statement although I do remember saying something vaguely like it. I think the reporter asked me something about obscenity and whether it was crucial to the underground press and I remember saying that I think it was used at first as the most vivid sort of protest that the burgeoning young papers in the United States could use for the big shock value. I think certainly none of the Underground Presses are obscene. As a matter of fact, I don't know the opposite of obscenity but I think the underground press is at the opposite end. Obscenity to me is a word that could be attached more readily to Midnight, Flash and Kiss and so on. Certainly not to the underground press. They have a very strong sense as to what is obscene and what isn't obscene.

The Chairman: Mr. Laxton, by your definition are those papers obscene?

Mr. Laxton: Well, my definition—I don't think there is any doubt that the vast majority of these papers exploit sex for commercial reasons such as the one that has been mentioned, and are in danger if they were prosecuted of being convicted under our present laws.

The Chairman: And yet, they are never prosecuted?

Mr. Laxton: They are never prosecuted.

The Chairman: Are they at all do you know?

Mr. Laxton: Well, when we say never—I mean very occasionally. There seems to be a token gesture towards these other magazines.

Now, in the last trial we had, we called a professor from the U.B.C. department who had made a survey in a middle-class area near the University of all the family stores, drugstores, grocery stores and the like and he came into court absolutely loaded down with a selection of magazines and books that were on sale in all of these family stores. We put all of these books in evidence and we asked the professor to tell us what was in them, because we didn't have time to read them. He explained what was in them and these books contained every form of sexual act, normal and abnormal, graphically described, page after page.

We introduced evidence to show that many of these books were on the best seller list—you know, it is no longer the case that you go down to the dirty bookstore by the station. These books are on sale everywhere and they are on sale in great quantities. Our point was not just because these hadn't been prosecuted, therefore the Georgia Straight shouldn't be prosecuted, because that isn't a legal argument. It is an argument we can make to you as a political committee and we do make that argument, but we made the argument on the ground that one of the definitions of obscenity is that it must not fall below the community standard.

We brought all these books into court and we said this is the community standard. This is what people are reading, this is what people are accepting and the judge almost fell out of his chair when he heard what was going on. The court eventually had to accept and did accept the argument and the reasons for judgment contained the statement that the community standard in British Columbia, at any rate, certainly embraces the kind of reference to sex that is contained in the Georgia Straight. I think he went on to say that compared with the other pornographic trash that is on sale everywhere, the Georgia Straight was a very mild version indeed. We complained that all of this other stuff was on sale and yet there were no prosecutions or at least there were only token prosecutions.

The Chairman: You talk about harassment who is behind this harassment of the Georgia Straight?

Mr. Laxton: Well, I wish we knew.

The Chairman: I am sure you know your comments here are privileged. Are you suggesting—well, you obviously are suggesting that there is...

Mr. Laxton: Senator, we wouldn't like to use that privilege unless we could justify our charges in open court. We don't believe in hiding behind a privilege to smear someone's reputation. It is very difficult to say who prompts these prosecutions but I suppose to make the most innocent statement of all we could say that there is a general prejudice in society and that crystallizes in certain people who have power. I think that the prosecutors in Vancouver have played a role, the Mayor obviously has played a role and got elected on it and bragged after he won the second election that the reason he won was because of his victimization and persecution of the Georgia Straight.

The Chairman: Two comments on that. Number one, do you believe that—did that help him get elected?

Mr. Laxton: I think it did.

The Chairman: Number two, is there a greater degree of prejudice in Vancouver than say Toronto or Montreal. I know Harbinger has problems but certainly nothing like those that you have had?

Mr. Laxton: Well, we have a Social Credit government in British Columbia which has a religious background which perhaps the government in power in Ontario does not have. I am not sure. I think probably that we are as enlightened on the West Coast as they are anywhere in Ontario but the people with the power are perhaps a little less enlightened.

The Chairman: Mr. Harris?

Mr. Harris: Just a point on your question of who is behind the harassment of papers. In commenting on the harassment of Octopus here in Ottawa, about a year and a half ago the head of the legal department for the City of Ottawa, Mr. Donald Hambling said on television that certain people in the community thought that Octopus was either seditious or obscene but these charges were not valid in the court. It was then taken upon them to harass Octopus on a different level. Now, presumably using the City's Legal Department or that purpose...

The Chairman: Has the Octopus experienced the same degree of harassment as the Georgia Straight?

Mr. Harris: Not to the same degree. We haven't used obscenity—well, we haven't used any obscene things. When it came to selling on the streets, we ran into the same type of harassment.

The Chairman: Have you abandoned selling on the streets now?

Mr. Harris: No, we won our case.

The Chairman: You won your case?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

The Chairman: That is what I thought. You are now able to sell on the streets and do?

Mr. Harris: Yes.

The Chairman: Has there been any further harassment since that time?

Mr. Harris: Not official. Not carried through to the courts. There is a very low keyed harassment...

The Chairman: What do you mean? For example, can you give us a couple of instances?

Mr. Harris: The same kind of harassment that went on before we won our court case is carried on by the police officers attempting to arrest a vendor but the vendors usually have the presence of mind to explain to the police officer just what the law is.

The Chairman: Mr. O'Hara?

Mr. O'Hara: In Kingston, for a while in the summer while a lot of the people were on the streets with the paper, occasionally the police would come up and say that we couldn't sell the paper. We would say "yes, but the Ontario law says that we can" and the policeman would say "Oh," and go away. One or two said that they would check this back with the station and said they would let us know but we never did hear from them.

Apparently they don't understand the law very well that selling newspapers on the street in Ontario is in fact legal by a Provincial Statute. So nothing really can be done about it. The City for example is not required or is not empowered to require a vendor's licence. Two people who were selling our paper in Kingston were arrested or summoned, I should say to be more correct, under a City by-law against soliciting, which was originally a by-law that was drawn up and aimed against prostitution. Now, that case is still before the court and will be coming up before the end of this week. We don't know what will happen but we rather think we will win the case. But the point is that the law was very clearly stated and the lawyer involved looked up the debates in council and the by-law suggests very clearly that it referred to soliciting on the street and this was used against people selling the newspaper.

The Chairman: Do you have this problem in Oakville at all?

Mr. Stevens: No. Compared with other papers, ours is a very low keyed one. We haven't gone into attacking public organizations until very recently. The tendency has been to rather than apply positive pressure to use more or less negative—you know, sort of ignore it, don't talk about it and maybe it will fold up and go away.

The Chairman: How about Sudbury? Has this been a problem?

Mr. Johnson: No. When I checked the city by-laws on the subject I was told I would need either a vendor's permit or business licence if I could be allowed to do it. Although the police have never questioned me on the subject and even before I got a licence, they never stopped anyone selling on the street.

Mr. Hesler: You do have a licence?

Mr. Johnson: I do now, yes.

The Chairman: How about in Toronto, Mr. Wetzel. Have you had problems of this kind?

Mr. Wetzel: We don't have a licence. The only problem we have is the occasional police officer taking papers from the vendor or else telling the vendor that he has to move on—he can't just stand there selling newspapers. We did have the vendors in the City Hall Square all summer long. Originally the policemen had said that we couldn't solicit business or couldn't conduct business on the Square but when we checked into the by-laws, the by-law said, "except the sale of newspapers". We told the police this and we went down there, a bunch of us selling newspapers, and told them if they wanted to arrest us they could but we were not going to leave and they never arrested us. Since that time they haven't bothered us.

The Chairman: And you continued to sell there?

Mr. Wetzel: Yes.

Mr. Hesler: Have you not had any difficulty with regards to obscenity charges?

Mr. Wetzel: Yes. We just got convicted on an obscenity charge. We were just fined $500.

The Chairman: That was just last week wasn't it?

Mr. Wetzel: Yes sir.

Mr. Hesler: Have you ever been the object—I am not speaking here of your people on the streets but have your offices or the places from which you operate—have they ever been the object of visits from the authorities?

Mr. Wetzel: Only twice.

Mr. Hesler: Could you explain the manner in which these visits were carried out?

Mr. Wetzel: Well, once they were looking for runaways.

Mr. Hesler: Runaways?

Mr. Wetzel: Yes. They really didn't do much but come in and look around. The second time was when they raided our office on Spadina and seized obscene papers. They had a search warrant which said "search the residence of 393 Spadina" even though the residence was upstairs and the business part was downstairs. They wouldn't let us use the phone—Larry jumped on the phone to call our lawyer and before he could get on the phone—when Larry objected, they told him he had better shut up or they were going to do him in.

The Chairman: They were going to what?

Mr. Wetzel: They were going to do him in which the police always do when they raid you.

Mr. Hesler: Did they seize anything?

Mr. Wetzel: Pardon?

Mr. Hesler: Did they seize anything?

Mr. Wetzel: Well, all they seized was about 500 copies of Harbinger—the one issue that they were objecting to—that one I just passed around—that drawing was the one they convicted us on. We put a little heart over the baby that was being born and there was a slogan on the top which was inside the paper. That is what they convicted us on.

They refused to give us time to pay even though "Vixen" which is being shown at Cinema 2000—when they arrested the manager of that, they gave him the week-end to raise the $100 bail and yet they refused to give us time to raise $1500. They just locked us up and threw us in jail. I think there is suppression going on.

The Chairman: Did you have a lawyer?

Mr. Wetzel: Oh, yes we had two lawyers.

Mr. Hesler: Have you ever encountered any acts of violence on the part of the authorities?

Mr. Wetzel: Well, lots of times they will give us parking tickets when we are delivering our papers—they will tear our car apart at 1:00 o'clock in the afternoon when we are going to pick up ordinary paper from Gestetner—you know, out in the middle of Don Mills at 1:00 o'clock in the afternoon they will stop our car and just tear the car apart. That happens quite often.

The Chairman: Does anybody wish to add anything on this point. I don't want to terminate this part of the discussion if there are other questions on this whole area?

Mr. Hesler: No, Mr. Chairman, I don't have anything else.

The Chairman: Mr. Johnson?

Mr. Johnson: I had an apartment on the main street of town which I allowed to be used by anyone who had no place to go or needed a place to spend the night and there was always people there. There was usually a dozen or more people. One night the police came to the place and they did have a search warrant—they found nothing there but shortly afterwards they went to the landlord and told them that I was using the place for trafficking and as a result I was evicted from there.

The Chairman: Mr. Laxton?

Mr. Laxton: I am wondering on this question of obscenity—we have asked you to make a recommendation...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Laxton: That the law should be repealed and I wonder if we could just refer you to pages 7 and 8 of our brief where we attempt to deal very quickly with this question.

What happens if you do not have censorship, you do not have a sense of value. Is society harmed by the publication of obscenities, because presumably the basis for the continuous use of these laws is that if we don't have them society will be harmed. We would like to make these points which is at the bottom of page 7:

"...We maintain that the 'prophylactic value' of censorship is not proved.

We do not accept that there is any evidence that obscenity is harmful to the public. One may recall the words of the draftsman of the British 'Obscene Publications Act' who said no one was ever corrupted by four letter words—because if that were so the British Army would be corrupted beyond all hope of redemption. The value of censorship is certainly doubtful. The connection between what a person sees or reads and what he does as a result, is obscure to say the least. Indeed, perhaps the proof is all the other way. Prohibition tends to give importance and publicity to the pornographers. Rather than act as a preventative it enhances the delight in the thing prohibited. But perhaps the most damaging evidence against the argument is to be found in the record of the censors themselves. There is no suggestion for example that censors enjoying a daily diet of uncensored books ever become corrupt-ed."

The Chairman: Does anyone else have anything to say before we move on to other areas?

Senator McElman: I would like to go back to the comment that was made by Mr. Laxton regarding the case of the convicted Hungarian immigrant. You spoke of earlier adjournments. How many had there been and for what reasons?

Mr. Laxton: Well, we have the whole record and it doesn't indicate—I will just read you the beginning.

"This was, Your Worship adjourned from Friday."

There appears to have been one previous adjournment.

Senator McElman: I understood from your comments that there had been several.

Mr. Laxton: When I read it through at first glance I thought there had been several but since you have put that direct question to me, it appears that there had only been one. We would like to emphasize that we don't want anyone to make an issue of this. We made statements about this particular judge and this is over. We are certainly not wanting to single out any member of the judiciary but what we would like to establish is the right to criticize unfairness if you like, or incompetence wherever it is found, even at the highest level and that includes the judiciary as well as the government. That is all we are asking, to be given the right to make fair criticisms.

The Chairman: Does anyone else have anything on this point?

Mr. Spears: What about unfair criticism?

Mr. Laxton: Well, we never deal with that.

Mr. Spears: Is it possible to define that?

Mr. Laxton: Well, I think we are into an area of philosophy which is a bit difficult to answer. I appreciate your question and I certainly would like to discuss it but I think it would take some time. It would take a great deal of time to go into that area because my own personal opinion is—I don't know whether Dan McLeod is of the same view and I am only here speaking on his behalf today because he is the Editor and it is his paper. I am only his counsel but I think perhaps in certain instances society that has solid structures, solid foundations, can even allow what might be described as unfair criticism because otherwise you do get into this fact of deciding what is fair or what is unfair.

The civil libel laws of course protect fair comment and fair comment, in a watered down form, is also available as a defence to criminal libel. So the question is one which the courts have considered and have attempted to make judgments about.

It is not impossible to make a definition but it does create great problems; and perhaps now in 1970 Canada, we are sufficiently mature and sufficiently safe in our institutions of government and our institutions of law that we can even tolerate unfair criticisms. This seems to be the position that has been taken in the United States. I would think that our system of government is at least as solidly entrenched as that in the United States.

The Chairman: I would like to put a question to you Mr. McLeod. How has the Georgia Straight responded or how have you responded to the current situation in Vancouver where there are no daily newspapers.

Have you increased your press run, have you sold more papers, have you attempted to cover more general news items. Have you done anything at all because of this situation?

Mr. McLeod: Well, we have tried to enlarge the paper a bit and we have hired another reporter and we have increased our press run—just about doubled it. We are not trying to do the same things as the daily papers. We are not trying to imitate them. We feel that our paper is an alternative and always has been and we are just beating up our own thing, adding more to that.

The Chairman: Are you running more pages for example?

Mr. McLeod: Yes, we have gone up to 32, or 36 pages from the usual 24.

The Chairman: And in those extra 12 pages you are not particularly carrying things which might have appeared in the local press. Local news events for instance?

Mr. McLeod: We are carrying theatre schedules. We are not carrying TV schedules. We are going to carry some court news but we are having trouble getting a reporter. We are publishing literary supplements as well of local writings.

The Chairman: Well, you say you have doubled your press run. Are you selling twice as many papers?

Mr. McLeod: Yes.

The Chairman: They are all being sold, are they?

Mr. McLeod: Yes, we are selling them all. We sold 22,000 the first week of the strike.

The Chairman: What is the impact on the broad community of the absence of daily newspapers in Vancouver, in your opinion?

Mr. McLeod: I think people are finding that they don't need them as much as they thought they did. I think the daily newspapers seem to artificially build up attentions in people, build up an artificial need to have a paper every day. You see, you might follow the same story for a week in a daily paper, and every day it changes. If you took the whole story in a weekly paper then you would get more of a perspective on it. In a way, a weekly paper could very well do everything that a daily paper does and people could get their daily information from radio and TV.

The Chairman: But surely the absence of daily papers is the reason that you are selling twice as many papers?

Mr. McLeod: Well, people are conditioned to reading their paper so they just buy anything—they are buying Watchtower and Awake. There are more Jehovah Witnesses on the street than there are Georgia Straight salesmen.

The Chairman: If and when the daily papers get back in business in Vancouver do you think you will hold this double circulation?

Mr. McLeod: I think we will hold steady at about the thousand or so.

The Chairman: So you will have gained some?

Mr. McLeod: Yes. We have been increasing steadily the past year and a half or since we were damned by the Mayor.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to ask this one question along this same line. Do you believe that the customers of the department stores and the big chain groceries require a medium something like a daily newspaper in order to provide themselves with the kind of service they find necessary to purchase the articles where the price is the best and to know where the various articles can be located in a city like Vancouver?

Mr. McLeod: Advertising sheets?

Senator Smith: That's right.

Mr. McLeod: Well, there are other ways of advertising and there are still weekly papers. They can advertise in them and another thing they are doing to fill the gap is publishing their own advertising supplements and just leave them on street corners for anybody to pick up.

Senator Smith: In order to make you understand what my question really is or involves, I think it is fair to say that we have had evidence to suggest that it might well be good economics for a daily newspaper to carry the big grocery supermarket ads for free in order to attract the readership that they require for the other kind of paid advertising. Did it ever occur to you that that could be a possibility and therefore there would have to be some other way of providing the grocery ads for the women in the household every day?

Mr. McLeod: You mean the establishment papers should?

Senator Smith: Well, somebody should carry these ads.

Mr. O'Hara: Carry what?

Senator Smith: Carry this kind of information.

Mr. O'Hara: It seems that what this advertising is doing—it is doing the same thing that the papers are doing themselves—creating an artificial need for all this junk, all these products that people don't really need and it is conditioning people to consume more—I don't know but I think the consumption of goods has probably gone down in Vancouver and this may eventually force a supplement but that is all I guess.

I think that advertising from day to day does create an artificial need and we don't need all of this stuff that we buy. Even with food, all the advertisers advertise the specials and you see the ads where it says that specials are on for 10 cents cheaper and then you go there and everything else is marked up and the specials are marked down. The things you need are marked up.

Mr. Harris: Maybe they should just stop advertising.

Mr. Wetzel: If a customer knows he can go to a certain store and get bananas at 10 cents cheaper he will go there. It is more or less of a gimmick and they can do that without daily newspapers.

The Chairman: Mr. Westley?

Mr. Westley: It appears to me that the newspapers are basically an advertising gimmick. I heard someone once remark that what they do is they lay out the advertising and if there is any room left over they put in the copy. I think that established newspapers are basically...

Mr. Stevens: Well, they are a business and they get their money from advertising.

Mr. McLeod: What we used to do when we couldn't afford to increase the size of our paper I used to throw out ads to get in more copy and now we can afford to increase the size of the whole paper.

Mr. Hesler: Mr. Chairman, unless someone has a question on this topic, perhaps we could change.

The Chairman: That is fine.

Mr. Hesler: I would like to sort out a few things that were said this morning at the very beginning of our discussion. I think it was Mr. Stevens who referred to the borders of the Underground and just before that Mr. McLeod had said that his paper, and correct me if I am misquoting you or misinterpreted you—his paper was attempting to fill a need which has arisen in an age where the establishment has apparently no use for youth. I would like to know what suggestions anyone has, who has come here today, as to how the media in Canada can perhaps bridge the gap of communications between the borders of the Underground and the establishment. First of all, whether the bridging is desirable to you and secondly what can be done to bridge the gap?

Mr. Stevens: It is a problem of priority and relevance, isn't it? A lot that I consider relevant maybe the above ground media does not consider relevant or doesn't consider as relevant as something else.

Mr. McLeod: Well, even within the media themselves, if the media would just print the stories that their young reporters write, that would help the situation. But we find in Vancouver that the Vancouver Sun and Province are not printing—they are censoring stories of young reporters to such a great extent that in frustration they leave; and just in order to get these stories out, they come to the Georgia Straight and work for a fraction of the salary they would get on the establishment papers.

The Chairman: What are your priorities Mr. Stevens? What are your priorities that are not theirs?

Mr. Stevens: Well, it is necessarily a subjective sort of thing.

The Chairman: Of course.

Mr. Stevens: Sweeney doesn't handle news as such. We don't say so-and-so was killed in a car accident last night or news like that or the ladies bridge club met last week—for one thing because we don't have the resources and for another thing we don't think that is particularly relevant. I am not really concerned with the number of deaths on the highways except as it is indicative of the failure some place in the transportation system and the means of transport used—so that is why we don't go in to that type of thing. You have to try and take an overall view. For example, with regard to traffic deaths, we would say that there must be something wrong here because we had so many more than last year—why? Whereas the above ground press has a tendency just to report them as they come up.

The Chairman: Surely you are not critical of the overground press for that?

Mr. Stevens: Well, I guess they have to write the stories but I don't think they are particularly relevant to our way of life—the fact that Joe Blow died—I don't think that Joe Blow's family particularly likes to see that. What has happened in Oakville, the same story was done I think four different times over an interval of two months—how this family's father drowned in the river or something like that. It was upsetting the family and it didn't add anything to the paper. It didn't add anything to the community and solved no problems. It was merely I guess interesting copy and something like that isn't relevant to me. Other questions, such as if he hadn't been killed in the river maybe he may have been killed by the smell coming out of it—that kind of stuff. To me, the large problems are are we going to be alive tomorrow.

The Chairman: Well, I share your concern about the large smell, many of us do. I wouldn't expect you to cover many of the news items that are in the overground press, but on the other hand I don't think you can be critical of them for carrying news about deaths on the highways.

Mr. Stevens: Well, the highway thing is a subjective sort of thing. We more or less just decide how much space we should give it and if it is important enough to give it two pages, all right. Now, it is a subjective sort of thing and I can't really comment.

The Chairman: Well, I believe Mr. McLeod was going to say something.

Mr. McLeod: Perhaps there wouldn't be as many car accidents and deaths if the establishment press didn't carry pages and pages of advertising of obsolete and unsafe cars and thus creating a need.

The Chairman: But isn't that in fairness a different argument? That seems to be a separate point altogether. Surely highway accidents are legitimate news items in the over-ground press?

Mr. McLeod: But the cars are a product of the establishment.

The Chairman: Mr. Cain?

Mr. Cain: Now, we are getting to the root of the matter. Mr. McLeod was getting into the idea of cars as a commodity. Now, we all know—working out this example, that a car can be made to last a lot longer than three years. We are all aware in this room of planned obsolescence. That is one stance that the underground press refuses to take. We will not get involved in planned obsolescence in commodities or commodity buying and that is what Mr. Stevens was getting at. He said that drownings and violent stories are not necessary. He was being critical of the over-ground press for printing such stories and he was making a value judgment on what is going to the people, what we are receiving in the newspapers and we are getting into what is relevant and what is irrelevant.

The Chairman: Well, let me put it to you then. Is it irrelevant—is a highway accident irrelevant?

Mr. Cain: It seems to me it is irrelevant if it is presented in red lettering on the front page of a newspaper as a sensational story. I have yet to read a newspaper story on a car accident which gets into the problem.

The Chairman: Do you think the press sensationalizes automobile accidents?

Mr. Cain: I would say so.

The Chairman: Do you?

Mr. Cain: By putting the stories on the front pages of the newspapers and saying that 44 people were killed and 31 were injured.

Mr. Stevens: Yes, that is the question.

The Chairman: In an accident where 44 people were killed—oh, you mean in a total week-end?

Mr. Cain: Yes.

Mr. O'Hara: Oh, they will print the picture—they will print the picture of the car-nage on the front page.

Mr. Cain: Yes.

Mr. O'Hara: We have to remember all these processes I think in terms of selectivity.

There are an awful lot of things that happen in this world and one of the functions the overground press exercises, is to collect what pieces of information that you are told about through bad media.

Now, when you talk about relevant, I think it's a very reasonable question—the relevance of an automobile accident; how gory, without any investigation as to how it happened, what the effects are of that accident, or the ramifications are of that accident was it the faulty car design? It is much less relevant to deal with it that way than to analyse the effects of the ramifications of that kind, how they affect the lives of all the people who might read that paper.

Now, this effect is heightened when for example something has happened locally which is not sensational. This is not big news, but perhaps has new ramifications for people who might read the paper. Now, that might need a lot of space, for example a pollution study or an article which doesn't get talked about perhaps because they are caused by an advertiser or something like that. On the other hand I think we have all seen this—we have seen a five column picture of a particular crash that has happened in Delaware or something. Not because that accident is more relevant or because there is any kind of an analysis of how that accident was caused—I don't think that is the reason—I think the reason is sensationalism. I think that the information is irrelevant to the lives of the people who receive that information.

Mr. Westley: I agree. I think in small communities people want to know about their neighbours. You pick up the paper and you look through it and you say, oh, I knew that guy, I went to school with him, or something like that, and I think these things should be reported in small communities. I think they are important to people if they are in a small community. The overground press has such tremendous facilities for reporting things. They have a network which virtually touches around the globe—it is a global type of affair and yet to look at the newspaper you find that in spite of all the communications they have and all the writers, all the machinery and all the technology, etcetera, you still get the trivial; things that don't teach people how to live and how to get to the bottom of their problems and so on. I don't know it just doesn't seem to work out right and they don't seem to get to the bottom of things. You have to search very hard to find a good story.

The Chairman: Would you Mr. Westley give us some examples of the kind of articles or stories which the daily papers in Canada could run which would be of benefit to the people and are not running at the present time?

Mr. Westley: Well, I really couldn't say...

The Chairman: Or Mr. O'Hara, either one.

Mr. O'Hara: Well, I wish I had a copy of some kind of a daily newspaper in front of me.

The Chairman: Does anyone have a daily paper from today or yesterday? Here is this morning's Globe & Mail.

Mr. O'Hara: Well, they have a very irrelevant article on the front page this morning.

The Chairman: What is it?

Mr. O'Hara: They have a story about 2,000 people marching in Port of Spain.

The Chairman: You say that is irrelevant?

Mr. O'Hara: Well, on the front page for example there is the four columns...

The Chairman: Why don't you hold it up so we can see it.

Mr. O'Hara: A four column—seven inch—fairly spectacular news column about a fire.

The Chairman: Where was that fire?

Mr. O'Hara: In Toronto. That is a local story but that takes up a lot of space. Somewhere in here I expect to find or expect not to find either a very small article on the occupation of the University of Buffalo or no article at all. Just skimming through it...

The Chairman: Mr. O'Hara, may I suggest that we address ourselves to the front page.

Mr. O'Hara: Okay.

The Chairman: Now, in your opinion on the front page—that is this morning's Globe & Mail I believe?

Mr. O'Hara: Yes.

The Chairman: What stories are there that are not of relevance to the people who live in Toronto?

Mr. O'Hara: Well, I am not saying that those stories are not relevant or that people do not necessarily want to read about them.

They treat things in a very superficial way. Now, I expect the Committee has already dealt with now they do it in Germany...

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. O'Hara: I might say that I work on two papers. I work on a paper in Peterborough which in fact attempted to replace the daily paper. This attempted to replace the daily newspaper that was on strike and I have been writing straight news and covering local events and I must say it is very unfulfilling to the people who write these stories. It is also very unfulfilling for the people to read them. Now, there is a story on the 2,000 people who are marching in Port of Spain and there is a story about what is happening in Trinidad and what is happening in Canada. Now, without reading this completely, I don't think that there is anything in this story—no, there isn't anything in this story which explains the ramifications of a trial of black people who are being tried on a conspiracy charge, which came out of a charge of racism, which explains that and the ramifications of what the people are doing in Trinidad. The connections aren't made, the analysis isn't there. There isn't any kind of attempt to follow that up with some kind of connection, some kind of making it relevant and to explain the experience of the people who live in the area that it is going to serve.

The Chairman: However, I think you would want to be fair—it may be that the kind of story that you refer to has been or will be carried on their page 7. Isn't that true?

Mr. O'Hara: Well, I wouldn't say that.

The Chairman: You know, their style is a little bit different than yours in terms of objectivity. Given their concept of objectivity, I am not sure that the kind of front page—if you were the editor of the Globe and Mail—that you would produce would be more relevant.

Mr. Westley: I have a brief there that does an analysis in St. Catharines and you know, it has all that stuff in it. It has all that stuff in it if anybody wants to take a look at it.

The Chairman: Well, I saw it at noon hour. If you would like to refer to it now, you can.

Mr. Westley: I will show you something. We did an analysis of the paper per week, we took a random sampling and did this very scientifically—I will show you this. I don't want to have to go through all this stuff because it will take a lot of time. But here is an article on the very famous and historical carrousel in St. Catharines—I don't know whether or not you have heard about it, but here it is on top of page 9—this is our local news page. There is an article on Pollution Probe. At this meeting the Niagara Peninsula Pollution Committee was set up. People came from as far away as Sudbury to talk about their experiences. The Peninsula is probably one of the worst polluted places in Ontario. This was a very important meeting. There are other issues like—I had them listed in here—unemployment; a group of unemployed people had been demonstrating because they had been out of jobs, they were on welfare and in pretty bad shape. Yet we have to go to the expense of making press releases, phoning the radio stations, and badgering them. And when we do picket—informational pickets to get our point across—we end up with an article buried in the back page. Other times we had nothing. Here was a very important issue in the community and yet an $8,000 carrousel hits the top page and pollution has approximately ten lines. What about priorities, things that are important?

The Chairman: Well, I am not a daily reader of the St. Catharines paper but let me refer to the Toronto daily papers which I do read every day. It seems to me that they have written reams and reams and reams on pollution. They have done this in the last number of months. Would you not agree with that?

Mr. Westley: Yes.

The Chairman: Do you see them yourselves?

Mr. Westley: Yes, but I am talking about our local paper.

The Chairman: Well, you have taken a day. Probably that carrousel is not mentioned again for months but pollution is mentioned almost every day, isn't it?

Mr. Westley: Well, I thought quite frankly...

The Chairman: Well, my friend here groans but I thought that it is probably true in the Toronto papers.

Mr. Westley: Yes, I agree but I think that pollution is a very important problem in terms of that particular meeting—that was a very important step and I felt that surely after one whole day of meetings there would be more...

The Chairman: Is that the entire coverage?

Mr. Westley: Yes. I might be wrong in this—this might be just announcing it. Oh, this is just announcing it.

Mr. Harris: I think the Toronto papers, especially the Globe and Mail, are much more competent to cover stories such as this. I don't know about the Ottawa papers...

The Chairman: Well, let us talk about the Ottawa papers. Don't you think that the coverage of pollution here is substantial?

Mr. Harris: No.

The Chairman: You don't?

Mr. Harris: No.

The Chairman: You don't think that they have really honed in on pollution?

Mr. Harris: Well, I think they should be doing something about the river—that is the problem.

Mr. O'Hara: I think again, it is a matter of explaining it. I read the Globe—I don't say I read the Globe every day but every time I can, but you read the Globe and sure, they talk about pollution but then more people are yelling about pollution than they used to, but there has to be something more. There isn't enough coverage as there should be and this is our point.

Again, the kind of discussions the Globe gets into when it does discuss pollution is removed from the people it affects indirectly. You get the "off-ed" page here, half of it is devoted to a discussion on pollution—but how exactly does that relate to the people in Sudbury who are coughing themselves to death, or the people in Toronto who have to look at the Don River every day?

The Chairman: There was an article which appeared—I am not sure, I think it was in Fortune, but which made the point of what is wrong with the news; the basic point was that papers have done a pretty bad job in reporting the change in society till the change became a fact of life; in other words, pollution has always been ignored until right now. This is really what you are saying. The question I put to you is what is it that the press is ignoring now and not reporting that they should be reporting?

Mr. O'Hara: Genocide.

The Chairman: Well, genocide...

Mr. Westley: They are reporting things but well—here is an article which says that two out of three Canadians believe any newspaper reports are biased. That is just a headline and there are some statistics here...

The Chairman: That is a Gallup Poll.

Mr. Westley: Yes. Here is another one on black militants in the Toronto Star.

The Chairman: This is an editorial review that you are reading?

Mr. Westley: Yes—against the black students—this will illustrate the sort of double techniques that have been indulged in by newspapermen. Negro students are criticized for trying to influence the outcome of a trial one way while the Star itself is trying to...

Senator Smith: If you want the reporter to put it on the record, please slow down.

The Chairman: Yes, you will have to slow down.

Mr. Westley: ...or trying to influence it the other way. If you read the editorial you will find out, so what I am saying is papers are very biased. There is no doubt about it, they are trying to push something.

The Chairman: So are the underground press.

Mr. Westley: Well, they use very, very subtle techniques.

Mr. Stevens: Most North American papers will often have a bias, but the difference is that most of them in their reporting—that is a reporter writing up the stories—tend to be objective. They think there is some great virtue in being objective. They draw no conclusions, take no sides—just report the facts and rely on the reader to make his own interpretations, and this is something that I question. In Europe this hasn't been happening. A lot of European papers are subjective and they make no bones about it. They say—this is subjective and they put the reporter's name under the article and you are supposed to know that that reporter is biased by following it through or reading the paper every day or whatever, and if you don't like his interpretation or solution you can go to another paper and get a different one. As long as the facts are reported truthfully, you know you are getting fair interpretations.

Mr. Hesler: Do you think that we in Canada are being short-changed in the standards of journalism in newspapers as compared with papers in France and Europe?

Mr. Stevens: Well, you are short-changed surely when you pick up a paper that is supposed to be objective and you are getting unconscious bias. The way a story is reported often depends on the reporter's bias. Sometimes something is said which is not reported. This is a value judgment on his part and the fact that you think you are getting everything, all the news; the impression the paper puts across is not necessarily a true impression. In this way you are getting short-changed—you are picking up a paper which is supposed to be objective and there is a definite bias.

The Chairman: I think in fairness Mr. Stevens I should point out that in the overwhelming majority of briefs we receive from publishers of daily papers they make no profession of objectivity—in fact, many of them make the very point you are making.

Mr. Stevens: Well, maybe on the editorial page; you look at the editorial page for the paper's comments—for the paper's bias and there you do get a bias; but you also get a bias just in the reporting, in what news is reported, how it is reported, etcetera. Sometimes you don't think you are getting a bias—you think you are getting the straight facts.

Mr. Johnson: That is especially obvious in many, many papers where the—on the front page you have maybe 15 stories which are very, very short and then continued on the next page. That is the most blatant example of this—it is what the reporter thinks are the most important facts; some which may actually for many people be more relevant are tucked away on page 10, or where most of the investigation into the subject is tucked away on page 10. They will just have a very brief thing on page 1 which in no way goes into the subject.

The Chairman: I wonder if we might put the question to you, Mr. Anderson—I am not sure if you were in the room when Mr. Hesler specifically put the question—would you like to put it again to Mr. Anderson?

Mr. Hesler: My last question?

The Chairman: Well, your basic question about what the so-called establishment press could do...

Mr. Hesler: As I understand you, Mr. Chairman, you are referring not to my last question...

The Chairman: Well, you put a very broad question. That is really why we have been off on this discussion we have been having and I wondered if Mr. Anderson could comment on this point.

Mr. Hesler: Well, I had asked whether in bridging the gap between what Mr. Stevens referred to as the borders of the underground and the establishment which Mr. McLeod said had no use or concern for youth,—whether anyone here had any recommendations as to what the media in Canada could do to bridge that gap, to perhaps bring the establishment to accept youth with a little more objectivity or understanding.

Mr. Anderson: I am not really sure. We were kicking this idea around in Winnipeg a while ago, some colleagues and myself, and—it seems that ever since the advent of the underground press, the media haven't been radicalizing Time Magazine, Look Magazine, Life Magazine—they are far more critical now of society than they were several years ago. I am not saying that they are entrenchingly critical but they are far more critical. In other words, it seems that the media are now being influenced by the underground press.

I think the enormous concern with ecology is primarily a phenomenon started by the underground press and it is only very recently that the establishment press has sort of got on the band-wagon as it were. We thought that one thing a paper could possibly do is to give the student radicals, radical society, four or five pages and just let them do their thing but as I said earlier, a newspaper, whatever else it is, is a business making venture and if anything it is going to be found in the editorial comment or the copy of the newspaper, that is going to collide with financial interest of a newspaper—it is simply not going to be there.

The best example I can think of would be a newspaper such as the Winnipeg Free Press writing a story about Eaton's of Winnipeg which is supposed to be the most successful department store in the world according to Canadian magazines. On some days 10 per cent of the population of Winnipeg is in that store—this is an amazing fact; they have something called the Budget Account which they charge something like 18 or 20 per cent per year on accounts. Now, obviously anyone who is paying 18 per cent is in fact dealing with a loan shark and yet you will never find any criticism of that in the Winnipeg Free Press or Tribune because they will be threatened with the taking away of all their advertising. So it seems to me that no marriage is possible between the establishment press and the radical press. They are on completely different trips and I can't see any possibility of fusion between the two.

Mr. Hesler: Well, perhaps to carry on my question a bit further, does the underground press or the opposition press—itsself make an effort to bridge this gap in catering to a restricted clientele. In doing this does it not encourage the gap to continue?

Mr. Stevens: I don't think you will find it catering to a strict clientele; with Sweeney, 50 per cent of our papers go to people over 30, lecturers, teachers, housewives, fathers, workers and this kind of thing. We never have attempted to cater to any one clientele. We are just like an alternative press. Nothing more, nothing less, and we are not just trying to become the official organ of the dope scene or whatever you want. It is just an alternative press, nothing more and nothing less.

The Chairman: Mr. Westley?

Mr. Westley: I think the most threatening problem to deal with—if there is something threatened by the establishment papers—is to get these people outside of the so-called restricted group that we have been talking about—to get this type of person, the people who are working in restaurants, underpaid, students, people who are on welfare, etcetera, to start to get them interested in the papers. I am thinking more in terms of our paper because we are not trying to restrict it to anybody in particular or to any group. I think that is a mistake. I think we should be trying to get people together, concentrating on trying to get them together—as many people as we can and the best way we can.

Mr. Hesler: Well, don't you think—I am not referring to any specific publication, but you don't think that an underground publication that is really way out and that really clobbers the reader hard, to you really think that this is a publication which can get through to the majority of the establishment? Don't you think more subtle technique would be appropriate if you want to get through to them?

Mr. Westley: That might not be what they want. They might get a charge you know out of throwing accusations around or coming on strong and they are obviously catering to a particular group. They are catering to people who won't be offended obviously by their publication and they can do that if they want, but I think you will find that the majority of the underground press doesn't attempt to cater to a particular group. University papers—well, there are some which are definitely youth orientated...

Mr. Hesler: But the question I am really trying to get an answer to is are you doing something to try to get through to people who form the establishment?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, we write intelligent articles. You know, there is nothing else we can do.

Mr. Harris: The idea of bridging a gap implies that there is a misunderstanding. I think there is a slightly divergence of stories coming together here.

Mr. Hesler: Well, that is what I asked. The first part of my question was whether the gap was worth bridging?

Mr. Harris: Well, it is not a matter of whether it is worth bridging or not—it is not just a matter of a disagreement or misunderstanding.

Mr. O'Hara: It is a matter of changing values of a society which holds an old set of values which is coming into conflict with a new set of values which it cannot accept. It is not a matter of an underground paper making an attempt to bridge that gap.

The underground press is providing an alternative to the old set of values, that is a new set of values.

The Chairman: Well, could a person be informed by reading only the underground press?

Mr. O'Hara: Well, that depends on which underground press you read.

The Chairman: Your paper?

Mr. O'Hara: Our paper, no because—but I will say in conjunction with the other forms of media that are available, yes. I think to leave those other media out of consideration would be ridiculous. The idea of getting through to the people who form the establishment is really a very strange idea. You can lay your ideas out for them; if they don't accept those ideas then there is nothing you can do.

The Chairman: Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: I would like to ask Mr. McLeod a question. Your paper as an underground press is a pretty successful paper subscription-wise and that sort of thing. Where do you expect to be in 1980 with your paper when Vancouver's population has doubled?

Mr. McLeod: In terms of circulation?

Senator Hays: In terms of circulation and impact on the community?

Mr. McLeod: I think that is up to the community. The paper can't survive without the support of the community and it depends on the community.

Senator Hays: Well, advertising and circulation-wise?

Mr. McLeod: My prediction is that the circulation will increase and we may become a true alternative to the daily press by that time.

Senator Hays: Do you mean that one establishment will take over from another establishment?

Mr. McLeod: Well, I don't think that people under the new value system will tolerate an establishment like the kind of establishment we have now.

Senator Hays: Would you be opposed to Senator Davey in his position—is he part of the establishment?

Mr. McLeod: I think Senator Davey can think for himself.

Senator Smith: Does that mean he is not part of the establishment?

Mr. McLeod: He is employed—we are all part of the system to some degree because we depend on money to operate.

Senator Hays: So economics do enter into this?

Mr. McLeod: I distinguish more between minds and how free you are in your head.

The Chairman: I find that perhaps I could answer that question myself but perhaps I had better not. I was only go to observe that everybody thinks I am part of the establishment with the possible exception of the establishment!

Senator Hays: I would like to pursue this a little further, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Carry on.

Senator Hays: How do you feel in Toronto about your paper in the future?

Mr. Wetzel: Well, we are not really concerned about the paper because in the future we are going to be running the country. ar-binner is only one little tool whereby we are working towards that.

Senator Hays: You are firmly convinced that—well, this has always been the case where the ins are trying to stay in and the outs are trying to stay out and...

Mr. Wetzel: No, it is a matter of who is our enemy.

Senator Hays: Well, I ask you is Senator Davey your enemy?

Mr. Wetzel: Well, you would be my enemy and so would...

Senator Hays: Senator Davey?

Mr. Wetzel: Yes, Senator Davey.

The Chairman: That is a terrible thing to say because I buy the Harbinger almost regularly! I am going to stop buying it.

Mr. O'Hara: The Russian Revolution was financed by robbing banks.

The Chairman: Well, I can assure you it is perfectly invalid comparison.

Senator Hays: This is the role of the underground press, is it?

Mr. Wetzel: Well, I don't know if that is the role of the Georgia Straight.

The Chairman: Well, in answer to Senator Hays, your commitment is not to journalism, is to a movement?

Mr. Wetzel: Specifically, yes.

The Chairman: And that is true of all of you, is it?

Mr. Cain: Yes.

Mr. Hesler: But as your paper gets more and more established, are you going to become more and more devoted to the success of your paper and not to the success of your movement? What happens if you have a circulation of 50,000 some day...

Senator Hays: And you are making one hundred thousand dollars a year, what happens to you then?

Mr. Laxton: They will pay a little bit more for their legal fees!

The Chairman: I am going to move to close out the session,—Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Well before you do...

The Chairman: Well, before I do I am going to ask all of our people to make a closing statement and then I am going to adjourn. However, you have a question so go ahead please.

Senator McElman: Mr. O'Hara spoke of the difficulty of communicating with the establishment—the bridging that has been discussed. I would like to refer briefly if I can to several items from that newspaper you looked at—the Globe and Mail of this morning. To begin with there is a lead editorial—"To a Less Troubled Way;"—it deals with the report just released of the Canada Welfare Council of an in-depth study of youngsters who drifted back and forth across Canada during the past year—personal interviews and so on, and it goes on to commend the findings which attempted to get at root causes and urging Canadians generally to get hold of this report and read it and find out where it is at.

Feiffer's cartoon is a lady—repeated several times in her caption—The Day Dawned, The Sky Was Brown, The Sea was Black, the Air was Grey—I staggered into a church and prayed for an end of technology. The police broke in and arrested me. The charge is conspiring to survive.

Then we go to the "off-ed" page—page 7, and there is a three-quarter page article by Dr. Murray Ross, President of York University. He makes reference to the profound changes that are coming in society, multiple roles of people, idea changes. He says: "Gradually the conception of work is being challenged. Work is being placed in a new perspective: any work that does not provide self-fulfilment is useless..." and so on. He goes on again and this is the last quote, Mr. Chairman.

"I do not wish to depreciate the radical groups. They have forced us to rethink and reevaluate. Their impatience with established methods that don't work, their outrage at poverty in wealthy countries, their dream of a "beautiful society" with smogless air, unpolluted rivers, swift and clean public transportation—all of these things they have forced us to think about. And the change is coming because of the efforts they have made and the disturbances they have caused."

All of this brings me to ask the question do you not think in some of the discussion there has been an over-display of fetishism—that perhaps in this one issue, today's, there is some indication that you are reaching? That there is an approach towards bridging the gap? I couldn't have seen these things perhaps as recently as two years ago. Would you agree that there is some approach?

Mr. O'Hara: No, I actually wouldn't. I would like to take the time to answer those in some detail if I may.

The Chairman: By all means.

Mr. O'Hara: I don't agree with you that there is a real reaching out and touching that is going to affect the changes that are necessary, the changes which will only resolve the conflict of new and old values; these changes are not going to come as fast as they have to come if we are in fact to survive in the way that Feiffer is cynical about. I think you can see the degree to which that reaching out fails probably in those stories.

Now, I haven't read that editorial concerning the children wandering back and forth across the country but the implication I get, you see, from what you read to me and I believe this may be said by other people, is that that group of people are investigating something which is basically wrong and they are trying to figure out why it went wrong and why kids do that. I think that if you read that report, if it fits into anything like my experience with that kind of investigation before, it is dealt with in terms of—well, these are all misfits.

Senator McElman: Excuse me, it deals with them just the contrary of misfits.

Mr. O'Hara: But does it deal with it in terms of not changing them or allowing them to exist in society under its present direction? Or does it talk in terms of changing the direction of the society? There is where the real—the real communications of where the roots of new ideas come and this is I think shown again in the article from Ross. I think that has to be put in some kind of perspective.

You notice that he talks about a dream and he says that because the radicals have yelled, the changes are coming. That I think, indicates a lack of communication because the problems are that the changes aren't here. That is where the problem is.

Again, going back to Feiffer, trying to survive, that is the crime. I think that we also have to remember that Ross was one of the people who signed a thing called The C.P. Role Report of the Committee of Presidents of Universities of Ontario which in fact set up the machinery, a very well oiled and colourful machinery for smashing the kind of dissent which he claimed is so destructive. He signed that report; he was complicit in the drawing up of a report which was deliberately set out to stop that kind of dissent before it got started.

Now, putting it in that perspective I tend to feel that the degree of communication is really very slight; that the establishment, or whatever you want to call it, was willing to make some changes only for the purpose and only so far as it will preserve the direction that society is now going in. Those changes can never effect any kind of reconciliation between the old or new values or abridge any kind of gap because it should be much more basic than that.

Mr. Johnson: What they seem to neglect is not just a question of such things as pollution of the air and the water. It is a question of the basis of this society—why, for the necessities of life—why should these be subjected to profit making—why must every time I go out and buy some food there is a certain percentage, usually quite a large percentage of packaged food products that is going up into the private pockets.

Every house that is built, you know, how much goes into the private pockets? The clothing I buy, everything. The society is based not upon providing for the needs of the people but upon making a profit.

Senator Hays: What country in your opinion is moving in the right direction?

Mr. Johnson: I don't know whether there is any country which is really moving in the right direction right now.

Senator Hays: You think they are all in the same boat?

Mr. Cain: Well, I think we are going...

Senator Hays: There is no country that you feel...

The Chairman: Well, I think while there are still some people left I am going to move to terminate the session. I don't mean to be rude to Senator Hays but I think we are going nowhere now and going into a discussion which perhaps doesn't relate to the study as it might. Do you wish to pursue that?

Senator Hays: No, that is fine.

The Chairman: Well then may I just put a final question to the guests here and perhaps we will ask each one of you—I quite concede it is a catch-all question but bearing in mind the things which interest us—number one, the ownership and control, and number two, the impact and influence of the mass media in Canada and considering the underground press for purposes of our study—as part of the overall mass media spectrum, what are the issues, if you will, that concern you and perhaps which we haven't talked about here today? May I just go around the room and see if any of you have anything else in closing you would like to say which you think would be of value to the Committee when it goes in to its deliberations stage in a few weeks' time.

I think that is a fair wrap-up question and is stated as broadly as I could possibly make it. We will start with Mr. McLeod.

Mr. McLeod: Well, first of all I would like to draw the attention of the Committee to pages 10 or 12 in which we outline the basic themes and the 22 topics which we deal with in the Georgia Straight. I don't think I will go through each one of these because I don't think we have the time but each one of these...

The Chairman: Would you like to speak on any one of them specifically?

Mr. McLeod: I don't want to spend a lot of time on them. You should look into these because these are things that we are dealing with in a different way than the establishment press is dealing with them. In some cases the establishment press is not dealing with them at all. We are not trying to set up a new ruling class or to establish a new ruling set of values with our paper. We are not trying to build a tribe that is going to take over the world or anything, but of course we are not foolowing along with public opinion either.

I would like just to read what I said about the question of should the mass media lead public opinion or follow it. In the brief it expresses my feelings about the one way in which the mass media misleads themselves through leading public opinion.

"The media should neither lead nor follow public opinion, but it must always be aware of it.

The establishment press tries to lead public opinion. Its purposes are definite and predictable—to make as much money as possible while defending the system which allows them to make as much money as possible. The establishment press has no use for free people not in their content or on their staffs; any staff member who wishes to express himself freely in the establishment media is not allowed to unless he is helping to fulfill the above purpose."

That is why you see articles on ecology in the establishment press because people want to hear about them. People want to buy it so that is why they print it. If people didn't want to buy the paper that had ecology in it they wouldn't print it.

"In contrast the free press does not have any well-defined purpose; it is unpredictable. And since we do not have the alternatives completely worked out, we are not so arrogant as to see our role as 'leading public opinion'. Rather, the role of a free press is to present an alternative to the establishment press, which we feel is de-humanizing both in its internal staff structure and its content."

The Chairman: Is that it?

Mr. McLeod: Yes.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Laxton would you like to add anything?

Mr. Laxton: Well, I would just like to say that I hope that the discussion has been helpful to the Committee. I would have thought that perhaps one of the most important questions that this Committee on the Mass Media would have been concerned with would have to do with freedom of the press. I think we have at least tried to talk about freedom of the press today in a real way because we are as underground newspapers—that section of the media that is feeling the pinch, the pressure exerted by the authorities to take away freedom of the press and it is obvious that the authorities have been using obscenity laws and criminal libel laws basically to stifle dissent.

I think this Committee should be deeply concerned about the stifling of dissent. If the Committee wants to do something about it, then I think it can accept the proposals that we have made, that is to recommend a repeal of the obscenity laws and the criminal libel laws and thus take away the weapons from the armory of those people who would attempt to put down criticism of the system.

All of the underground newspapers are concerned with the criticism of the system, challenging the values and I doubt if there is anybody in this room who thinks we have so perfect a society that it should be kept free of criticism.

If you accept that then you must give criticism an unfettered opportunity to express itself and the laws presently are being used to fetter and inhibit the true and full expression of dissenting opinions in our society. I would hope that this Committee would see fit to come up with a very strong recommendation that the laws which are presently on our books should not be used for this form of censorship.

I think the real hope for Canada is that the underground press and anyone else who wants to express a strong dissenting view of what is happening in this country be given that right with full encouragement and full freedom and this Committee has the power to make a clear statement in that regard. I would hope that if it did nothing else it would serve a vitally important function if it made a clear definition of rights of freedom of the press.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. Mr. Johnson?

Mr. Johnson: I would just like to briefly do a resume of what I think I would like my paper to be.

The Chairman: Fine.

Mr. Johnson: I think it should be a forum of the ideas of the community. These ideas are not necessarily those ideas that agree with my ideas. I will print an article which is very much opposed to what I believe in if it presents its case well so that it can stand on its arguments—on the arguments presented. So that it is not just being an alternative to the establishment media but also incorporating the best of their ideas as well.

Finally, in response to one question that was sent out in the original invitation "How would I define the freedom of the press?" I feel that freedom of the press should not be defined. It is a question of limits and the freedom of the press should not be limited.

The Chairman: Thank you. Mr. Stevens?

Mr. Stevens: Well, just briefly I think you have to remember that the major difference between a publication like Sweeney which I am involved with and the daily papers or the weekly papers that the regular dailies or weeklies are businesses. Their main purpose is to achieve a profit. That is why underground papers are around. I get no personal reward out of Sweeney other than the gratification when I think of something that should have been reported and wasn't, and gets into Sweeney.

All I have to gain or all anybody has to gain from the underground papers is social change. It is something in a constructive manner which I don't see the above ground papers promoting enough. To me that is the underground papers prime function to promote social change. It is a form of discussion of a different life style and different values.

The Chairman: Mr. Anderson?

Mr. Anderson: I really have nothing add. My colleagues have expressed it very well.

The Chairman: Mr. Harris?

Mr. Harris: Well, I don't think I have anything in particular to add except that I think that since we are in Ottawa we are available for further discussion perhaps on a less structured level.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Mr. Wetzel do you have anything you would like to say before we conclude?

Mr. Wetzel: I am more concerned to hear your feelings.

The Chairman: You will have to wait for the report, I am afraid. Mr. Westley?

Mr. Westley: I don't know. A lot has been said but I would sort of like to say briefly that I sort of enjoyed being here and being able to meet some of the people that are involved in the Senate and so on.

I think it is important that the underground press continue to publish. I think that the overground press is important in some respects—I read it, you know; I admit it. I think that what we have to do is as people—we simply have to come together somehow, understanding each other's position.

I fear it is going to take all the resources that we have in the next ten or twenty years to get by and I believe that the underground press is very important—if you can appreciate it, and dig it, well, that is great.

The Chairman: Thank you very much, Mr. Westley. Mr. O'Hara?

Mr. O'Hara: I would very strongly second the motion that one of the most important if not the most important contribution that a Committee of this type can make is to in fact make recommendations dealing with the freedom and removal of laws. This is partially so because I am sceptical of the effect that a report of the investigation into the ownership and control of the press can have on that press and the press' interaction with the people of Canada.

I think that for the press itself to challenge those interactions, to change those interactions drastically would be to jeopardize his own existence because of the nature of that press. I think it surely must be obvious from the investigation into ownership and control and the counter media that the alternatives to this are going to be bigger and stronger and affecting interaction with more and more people. Preservation at this point and its health at this point is going to be increasingly important to watch and see.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Well, it only remains for me to conclude the session and perhaps, I can do it this way by saying that even since I gave my original notice of motion in the Senate in November of 1968 I think that the underground press has made enormous strides both as individual papers and also collectively. I think a measure of those advances is the fact that to conduct the kind of a study which we are attempting, we felt compelled to ask you people here today. Now, by the same token I must say that it flatters us that you have come here more than you might imagine. I think your contribution has been helpful and perhaps ultimately it may prove also to be meaningful.

The Committee has about ten or fifteen more days of public hearings then we will be going into our report-writing phase and if any of you have additional thoughts pursuant to the discussion here today which you want us to have on a private and confidential basis then of course the Committee and I as its Chairman would be only too delighted to hear from you.

Thank you very much.

Before adjourning may I say to the Senators that we are devoting to-morrow to a discussion of weekly newspapers. We start in the morning by receiving a brief at 10:00 o'clock from the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association and Les Hebdomas du Canada. The meetings tomorrow are all in the Conference Centre. This evening at 8:30 we are going to hold a private "in camera" briefing session to discuss weeklies. That meeting will also be held at the Conference Centre.

Again, thank you to the people that came and the meeting is adjourned.

The Committee adjourned.

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE ON MASS MEDIA

EVIDENCE

Ottawa, Wednesday, March 11, 1970

The Special Senate Committee on Mass Media met this day at 10:00 a.m.

Senator Keith Davey (Chairman) in the Chair.

The Chairman: Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to call the meeting to order in just a moment or two. I am going to suggest the people who are sitting behind us here at the head table may be well advised to move to these chairs in front, if you do not mind.

Ladies and gentlemen, I am further advised before we begin the proceedings that, given the acoustics in this room, you would be well advised to wear these ear pieces throughout the day. From time to time we will have instant translation on them but, as I understand it, even when the witnesses are speaking in English for those who are English or in French for those who are French, you would still be well advised to wear these pieces so that we can hear each other.

Honourable Senators and ladies and gentlemen, today we turn our attention to the Canadian weekly newspaper industry and the role it plays in the overall spectrum of Canadian mass media. I think we have set before us a useful day and one which will provide the Senators certainly and others and perhaps even some weekly publishers with a further insight into their industry.

As part of its research program this Committee has conducted a study of the weekly newspaper industry. That study, as you know, is now complete. In specific preparation for this day the Committee invited the weekly press to comment on their industry. As a result the Committee received some 250 letters as well as some 225 replies to a financial questionnaire. As well formal briefs were submitted by eight individual weeklies and by the Saskatchewan Weekly Newspaper Association. Copies of these formal briefs are available at the Committee's offices, Suite 302, 140 Wellington Street.

We have decided to vary our format from our regular procedure in this hearing in order to broaden the actual participation by as many weekly publishers as was practical.

As I understand it, there will be throughout the course of the day about 100 publishers present—at least there were 100 publishers who indicated to us that it was their intention to attend at this session.

These 100 publishers and editors represent about 300 of the 874 Canadian weeklies. They come from eight provinces and they include English, French and bilingual publications.

I think in the material received when you arrived this morning you found the actual list of those people who are attending. I should perhaps also make clear at this point to the Senators and others that the representatives who are here today and publishers who are here today have arrived in Ottawa at their own expense.

Well now, perhaps I should just say a word about the program we have in front of us. I think you have some idea from the agenda you have received. In just a moment we are going to receive two formal briefs, one from the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association and the other from Les Hebdomas du Canada.

For the benefit of the Senators, I should say as far as these briefs are concerned we will follow the usual procedure. In other words I will call upon these representatives to make an oral statement. Following the oral statement we will have a formal question period with the questions being put by the Senators.

I am afraid for this morning's discussion, questions from the floor will not be in order.

Then this afternoon—I do not want to go into this in great detail now—but as you are perhaps aware we begin four one and a half hour panels. Now, the actual ground rules for these panels, how we intend to proceed with the discussion to maximize the discussion and involvement on the part of all persons, I can perhaps outline this afternoon.

All it is necessary to do now is to draw your attention to the topics we are discussing this afternoon, the role of the weekly, content, revenue and disbursement and so perhaps the Senators might be mindful in their questioning this morning of the fact that this afternoon we will be dealing with these specific matters so it may be that some of the questions you may want to put to these organizations might well be left until this afternoon.

However, I do not want to inhibit any discussion. I would also just perhaps draw two other points to your attention. One is that there is a lounge through these double doors off to my left which is available and will be available all day long for the weekly publishers and editors and, of course, for the Senators in which coffee will be served all day long. I hope as well as in the formal presentation this morning and the informal panels this afternoon that it will be possible for us to meet many of you on an informal basis in the other room.

Then I have been given a note pointing out—and I will perhaps point this out throughout the day—and I pointed it out to the people who are here with me at the front now, it is necessary in this room, as I understand it, to speak quite loudly.

The only alteration I am going to suggest we should make in the agenda is I would hope we might deal with the brief from the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association in about an hour. Perhaps we can then adjourn for a few minutes and come back and deal with the presentation of Les Hebdomas du Canada in about an hour so it might be possible for us to adjourn this morning at 12.30, which would give us at least an hour and a half for the break at the noon hour.

However, we will play that one by ear.

Now, Mr. Craven, if we can turn directly to your presentation. The brief which we requested from the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association was forwarded to us more than three weeks in advance, as we requested. You deal in fact with most of the guidelines and questions we asked you to address yourself to.

That brief has been circulated to the Senators and it has presumably been read and studied by them. The procedure we follow, contents of your brief and on your oral statement and in that oral statement you may amplify your brief, you can explain it or expand upon it, take things out of it, if you wish or anything else you want to do.

Following that we will proceed to the questioning. We will question you not only on the contents of your brief and on your oral statements but on other matters as well.

Perhaps before I formally introduce you I should introduce the rest of our guests. Sitting to my immediate left is the publisher of the North Battleford News-Optimist, Mr. Irwin McIntosh, who is the immediate past President of the Association, and Chairman of the Board.

Sitting next to Mr. Craven is Mr. Andrew McLean, who is the publisher of The Huron Expositor, Seaforth, Ontario and is the Chairman of the Postal and Parliamentary Committee. On the extreme left the first vice-president Mr. Charles Hawkins of Manitou, Manitoba. His publication is The Manitoba Western Canadian and there to the extreme right is the second vice-president Mr. Jack Parry from Rimbey, Alberta where he publishes The Rimbey Record.

Mr. Craven, I apologize for such a long introduction but I think some of the things had to be said. Will you now begin.

Mr. Gerald C. Craven, President, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association: Thank you very much. Honourable Senator Davey and Honourable Senators we of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association certainly welcome this opportunity of discussing with you this very viable community press which serves very important areas of Canada, be it rural or the bustling suburbs. It is a press, as you know, with the basic aim of helping the individual to understand his local environment. It is an industry generally self-sufficient, containing the seeds of regeneration.

It is perhaps a single voice, shall we say, in a very small community or in a large area when multiplied by the numbers of papers across Canada, representing millions of Canadians.

Now, the Committee has received our brief and I hope they have read it. It is at this time that I would like to review some of the highlights we have put in that brief.

The CWNA has served Canada for 50 years. It is the only nation-wide organization for weekly newspapers. While this Association has some 430 members belonging to it, there are about 800 possible weekly newspapers of which maybe 600 may be eligible for membership in our association.

The community weeklies will continue and prosper because of a need. The CWNA fosters community service by recognizing it with an annual award. The weekly newspaper informs its readers of what is going on in their own area and this fosters a sense of belonging to the community, without which people lose a sense of purpose.

The weekly is the last strong voice of the community as schools become regionalized, churches amalgamate and regional government bodies are being set up.

It is hard to believe, sir, that there are 24 Federal ridings in which there are no towns greater than 5,000. Likewise there are 52 ridings in which there are towns of a population of less than 10,000.

Now, the newspaper editors and publishers and writers are an altruistic group. They are not in business solely for the purpose of making money. Surely we like to make money but that is not our sole purpose.

Weekly editors seldom take a partisan view of politics. They are very fair and show both sides of a question or a party. The CWNA polls indicate the smaller paper, which presents facts and issues with no strong opinion, is now in the minority.

The weekly media no longer operates without competing media but it is the recorder of the local news and the local scene in that it cannot be duplicated by radio, television or dailies. In a paper of 3,000 circulation, there is an average of more than 1,000 local names each week. In the matter of parliamentary reports from the elected representatives, more than one-half of the papers surveyed recently by us described them as inadequate or intermittent.

Local news fills about 45 per cent of the editorial space in a weekly newspaper of all sizes. Social news about 15 per cent. Local town council averages about 5 per cent. Following the meetings of Council, they could run as high as 20 per cent of local news.

90 per cent of all the editorials of the weekly media are based on local themes, where they comment naturally on things that happen in our own town and our own village and our own area.

Most publishers of the long established weeklies have come up to their position from the shop. On Weeklies of more recent origin are mostly owned by corporations. Many of the new publishers had advertising or newspaper manager experience or had been reporters on the dailies.

More journalism graduates are being brought into our community press as we look towards the universities for our material.

Well, Senator, may I at this point ask Andy McLean, a member of the CWNA Directorate to give a few more further lights of our presentation this morning?

Mr. Andrew Y. McLean, Chairman, Postal and Parliamentary Committee, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association: Senator Davey and Honorable Senators. Like all media the weekly press is dependent upon advertising for its revenue. Surveys conducted by our Association indicate that it is necessary to carry approximately 55 per cent advertising in a given issue to show a profit.

Of this advertising content, approximately 83 per cent is from local sources. Perhaps it is significant, and the brief points this out, that as national advertising—which at one time was a very prominent part of the weekly revenue—decreases, there has been a corresponding increase—or so it would appear to those in the industry—in public relation releases, both from the government and from industry generally. This suggests perhaps that, perhaps while there is a drying up of national advertising as such, there seems to be an appreciation of the job which the weeklies can do in their particular fields. Otherwise the expenditures of these very substantial sums of public relation activities would appear to be of little avail.

We should point out, and the brief again emphasizes this, that in the face of the changed proportions that are arising in terms of the total advertising picture, the local merchants and the local citizens in the communities, who the weeklies are serving, are increasing their participation in its advertising programs.

These are the people, you will appreciate I am sure, sir, that are most familiar with the task which the weekly in a particular community is doing or can do. It is as a result of that knowledge that they are spending increasing amounts of their advertising dollar to carry their message.

The brief suggests that those responsible for the purchase of advertising on other than a purely local basis are depriving their advertising clients of a share of the market to which they are quite properly entitled.

We pointed out that there may be a decline in the number of small weeklies and this reflects perhaps a drying up of particular communities—the results that flow from the trend towards regionalization and population movement. However, the overall picture is that the aggregate circulation of the weeklies within the CWNA has increased. The degree of audience interest which the weekly maintains within its area is unequalled, we suggest, by any other media.

There is certainly no dropping away in readers of weeklies, as I pointed out earlier, despite the change-over of population from urban to rural.

Circulation, of course, must be a measure of the paper's acceptance and one of the yardsticks by which a person purchasing advertising may determine and appreciate the value that they are receiving.

Most Canadian weeklies are either members of ABC or are participants in the programs carried out by the CWNA to improve circulation.

There has been a reference to a necessity perhaps of a press council. The brief suggests that very little can be seen from the creation of such a body. There is a particular situation obtained in the areas and communities served by the weeklies; the editor and publisher is in day to day contact with those he is serving. He knows them personally or many of them. Certainly if there were any difficulties which might arise as a result of improper use of his media, then he would be very shortly informed of that situation and the economic results would encourage him or discourage him from any further action.

But, on the other hand, should it be determined that such a council is desirable, then the CWNA suggests that it should be composed of persons of the particular area for which it is responsible and that it also include persons who are conversant with and participating in the industry.

Like all other industries, the weekly industry is faced with rising equipment costs, problems of staff, additional wages, but these problems are in the main being met. The brief emphasizes the fact that the industry has within itself the capacity to meet these situations. It emphasizes that there is no desire on the part of weeklies in Canada to aspire towards handouts either from government or from any other agency in order to keep inefficient papers in business.

It only suggests—and the Association suggests—that there should be a recognition that the weekly can do a task in a given circumstance in the communities it serves in a manner unequalled by any other media.

There have been references to increased postal cost. Certainly this was a factor for a number of weeklies, perhaps a relatively limited number of weeklies, facing a particular situation in the larger centres or with particularly large circulations.

I think that the problem that the publisher faces today is not one so much of postal cost but one of postal service. The fact is that the inadequate delivery resulting in so many areas is causing the industry substantial concern.

Other representations have indicated the assistance which the industry provides to the post office and perhaps that should be emphasized; the fact that all output from publishing offices is labeled, packed and spelled out for a particular destination and that the handling in the rural areas and the community areas in any event entails no additional cost to the post office, certainly not to the extent that was indicated.

The individual subscriber in almost every rural centre is required, of course, to go to the post office to pickup his copy because, of course, in these communities there is no street delivery service.

Those are several of the problems or matters, perhaps, with which the Association is concerned.

I think certainly that the industry looks towards the seventies confident that it has the mechanical knowhow to proceed and that it has the background of editorial opinion and knowledge extending prior to Confederation. It looks forward to the next decade with confidence. Perhaps Irwin McIntosh of the North Battleford News-Optimist might develop that particular situation in greater detail, sir.

The Chairman: Thank you very much.

Mr. C. Irwin McIntosh, Chairman of the Board, Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association: Thank you very much, Mr. McLean. Senator Davey, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen. I wish to give some observations about the future of the Canadian weekly newspaper industry and sum up the opinion of our Association in that regard.

As the weekly industry enters a new decade, inevitably many changes will occur. Corporate weekly ownership will increase. Dailies and groups will continue to reach into the weekly field through new acquisitions.

The number of newspapers with over 2000 circulation will increase. Indeed, that has been one of the salient features of change in our Association in the past decade.

Publishing failures in the weekly field have always been a part of the trade cycle. With the appearance of new technological reproduction methods in the sixties, the numbers of failures, mergers and takeovers rose and will continue, particularly among the smaller weeklies.

Many new weeklies will also be founded in the next 10 years in opposition to established weeklies or in lieu of them, reflecting changes in population movement, the influx of new journalism students, the expansion within the trade itself and the increasing use of general offset printing plants, which eliminate the need for costly production equipment at the weekly's plant or source.

The use of central offset printing plants throughout Canada serving additional established weeklies will increase, serving areas up to 150 miles away. Weekly circulation will increase in areas now served by acceptable publications even if numbers of publications in that area diminish.

Weekly publication dates will vary from a wide spectrum of the weekly calendar rather than the conventional Wednesday or Thursday edition dates.

In the metropolitan areas, where established newspapers exist, a strong competitive spirit, market research and circulation drives will prevent in-roads from new competitors.

In small communities, again reflecting regionalization, which is becoming an increasing factor in our industry, as it is in Canada, expansion by existing weeklies into the surrounding areas, will continue, generally taking over or merging with smaller newspapers in those communities.

The income from the national advertising dollar will gradually increase in the seventies as large companies and agencies re-discover the stability of the print media. Total advertising will increase for classified and local sections of the newspaper. The trend towards deeper community awareness will continue.

Honourable Senators, in summing up the opinion of this Association I would like to say that the nation's independent weekly press is synonymous with the independent community each newspaper represents. Yet, in its coming of age (both editorially and technologically), the weekly has been sharp in the change and crisis of the last 100 years.

Today the publisher is part of the whole local environment which he must constantly interpret and articulate. In the 1950's and 1960's the weekly dominated the media field in the mass use of offset reproduction equipment and have led in building cross-country networks of offset printing plants to sustain their scattered newspapers.

The coming era will bring in further electronic advances to the entire industry and this change-over has now begun.

Despite this enormous importance in the last two decades, while still there is much to be done, the weeklies are determined to use computerized data to renew their image to national advertisers and recapture that market, lost to others.

Today increasing number of escapees from urban living and a new crop of Canadian journalistic groups are heading for the suburbs and smaller communities.

What is usually forgotten about the old-fashioned media is that it was able to survive and emerge as a well-balanced structure within the turbulent field of communications.

The weekly media as represented by this brief has also mapped out its future. Based on its past experience and capabilities the industry generally is self-sufficient, but as in the past, the seeds of regeneration must come from within. It has no need for a "Big Brother" to watch over it.

I would like in conclusion, Honourable Senators, to suggest to you again the definition we place on the weekly newspaper.

"To help the individual understand his local environment is the aim of the community press."

I wish to express to you, sir, the thanks of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association for the opportunity to present our views to the Media Committee.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. McIntosh, Mr. McLean and Mr. Craven. I think we would like to go on the questioning period.

I think, Mr. Craven, we would like to direct our questions to you although the Senators should feel free to direct questions to all of the people here. If you want to comment on any one of the questions, that is fine.

Mr. Craven: I do not have all of the answers, Senator Davey.

The Chairman: I am sure no one has all of the answers.

Mr. Craven: I am sure that we will have free access to your Committee here.

The Chairman: I think we will hear from others this afternoon. This morning we want to hear from you people. You say "No one has all of the answers"; Senator McElman doesn't have all the questions, but he has the first one.

Senator McElman: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Craven, I understand from the briefs and the remarks which Mr. McLean has made your attitude towards press councils. This is from the weekly's standpoint.

Does your view of that also encompass the dailies?

Mr. Craven: No. These views we have come entirely from our own organization, as far as we are concerned.

Senator McElman: But the view that you have expressed with respect to your own organization, do you feel that would apply as well in the case of the dailies?

Mr. McLean: I have no idea as to what attitude the dailies might adopt. I can see no reason why it would not be perhaps a common situation, but the comments that we included are applicable to weeklies.

Senator McElman: But the principles you express would encompass the newspapers.

Mr. McLean: Yes.

The Chairman: I would like to be more specific on that. Would you favour a press council for the daily newspapers?

Mr. Craven: But not the weeklies.

The Chairman: My question is: do you favour a press council for daily newspapers?

Mr. Craven: What do you think about that?

Mr. McLean: Why do you not answer?

Mr. Craven: As far as we are concerned we can see the advantage, yes, of a press council if the dailies need one. I can see the advantage of one. I can see the point. It could be used in a daily.

The Chairman: Does anybody want to comment on that?

Mr. McIntosh: My own opinion, Mr. Chairman, is that that is a very interesting question to put to us. The regional character of the weekly newspaper is such that a national press council might not give in Canada the type of service that is often envisaged.

I think we must allow the dailies to speak for themselves because latterly we have had very little to do with the daily press in Canada.

Some years ago the two Associations decided to sever their connections and really we have had very little to do with them, as far as the press is concerned.

The Chairman: Mr. McIntosh's point is that the dailies should express their own opinion. In fact, most of them have. A great many of them have been here. They have all expressed opinions.

I think the attitude of the Weekly Association to a press council for daily papers is germane. I think we are interested in your view. I do not think you should feel today incidentally that all your comments need be addressed simply to CWNA or indeed to the weeklies.

We are interested in your opinion on the subject matter. We will ask you questions about the entire spectrum and everything you say here is privileged.

Senator McElman: I would like to refer to the September, 1969 issue of the Canadian Weekly Publisher. That is your organ.

Mr. Craven: Yes.

Senator McElman: I would just quote from it very briefly.

"Senator Keith Davey told CWNA convention delegates in Halifax... 'You have a good story to tell but you haven't told it very well'".

It goes on in more detail.

The question I would like to put to you is Mr. Craven, what changes have you actually made or proposed that would tell your story better, not only to yourselves but to your readers?

Mr. Craven: I think the encouragement of more trained journalists.

I think this has possibly been one of our biggest downfalls or stumbling blocks. Possibly our industry did not have the high calibre of trained journalists that the daily newspaper might have. However, we are working towards this and there are more young journalists coming into the Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association.

Last fall, for example, at the British Columbia Annual Convention we invited the journalism class of the University to sit in. There were seven of the class there. After the three day convention five, who graduated in June, were signed up to enter the weekly press. I think that possibly if we could get more awareness of what is going on in our community, in our areas, I think then we become more involved in the community.

Senator McElman: That is fine, but what I am asking is: it is six months since you had your 50th convention in Halifax. I am asking you what concrete steps have you taken or proposed in that six months to achieve what you say here is necessary?

Mr. Craven: I do not think there have been any definite steps taken. I would like Mr. McLean to answer.

Mr. McLean: No specific steps. However, the programme, I think, Honourable Senator, envisages an increasing assistance through seminars or study groups or that type of thing to equip better the people of the weekly press in their job of discerning the story of their particular community.

Those seminars have been under discussion. They are being conducted, many of them, at the provincial level with certain encouragement from the National Association.

Mr. McIntosh: I would like to say that across Canada many of the Provincial Associations have really worked hard and they have tried to bring good speakers and lecturers from the various universities across North America into this type of thing.

I think the real problems, however, that we feel we have, are not the problems in our communities but are national problems. How do you talk to people in Toronto or Montreal who are Montreal orientated to tell them the story of the suburbs, to tell the story of rural Canada?

This is where we have lost out. We have got lost out in our own community, in my view.

Where we have lost out is where the differences are taking place in national advertisers' dollars. I think this is the concern of the Canadian weekly newspaper industry.

The Chairman: I will ask Senator McElman: did your question relate to the sales and circulation or to editorial content?

Senator McElman: I was referring specifically to the editorial content and getting the story of the weeklies across.

On page 5, paragraph 3, of your brief your state: "That only such newspapers as perform a service to their communities are accepted as members."

In numerous letters, briefs and materials that have come to our attention, we have been told that the weeklies are primarily a business rather than a community service.

Your brief is silent here. Would you care to comment?

Mr. Craven: Well, it is a business too.

Senator McElman: I said "primarily."

Mr. Craven: I would say so. I would say we are primarily a business association, although our members do have to live up to certain requirements in order to obtain membership.

For example, they have to have a certain percentage of editorial content in a paper.

Classified in the 874 papers, which Senator Davey mentioned, would be included a lot of publications which are being published as a weekly newspaper—and they are weekly newspapers because they are published weekly—but they are advertising sheets with no editorial comment whatsoever in them. We say they must contain a proportion of editorial comment.

Senator McElman: These people would not qualify.

Mr. Craven: No. that is the reason I say there are only 600 that would really qualify for membership in the CWNA.

Senator McElman: In addition to these two qualifications required, what other requirements are there for membership?

Mr. Craven: The payment of dues, which is one of the reasons why we have possibly lost as much of our membership as we have. We could have had a much larger membership if these members did not have to pay dues, but no organization can operate without having financial assistance coming in from some source.

Senator McElman: You do not feel the dues are prohibitive to some newspapers?

Mr. Craven: They do.

Mr. McIntosh: May I interject?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. McIntosh: One of the things that has always concerned our Association is the large amounts of Canadian advertising in what are supposedly weekly newspapers when many of them are not. They are not newspapers with emphasis on the news. They do not perform a total reporting of their communities and they would not qualify for membership in our Association because they do not. This is one of the things that disturbs us when someone says there are 874 weekly newspapers in Canada.

What Canadian advertising has done too often is changed a weekly into a classified publication. That is something to which we object.

The Chairman: I have just been listening to your figures. There are about 170 weekly papers in Canada—have I anticipated your question?

Senator McElman: No, please go ahead.

The Chairman: ...which do not belong. Why do they not belong? Are they not qualified for membership?

Mr. McIntosh: No, Mr. Craven just said, sir, there are 600 who could belong. The brief says of the 430 who do, a good portion of those may disagree with some of the objectives of our Association, that we are not active enough in our solicitation of national advertising. That is one way in which we find ourselves in a box. That is only one view.

Senator McElman: Some have expressed that view.

Mr. McIntosh: Some have expressed that view, yes. There are differences of opinions as to the objective of our Association. In addition there are a lot of marginal weekly newspapers in Canada that may not be able to afford our dues.

The Chairman: But he said 600 could belong and there are 170 who do not. I am curious. Do you solicit membership from these 170? Do you approach them to belong to your Association?

Mr. Craven: One of the problems we have is that at the present time we are only now going out after these 170. We will be reaching them. We are going to put on a very strong programme of encouragement.

However, first of all, we will do it by mail and then we will do it by personal contact.

We are going to see what is wrong. What is it we are not doing and what is it we should be doing.

The Chairman: Do you reject applications?

Mr. Craven: No, we do not reject applications unless they cannot fulfil our requirements.

The Chairman: How often does this happen? How many applications for membership have you rejected in the last year, for example?

Mr. Craven: We have not rejected any that have ever come to us that have been living within our requirements.

The Chairman: To how many who have come to you, have you said, "I am sorry, you do not qualify"?

Mr. Craven: None. This has not been happening.

The Chairman: For my own information, I would be curious to know. Are there member papers—this is not a question that I am putting to you—are there members of other papers represented here who are not members of the CWNA?

Mr. Craven: There are some, yes.

The Chairman: That is something we might well talk about this afternoon.

Mr. Craven: I did mention there are some people who are not members here.

Senator McElman: I have before me a brief of a non-member and this comment comes from it. "For a good many years we were members of CWNA but resigned our membership a year ago when we decided that the Association was not sufficiently interested in the opinions of its members but was inclined to live in an ivory tower."

Would you comment on that?

Mr. Craven: Well, I think our ivory tower has fallen, if that is what they think has happened. I would certainly welcome them member into our membership here because think we can offer that member some reasonable services that he will want or can use.

I will admit that two or three years ago we launched on various projects which did not materialize with the result members felt we were not fulfilling our duties.

We are certainly interested in every Canadian weekly newspaper. If we were not interested, we would not be here today. We do think the strength of the Canadian weeklies is their pride and there is every opportunity for a member to join.

We want him and not only do we want him, but we think he needs us.

Senator McElman: You would say, Mr. Craven, that the comment we used to hear several years ago from so many of the weekly publishers or owners, that the CWNA convention was simply a fine social gathering, is no longer applicable?

Mr. Craven: Well, there is certainly lots of sociality at a convention but we try at every convention to have something very worthwhile for every paper, if they would only attend. We have seminars.

We bring in outstanding speakers to give all kinds of advice. We try to give them something that is really worthwhile. I think many of those member papers who should be receiving our message are not there.

Mr. McIntosh: I just want to assure this audience—if I may interject, Mr. Chairman—that we thought so highly of the Senate Committee that we invited its Chairman to our convention this year. We do hold our conventions right across Canada and by doing this we think it encourages publishers to attend them.

If we hold one in the Maritimes we rather expect more Maritimers to be present. If we held them in the west, we expect more westerners. Of course, that was said jocularly.

Senator McElman: Yes, I appreciate that.

The Chairman: That certainly demonstrates they do not always have outstanding speakers.

Senator McElman: Mr. Craven, would you explain the relationship between your Association and the provincial Weekly Newspaper Associations and Les Hebdos du Canada?

Mr. Craven: Well, as far as the provincial Associations go, we work closely with them and, as a matter of fact, we have representatives...

Senator McElman: Are you a federation?

Mr. Craven: No, we are not. We hope that this is one of our shall we say—ivory tower thoughts. He hopes that some day we will become a federation. The members feel this should mean that as far as there should be one schedule of fees and we should be a federation tying together all the provincial ideas and ideals.

Rather than to be working on conflicting interests, we should be working together.

At the present time we are both selling national advertising. Provincial bodies are selling provincial advertising and they are after provincial dues. We are after national dues.

There is a certain amount of continuous conflict in a friendly way. However we work together harmoniously. For example a provincial organization will come to us or we will go to them, especially if there is a problem or anything and we do help one another.

So there is great harmony between the two. However, we can see where a federation would be the ideal. Our past president of this Association said—this was 15 years ago—we should be a federation, and I think I believe that.

We have had co-operation with Les Hebdos. They have their own organization and they work very well in their own group. But we have worked together. We have worked with them and we will continue to work with them in the years to come, because I do think this organization should be a combined organization of all Canada.

I mean, after all we are not going to isolate from the national body one part because it happens to have its own body of members. We invite them and they work very well with us.

For example, when we have a meeting in Montreal or Quebec, they are there and we are with them.

Senator McElman: In your brief on page 27...

The Chairman: I wanted to ask you some questions about Les hebdos. I want to interject a supplementary question.

As I understand it from their brief, Les Hebdos from time to time have been on record as supporting the idea of a press council.

Why would they support it and you would not?

Mr. Craven: Maybe they need it.

The Chairman: Why do you think they need it and you do not need it?

Mr. Craven: I feel that we still have within our own organization areas—if we make a mistake...

The Chairman: Do you think they need a press council?

Mr. Craven: I do not see why they need it any more than we would.

The Chairman: You do not think they need one either?

Mr. Craven: No, I cannot see why they need one.

Senator McElman: On page 27, paragraph 74, under the heading of "Ownership by Acquisition" you say:

"The Brief is not discussing in detail the merging, takeover, or acquisition of weeklies by groups, dailies, or other corporations."

In view of the falling total number of weeklies in Canada with reference particularly to one group of them—it does not apply only to the Thomson group, which appears to be moving towards strong weeklies and with the stated view of raising them to dailies—do you not think it is rather important to the future of the weeklies and to your Association in particular that you should refer in some detail to this developing situation?

Mr. Craven: Well, I can see where there are going to be more takeovers by larger corporations. I think, as far as the Thomson group are concerned or at least as far as their point of view is concerned, they are still members of CWNA. All their weekly papers—I believe they have 13 weekly papers in Canada—are members of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association, as far as I know. The other group—The Telegram group, the Inland Printers around Toronto, who purchase some papers there; I think this was a move which was necessary for them.

The Chairman: For whom?

Mr. Craven: For the dailies. For The Telegram in order to maintain and hold that market because I think they were afraid there would be in-roads by some other organization that would cut into their territory. They are all members of the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association.

The Chairman: I think you really never answered the question Senator McElman asked, which was: why do you not discuss these things in your brief? Why do you feel you should not comment on the subject?

Mr. McIntosh: I do not think within the total membership or circulation of the Canadian weekly industry that it is a very significant section.

The Chairman: It is a section though.

Mr. McIntosh: It could be. In a smaller community, Senator Davey, this competition is a relatively easy thing. If they do not perform a viable service in a community, it is a relatively simple thing to have competition. They must perform efficiently or they will have competition.

After all, to publish a weekly newspaper is not as difficult a thing as to publish a daily. Someone said it probably takes several million dollars to establish a daily. That is not true of a weekly newspaper.

The Chairman: This point is not one which concerns you then?

Mr. McIntosh: I do not think it is, sir, no.

The Chairman: I thought one of the great virtues of a weekly newspaper and one which you have talked about in your brief at length, is that it maintains interest in local issues.

I think the word you used was "understanding his local environment."

Can you continue to understand one's local environment if there is an on-going process of absentee ownership in the weekly newspaper industry?

Mr. McIntosh: My reference would be to the effect that, if that ownership does not provide a viable service, it will have competition. I think that some Thomson papers have had serious competition.

The Chairman: May I ask another question. The question is: does the Association have any concern about the concentration of absentee ownerships?

Mr. Craven: We may have absentee ownership but we certainly do not have the absentee of an operation group. They still maintain their editor and their publisher in that area. These areas are the only thing about which the papers are concerned.

For example, none of the papers around Toronto flow out into other areas. They concentrate on a certain area. That is all they have and there they maintain an editor w is interested in that area and works for that area.

The Chairman: In one of those papers, if there was a conflict of editorial judgment between the editor and Mr. Bassett the general manager how would the conflict be resolved?

Mr. Craven: If there were a conflict between Mr. Bassett and the editor, Mr. Bassett would have the last say.

The Chairman: Even if he may have lived in that town all his life. Is that a good situation?

Mr. Craven: Well, it is not a good situation but it is the one which exists. We have to face it.

Senator McElman: Thomson acquisitions are for the most part in one-newspaper towns. Is that right?

Mr. Craven: Yes.

Senator McElman: But they remain members of your Association. Let us say the approach of this group or another merging group—since you say it is not a difficult thing financially to insatll competition in a one-newspaper town if the incumbent is not doing its job, were not acquisition, but the establishment of competition by a financially-strong chain, which is a thing you say can come. What would be the attitude of your Association to this approach?

This is acquisition at the local level by a head office which performs services for all of the accounting, billing, obtaining of advertising and so on.

What would be the attitude of your Association if the Thomson chain, rather than by acquisitions, established new complete plants such as you refer to? What would be your attitude toward the chains?

Mr. Craven: I do not know how to answer that. I can see this has happened and is happening and in one case it has happened.

Senator McElman: Which is the case? We would be interested to know.

Mr. Craven: The case I have in mind is the one at Pictou, Nova Scotia. This is a case where a strong financial body moved into the area.

Now, I did not think it was our place to go to this member of our Association and tell him he cannot go in there. Possibly if the papers in those areas might have been a bit stronger, maybe he could not have got a toe-hold. But he has got it now.

The Chairman: I think the Senators would be interested in a brief resume of the circumstances in Pictou.

Mr. Craven: Apparently what happened...

The Chairman: There was a weekly paper?

Mr. Craven: There was a weekly paper. As a matter of fact it was a weekly paper of a fair sized circulation and...

The Chairman: ...who was a member of the Association?

Mr. Craven: And who was a member of the Association and still is a member of the Association.

Another member of our Association who is strong and who has an extra good paper at Yarmouth wanted to expand. I know his plans. At least, I have an idea that in a way he hopes eventually to get into the daily field.

Whether or not he does, I do not know, but he wanted to expand his operation out of Yarmouth.

He approached the other paper at Pictou to see if he could buy it. All he wanted to buy was the circulation. He did not want anything else. The price he offered, possibly they felt was too low. Maybe it wasn't. I don't know.

Then he said I will start up anyway. Apparently he has.

There was some opposition by the other weekly newspaper around that area because they felt it was not right that a man should come in on his neighbour and do this.

The Chairman: So presently there are two weeklies published in Pictou?

Mr. Craven: Yes.

The Chairman: They are both members of the Association?

Mr. Craven: They are both members of the Association. Where do we stand? We cannot go to one and say "Keep away." We cannot go to the other one. Both are good members.

Senator McElman: Under the circumstances that is true, is it not? At one point the provincial Association could have tried to stop this thing happening.

Mr. Craven: They tried to. It was their opinion that they should do this.

The Chairman: You do not have the same attitude.

Mr. Craven: No.

Senator McElman: Just one further question along this line. Do you feel that if it is not a group, such as Thomson again, that the really local newspaper weekly could actually survive against such competition? If they came in in Pictou—I am not saying they would—but if they did, could you survive it?

Mr. Craven: If they are financially and actively able to participate and fight the establishment, shall we say, they could survive.

But if they just more or less throw up their hands, I would say they would die and that could happen.

I think there are a number of Thomson papers that have been purchased because the owners wanted to sell and they had a good strong weekly newspaper. Very few people have sufficient funds with which they can outbid them.

I think this is one of the reasons that publishers of weekly newspapers are going to Thomson. I do not think that Thomson approaches them nearly as much as the local publishers approach Thomson and say, "Will you buy my paper that is making $25,000 or $35,000 a year?" "Here is a paper that I will sell you."

The Chairman: You say this does not concern you. At what point would you become concerned.

Mr. Craven: Well, as long as the Thomson paper still belongs to the Association, what is the difference?

The Chairman: What if Thomson had half the papers. Would you be concerned?

In other words, one of the questions we have been trying to answer here is: how much concentration is too much? We have heard a lot about concentration.

Certainly there are many valid reasons why some of these things are happening but notwithstanding the validity of many of these reasons, at what point does the concentration become a concern to your Association?

Mr. McIntosh: I hate to be interrupting all the time but I think one thing is clear that in many locations where Thomson has purchased a weekly newspaper and turned it into a daily, the next day he wakes up and he finds he has a weekly newspaper competitor.

You can look across Canada. You will find this very thing happening. I know it has happened in Kamloops. I know it has happened in many communities across the country where all of a sudden you have an ownership that is not local. The next thing you find the real weekly newspaper has been turned into a chain. I will come back to the point.

The Chairman: May I ask you a question. I was going to ask you your attitude towards concentration of ownership in the daily newspaper field. Does this concern you at all?

Mr. McIntosh: I think it concerns every Canadian. My own opinion is that the locally-owned newspaper is the best thing for a community. I make no bones about that contention. I think probably most of our publishers feel the same way.

We certainly have learned an awful lot of lessons from chain operations and yet, on the other hand, it was the locally owned newspapers that pioneered the offset press and electronic reproduction in the newspaper industry which has become so paramount.

So, maybe we have taught them some things.

The Chairman: Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: I would like to have a comment by somebody present or someone else at the table with regard to whether they believe it is in the public interest in general and in the interests of the service to the community and indeed to the owners and publishers of small country weeklies in a province as small as Nova Scotia that absentee ownership should be growing there at the rate it is.

I would like to refer to something. All I know is what I read in the newspaper and in this instance it is a daily paper. The Halifax newspaper tells me that a publishing company in London, Ontario very recently bought out the Truro Daily News, which is a small daily newspaper, and other small weeklies in central and eastern Nova Scotia, which was owned by the former owner of the Truro Daily News and one or two are pretty substantial weekly newspapers.

What also bothers me is the effect on the local industry in some of the small communities because I am told by the same news item that one of the intentions of the new owner from London, Ontario, is to install very expensive offset printing presses which will give them the capacity not only to publish a daily and these weeklies but to take on other customers.

Now, with the combination of what is happening to western Nova Scotia and this trend to gobble up individual ownership and be responsible, in other words, for the local information and service which you people have given over a good many years—does this worry you as an organization and personally?

Mr. Craven: Yes. I can see where this loss of local ownership certainly must have an effect on the community. If it is not funds that they are after—and I do not know what the financial picture of some of these are—and if the paper is dying and is taken over by some of these larger groups, then I think it is good for the community.

I would hate to see a large corporation gobble me up.

Senator Smith: Do you think there is anything one should consider doing about the situation? It could very easily develop into acquisitions owning the whole weekly newspaper publishing field in the Province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. Craven: That is right.

Senator Smith: Is that good for our province?

Mr. Craven: No. It might be economic. This might be the thing that is causing it or bringing it into force.

Senator Smith: It sort of worries me in principle really. Thank you.

Mr. Craven: I know your own paper in your own town very well. I know you must be very concerned about it.

Senator Smith: Yes, we are concerned in the community of Liverpool, Nova Scotia, with regard to that weekly; the Liverpool Advance, which has been published for a good many years.

The Chairman: I am afraid campaign speeches are not in order, Senator.

Senator Smith: Well, I will have to find my own lunch ticket.

Mr. McIntosh: May I say something here? There are two different situations entirely here. I think one is centralized printing and the other is centralized publishing. There are a great number of newspapers which have nothing to do with the editorial content or ownership. It is simply put up as a commercial printing shop.

Of course, there is centralized ownership which is a creation sometimes out of the same pot. There are two different concepts.

The Chairman: Have you anything further, Senator Smith?

Senator Smith: Yes. This has nothing to do with the former subject. I was interested in some information with regard to combined advertising services that has a nucleus, I understand, of 23 weeklies in British Columbia and Alberta for the purpose of getting advertising.

Is that one of the reasons why the Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association has not been able to project themselves into national advertising?

Mr. McIntosh: I think in order to provide that kind of service, specifically, you can do this more as a regional paper, if they can have a provincial group which will work for their own organization. I cannot see a larger provincial group supplying me with advertising from their area, but they can certainly get advertising for their own papers and from their own partners.

The Chairman: Senator Kinnear?

Senator Kinnear: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if someone would tell us how many weeklies are using offset printing now?

Mr. Craven: I think 55 per cent of our membership at the present time have gone offset and the trend is moving fast, very rapidly.

In Southwestern Ontario I can only think of about three papers west of London that are printed by any other means than offset and this same group print 23 of its papers in its own shop, in one central shop.

Senator Kinnear: That happens to be the same percentage of advertising you have in the papers, 55 per cent, and it is much cheaper, I presume?

Mr. Craven: Yes. Not only much cheaper but the reproduction is far superior to letter press.

I think that is the biggest competition that the dailies have because we can reproduce so much cheaper and so much better. This is one reason why we get recognition.

Senator Kinnear: Are you using a great deal of colour?

Mr. Craven: We do use colour, maybe not as much as we should, but we do use it. We use it, and as a matter of fact we go to full colour.

The Chairman: Mr. Craven, I want to ask you one last question and then we will turn to Les Hebdos.

I note on page 20 of your brief you talk about the weekly as a 'national advertising vehicle'. You say: "The benefits the weekly community press can offer the national advertiser include..."—and then you list six benefits. You really do not quote facts and figures except to say that advertising agencies are preoccupied with "market penetration as the sole measure of determining advertising success."

However, as I said yesterday with the underground press, we are living in a real world. These people laughed but you will not. We do live in a real world. The simple fact of life is that the agencies, as I understand it, want these facts and figures. What steps is CWNA taking to provide that kind of information to advertising agencies?

Mr. Craven: We have had what is known as a rate and data manual which is published supposedly every two years. We feel that this organ is not sufficiently up to date.

We are giving some consideration to computerizing our material so that we will be able to give the advertiser instant information as to the number of homes a market has. That is on that very point and that is what we are hoping we can do eventually, but this is another project which we intend to give some consideration to maybe this week as we meet in our semi-annual meeting.

The Chairman: Would you agree that to secure national advertising your own paper—as an example, I am asking about your specific paper—will almost have to take part in a group approach, that is the CWNA approach.

Mr. Craven: I think so, yes. I think a paper has very little chance because...

The Chairman: The rates are so low for an agency that a 15 per cent commission is meaningless to the agency. They cannot really put on a production.

Mr. Craven: That is it exactly and I think possibly this may be one of our downfalls in not getting more national advertising. The fact is that we are not prepared to give sufficient commission to the agencies because it does cost considerably more to service the weekly newspapers than it does to service daily newspapers.

The Chairman: But you still have not taken any specific steps. You are saying you are going to discuss it. It seems to me you are always saying you are going to discuss it. Is that a valid observation?

Mr. Craven: It is a valid observation and it is one observation which is being looked into very closely and there are immediate steps being taken. We are hoping to start within the next two months to look right into the business of getting material available.

Mr. McIntosh: I just want to say, Senator Davey, this has been one of the failures of the weekly newspaper industry in Canada.

I happen to be the Vice-President of two groups that are operating in the national advertising field and on each occasion just before I took the next step up the ladder they saw fit to either merge in one case, or to disband in another case.

The problem we had was one of resources, one of high costs to individual members and regionalization, particularly regionalization, I think, in Canada.

The fact is that it is probably better for the Canadian weekly newspaper to market advertising on a regional basis—as the group in British Columbia have done so successfully, I might add—rather than on a national basis. I would think probably one of the hopes of our Association is that once the regions are convinced about the business of selling regional advertising, we might have some type of national sales organization come from these particular groups.

The Chairman: Well, if I may volunteer what I consider to be a rather realistic observation which is even more apparent to me now than when I met many of you in Halifax before the Committee got underway. I am very impressed that the weeklies could develop an effective advertising sales approach. You are in major league competition.

Senator Bourque, do you have a question?

Senator Bourque: Yes. There is one I would like to ask, and that regards the scarcity of English weeklies in Montreal.

I would like you to know, sir, why I can get eight or ten French weekly newspapers, but no English on Sunday. You can probably get Montreal Star. You have the Gazette. You can get the Toronto Star. You can buy those, but those are daily papers. But if you want to read English literature on a Sunday—I am French-Canadian, but my wife is English and I have to buy both for myself and for my wife—you cannot.

I can buy seven or eight papers for myself but for my wife I can only bring her The Enquirer, which comes from the United States. I was just wondering why there were not more English weekly papers published.

Mr. Craven: I think, Senator, quite a few English weekly newspapers are being published in Montreal and in that area.

Senator Bourque: Would you give me the names.

Mr. Craven: Well, there is the Montreal Monitor.

Senator Bourque: Yes. That is only part of Montreal. I will leave out Outremont and I will leave out the little weekly papers. We have Lachine in our place plus I am thinking of the weekly paper that gives out the news like Le Petit-Journal and Photo-Journal and all those weekly papers.

Mr. Craven: We have eight or ten of them. We have no papers of that nature. Perhaps Mr. Miller would care to answer for me regarding that.

The Chairman: I am going to rule that out of order. We will be talking to Mr. Miller this afternoon.

Mr. Craven: There are only regional papers which are published in Montreal in English, I understand it. For example in Westmount there is the Westmount Examiner and there is the Montreal Monitor in each group, but there is no overall weekly newspaper covering the entire City of Montreal.

Senator Bourque: Frankly I think there could be a big sale if there was.

Mr. Craven: I understand they tried to set one up in Quebec, but it lasted just two months.

Senator Bourque: Well, some papers, you know, last a long time. It depends on the administration. I think if an organization would start up a weekly newspaper or if a couple of weekly newspapers started with all kinds of news, like the French papers, there would be a great market for them.

The Chairman: Well, thank you, Senator. Thank you gentlemen.

May I say for the benefit of the members of the CWNNA and for other people in the room, there are many other questions which we have to ask you but I should remind you, as I did in my opening statement, that this afternoon we will be hearing from people at the microphones and the Senators will be available to question you at that time.

I certainly have many questions and I am sure others will want to ask you questions. Perhaps we can deal with many of these questions this afternoon.

I will now thank the CWNNA and I would ask the representation of Les Hebdomadaires du Canada to come forward please.

Thank you very much, gentlemen.

I had said earlier that I might adjourn now for some sort of coffee break. I am afraid our timetable will not allow us to have any formal adjournment, so with the exception of the Senators, I may say if any of our guests wish to go into the other room and partake of coffee, that is their pleasure.

I am not urging you to leave. I hope you will stay and listen to this brief.

I may say the other representatives we have had before us from Quebec have not been this shy.

Short recess.

The Chairman: If I may call the meeting to order. I would like to begin by introducing the representatives who are here from Les Hebdomadaires du Canada.

Sitting on my immediate right is the President, Mr. Yves Gagnon. Mr. Gagnon is the publisher of Le Canada-Français, St-Jean, Quebec.

Interestingly enough, he was telling me just a moment or two ago that he has very recently been appointed a professor of journalism at Laval and of course has now moved to Quebec City.

Sitting on his right is monsieur Lucien Fontaine, who is Honorary Secretary of the organization. Mr. Fontaine has five papers in the Abitibi region of Quebec.

On my immediate left is monsieur Vincent Rodrigue, publisher of L'Éclaireur-Progress, St-Georges-Est. He is the First Vice-President of the organization. Sitting next to him is monsieur Fernand Berthiaume. Mr. Berthiaume publishes a paper in Lachute, Quebec. Mr. Berthiaume is the Second Vice-President. And sitting next to him and also next to Senator Bourque is monsieur Jean-Paul Légaré, who is Permanent Secretary of Les Hebdos du Canada.

Mr. Gagnon, the brief which you were kind enough to prepare unhappily has only arrived within the last 24 hours. This has certain disadvantages for us. One is that we have been unable to translate it, so this is a problem for some of us who are English-speaking.

Secondly, even for those who are French-speaking, there really has not been an opportunity to study the brief. I am going to suggest, therefore, that you could perhaps call on your academic abilities to summarize it for us now and then we will proceed to question you.

Mr. Yves Gagnon, President, Les Hebdos du Canada: Yes. Like I...

The Chairman: In French, if you wish. We have simultaneous translation.

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Gagnon, President of Hebdos du Canada (Canadian Weeklies): As I mentioned a while ago, I wish to apologize for the fact that the brief was submitted late. And for the reasons that you gave, since I was called a month ago to become a permanent professor at Laval University, I had to reorganize my own newspaper, I had to move to Quebec City and I had to acquaint myself with the new duties that have fallen on me. I shall try to avoid having to refer again to certain points which have been mentioned in the CWNA brief and which are identical to the points we raise in our own brief.

With regard to Canadian Weeklies, of about 170 weeklies listed in Canadian Advertising Rates and Data, 90 are members of Hebdos du Canada. If we disregard 30 English-language weeklies, some fifteen semi-monthly papers and another fifteen metropolitan weeklies devoted exclusively to advertising, we can conclude that more than 80 per cent of the French-language weeklies belong to our association.

Here, I would like to digress a bit. Your Committee undoubtedly knows that there is another French-language association of weeklies known as the Hebdos A-1. This association, contrary to popular opinion, is neither an integral part of Les Hebdos du Canada, nor a social and professional association competing with Les Hebdos du Canada. More precisely, it is a commercial association devoted exclusively to the promotion of advertising for its members. With one or two exceptions, all the members of Hebdos A-1 are also members of Les Hebdos du Canada, each association pursuing different goals.

For more than 15 years, Les Hebdos du Canada has tried to enable the regional weeklies to become aware of these new demands. In 1956, in co-operation with the University of Montreal, the association organized refresher courses which were given for more than four years and which led to a recognition of the courses.

Since 1961, in co-operation with the Quebec Department of Education, Les Hebdos du Canada have been organizing annual travelling clinics. The purpose of these clinics is to improve the quality and profitability of regional weeklies and they deal with subjects as varied as editing, gathering and disseminating of information, language quality, photography, graphics and layout, local advertising, printing, administration etc.

By holding these clinics in the various regions of Quebec, the association is thus making available to regional weeklies the technical resources which until now has been reserved for the large daily newspapers.

Hebdos du Canada also offers several other services: negotiation of a collective agreement in the printing plant; representation to possible advertisers; representation to various public and private organizations.

There is too great a tendency, even within the information media, to minimize the importance of the regional weekly press. However, certain examples provided by recent polls show the importance of this press. Hence, a poll published in a daily last year showed that in one Montreal neighbourhood more than 90 per cent of the people read their neighbourhood weekly, while the daily paper reached only 60 per cent. Another survey, at the college level, showed that more than 70 per cent of the students read the local weekly whereas the daily paper was read by less than 40 per cent in the same milieu.

There are still a good number of weeklies which we could describe as "homespun" but the number seems to be steadily diminishing.

Increasingly heavy competition which has led to the disappearance of several dailies in America is as alive and often harder on the regional weekly press. Hence, regional weeklies voluntarily choose the type of information they publish. Even the most isolated citizen is able to get, from sources other than is local newspaper, general news items, whether it is from television, radio, the daily or the national weekly.

But what these media cannot give him is adequately complete information on the activities and events that are most immediate to him and affect his daily life. It is such current events that are most important to the citizen. If the war in Vietnam is, objectively speaking more important than the municipal council's decision to raise taxes, the fact nonetheless remains that this latter question affects the citizen more directly and more immediately.

It is obvious that too narrow a concept of the social, economic and political factors may cultivate and develop chauvinism and hinder the creation of a more open mind on the basic realities. Through its clinics, seminars, discussions, our association is trying to orient the regional press towards a wider open-mindedness.

The function of the regional weekly is becoming fundamental in the regions farthest away from the large decision-making centres. These regions are most often economically, socially and culturally under-developed and individuals are often far removed from one another. Under these circumstances, the regional weekly becomes the only means of informing the people, of obtaining feedback, of providing a link between people and of creating a regional social awareness which may make it possible to adapt to more broadly-based structures.

This is the basic reason which convinced the old Post Office Department to accept special conditions for regional weeklies with a circulation under 10,000 copies delivered in municipalities with a population of less than 10,000. In such a region, revenue from national or local advertising and from sales was not adequate for ensuring the paper's financial balance, since production costs were higher, because services were far away, and information was more difficult and more costly to gather.

We believe that the government must promote the survival of these small newspapers because their disappearance would mean that a major portion of the Canadian population would be kept at the edge of the life of the community, with all the social dangers this could entail.

The number of professional journalists has increased considerably in the regional weekly press, even though co-operation, often voluntary, remains an essential factor of survival for the majority of weeklies. For too long, journalists have been unrecognized and consequently poorly paid. Today salaries paid to journalists compare favourably to those paid in the daily press. However, the scale of increase is generally less and this can be explained in various ways. Many leave because the regional weekly press most often serves as a journalism school. Once the journalist has acquired enough experience, he then prefers to head for an environment which offers him more opportunities for advancement. Others, because they have acquired general experience, are sought by various public or private organizations.

For the regional press, this exodus represents a fairly high cost which is far from being compensated for by the increase in advertising rates or sales revenue. We believe, however, that that is the price we have to pay for providing better penetration into our milieu and thus avoiding being the victims of competition.

Just like the CWNA, we have noted that in regional weekly newspapers that are aware of their information role, advertising generally represents 55 per cent of the volume, whereas 45 per cent is devoted to editorial content. The 10 per cent difference ensures the profit and I believe a profit which is far from being excessive.

National advertising has declined tremendously in the regional weekly press in the past fifteen years. It rarely represents more than 15 per cent of the total advertising volume in the paper, whereas there was a time when it reached 50 per cent and even more.

There are many factors to explain this decrease: many budgets diverted to television; the search for fast profits and administrative efficiency by advertising agencies; lack of information on the regional weekly press, etc., not to mention the increasing accessibility to general information and of the media which convey this information.

This decrease in national advertising has been fatal for a large number of newspapers.

Others have succeeded somewhat in overcoming this deficiency by developing local advertising, when the market so permitted. But, once again, it is the smallest newspapers, those which nevertheless are essential in their communities, which have suffered the most.

Local advertising has become the only real source of revenue for weeklies. It has increased appreciably in the past few years because a large number of newspapers have made local businessmen aware of the necessity of making their products known, in the face of increasingly fierce competition. But the local market nevertheless remains limited and it is feared that certain practices and events, which will be discussed later in our forecasts for the future, are endangering the regional press.

As for composition and printing, we can but repeat what was said by the CWNA, that is, there is a centralization and concentration of printing plants, and that more and more regional weeklies are being printed in large centralized printing plants. We can predict that in a short time even the composition of newspapers will be done in that way. This is quite interesting. The regional weekly press was the first to adapt to new techniques in electronic composition and off-set printing.

At present, 85 per cent of the weeklies are printing using the off-set process.

Whereas previously regional weeklies were distributed almost exclusively by mail, an important change is being witnessed today. Wherever a concentration of population justifies it, the weekly prefers to establish a truck distribution system or sales through newsstands. The main reason for this change is unquestionably the debatable quality of service of the Canada Post Office. Whereas a truck can deliver the paper within two or three hours after it is off the press, the Post Office does not often worry about taking two or three days, if not more.

An autonomous distribution system is sometimes more costly, but readers' and advertisers' requirements no longer permit the risks involved in the government distribution system.

Once again, it is the newspapers published in the more sparsely populated areas which cannot make this choice and which must of necessity use the Canadian postal system.

We are going to try and submit certain forecasts on what the regional weekly press will be in a few years, taking as a basis the evolution in recent years, and the knowledge of certain facts which may influence the evolution of regional information. You will surely understand the risks of such an analysis and we are aware of them.

If certain facts lead us to expect in the long run the eventual disappearance of the regional weekly, it will survive in the short run by adapting to the new needs of readers and advertisers. However, we predict the disappearance of a large number of regional weeklies within 5 to 10 years. However, in some cities, we note the amalgamation of two or three weeklies; in others, a weekly is clearly taking the initiative over its competitors which are no longer profitable; finally, some weeklies are becoming too big to remain weeklies.

We believe that Quebec could produce a larger number of dailies. Though the administration factor is important, it is not the only one. According to "World Press, Newspapers and News Agencies", published by UNESCO, 1964, English-language daily newspapers in Canada accounted for 82 per cent of the market while French-language dailies represent only 18 per cent. Economic factors including smaller revenue, reduced advertising, etc., as well as educational and cultural factors, are less likely to promote the profitability of the French-language daily. Though it is possible in some American cities to keep a daily alive with a population of less than 10,000, in English Canada, there must be 30,000, and in French Canada, 50,000 or more.

It would be normal for certain regional weeklies to become regional dailies soon and the concentration of the press could facilitate this change-over. But in regions where there is a strong weekly, this change-over must be made by that weekly and not by the setting up of a newly created daily, which would only divide an already limited market. Local and regional information will remain for a long time still the main concern of the readers since it meets the citizens' most immediate needs. It matters little how the information is disseminated, this type of information must continue since it contributes to preventing the depersonalization of the individual and the deterioration of essential social structures.

Journalist Jacques Kayser wrote in his study on the techniques and policy of information, entitled "Death of a Freedom" (1955):

"Grave harm has been done to the community by the suppression of the 'little newspapers', because they are the ones which best interpret local feelings and aspirations, and they often help to contribute to the creation of a true national image."

If we do not want to widen the gap between the leaders and those led, allowance must be made for this need, even if it is not too financially profitable. The interplay of economic forces in a free society often gives rise to social ills which afterwards become extremely costly for that society as a whole.

If national advertising represents no more than a minute part of advertising in weeklies, any appreciable decrease in local advertising would signal the disappearance of that "little press" about which Jacques Kayser was speaking.

Thus, the concentration that we find in the press is even greater in the field of consumer goods. In each of the localities, the number of stores and businesses belonging to large chains is rapidly increasing. Such chains are developing information techniques and methods which take only costs and profits into account.

It is obvious that for a newspaper, editorial material represents a fairly high expense which may not be profitable immediately and which may even never be profitable. However, this is the price which a community must pay if it wants to be informed and thus be in a position to assure its protection and its development. For the businessman, it is most often a useless expense and one he will avoid if he can.

The appearance of "flyers" for all stores belonging to the same chain and distributed at a low cost are causing some harm to all newspapers. If this trend continues, it will make the survival of newspapers impossible, especially regional newspapers. Nevertheless, it is the newspapers which survey the social and political climate, which see to it that the municipal administration is honest and efficient, which denounce unfair competition, in other words, which enable such businesses to operate in a stable environment, to avail themselves of the essential services at a reasonable cost, and to be governed by competent and honest men. Through the publication of "flyers", one avoids assuming the cost of an essential public service. If this trend continues, undoubtedly some steps will have to be taken to ensure the survival of newspapers. Perhaps thought should be given to a special tax on printing and distribution of purely advertising flyers.

With regard to the problem of the concentration and monopoly of the press, as it may exist in Quebec, we refer you to the brief that

Les Hebdomas du Canada submitted last year to the Parliamentary Committee on the Freedom of the Press, set up by the National Assembly of Quebec. We do not intend to take up this whole question again before your Senate Committee, especially as we are of the opinion that this question of the ownership and content of the press comes under provincial jurisdiction, even though the latter has done little in this field, a fact that we deplore. However, we shall say a few words on certain questions which may interest your Committee more particularly, that is, the ownership of cultural assets and the press council.

Several countries, including Canada, have sought means to prevent their information media from falling into the hands of foreign interests, or the content of those media from being primarily controlled by such interests. Since Canada is bicultural, the minority being French-speaking, the danger is great that communication and information media may be financed by the more economically powerful cultural element and that possibly, because of circumstances independent of the milieu, such media fall almost entirely into the hands of the more powerful group. The greater the concentration of information media in the hands of a small group, the greater the danger will be. We understand that the federal government cannot legislate to ensure French-speaking people the ownership of their own culture and that the Quebec government would be in a better position to do so, but we thought that it would be advisable to place the problem before your Committee.

For nearly ten years, Les Hebdomas du Canada has been interested in the idea of a press council for Quebec. This press council is almost a reality today when we consider the ground that has been covered since the first mention of the idea. The project, as now presented, calls for the participation of press enterprises, journalists, and representatives of the public, the latter having the largest number. Such a press council would essentially ensure the public's right to information, the other powers stemming from this essential principle.

And, Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to announce to you that yesterday there was an agreement in principle on the establishment of a press council in Quebec, an agreement between the two negotiating parties and which must, obviously, be accepted by the organizations which are represented by the negotiating parties.

In conclusion, in this document we wanted to give you an outline of the French-language regional weekly press, its role, its present situation, its hopes and even its disappointments. Obviously certain conclusions can be drawn but because of the ambiguity at the decision-making level, we prefer to limit ourselves to this explanation of the situation, but perhaps we can discuss verbally the practical measures which might assure not only the survival of the regional press, but its expansion, both where information and profitability are concerned. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you. We would now like to put some questions to you and if you wish to have any of your colleagues answer the questions, by all means do so.

Senator McElman will begin.

Senator McElman: Mr. Gagnon, your reference to press council is clear. Would it be correct to suggest that your association regards a press council as something to be of assistance to the industry rather than a threat to it.

Mr. Gagnon: The principle agreed to was that it is the right of the people to be informed, and the information media, as well as the journalists, are only means to give that information. Starting from that principle, I think that the public should have some means of judging the press to see that the people are well informed. That is the main principle.

I cannot say that one hundred per cent of our members agreed with the idea of the press council but it was unanimously voted by the members present at the last few conventions we had.

Senator McElman: In other words, a press council properly constituted upon such basic principles, in your view, would not be considered an infringement upon the freedom of the press, as some have suggested?

Mr. Gagnon: A press council, the way we see it, has no executive power. They just make recommendations. They make decisions on specific cases. They can make a study of the quality of the press on any problem that could in any way be detrimental to the right of the people to be informed.

Senator McElman: If there are no supplementaries, I will move to another topic.

The Chairman: Yes.

Senator McElman: Your organization is in name a Canadian or national organization.

Mr. Gagnon: Yes.

Senator McElman: Do you have members outside Quebec?

Mr. Gagnon: Yes. We have some in New Brunswick, some in Ontario, and we have associate members in Manitoba. We do not have many because there are not many French weeklies outside of Quebec.

Senator McElman: As a New Brunswicker, could you tell me the ones you have in New Brunswick?

Mr. Gagnon: In New Brunswick we have in Edmundston, Le Madawaska; and in Campbellton, L'Aviron. Those are the two papers who are members of the association.

Senator McElman: Those are the two principal weeklies?

The Chairman: I am wondering if I may ask you a question, Mr. Gagnon. You talk in your brief about the relatively low number of daily newspapers in Quebec. Certainly on the per capita basis, as you have pointed out, it is much lower in English Canada. What are the reasons for that historic development? You explained why the situation pertains today but why historically did this happen?

Why did the daily newspapers start in Ontario and not in Quebec, and the second part of that question is: there are proportionately many, many more weeklies in Quebec than in other provinces per capita as well. How did this phenomena happen?

Mr. Gagnon: I think maybe it would take about two or three hours to explain it completely.

The Chairman: I will give you five minutes.

Mr. Gagnon: I will give you some facts maybe that could explain it. In England there is a readership of about 523 readers of daily newspapers for each one thousand people. In France, I think it is the twenty-first country in the world, so maybe there is a factor there. There is the question of administration, too.

The Chairman: Would you repeat that again? I want to be sure I understand that. You are saying there is a readership per capita?

Mr. Gagnon: Readership per capita. The number of people reading dailies; I do not know how to explain it.

The Chairman: I understand. You are saying that France is twenty-first. Is England first?

Mr. Gagnon: England is first. France is twenty-first. Canada, I think, is twenty-third, or something like that.

The Chairman: Just as a matter of interest, do you know where the United States is?

Mr. Gagnon: I think it is sixth. There is Great Britain; there is Japan; Sweden I think is second.

There is Eastern Germany, which is third, I think, or fourth. There is the factor that economically we have less people that can afford to invest in the dailies because I think it takes quite an investment to start a daily.

There is also the fact that most French-Canadians read or speak English. It explains, for example, why the Star gets so much readership in Montreal compared to La Presse. In other words, I do not think that many English-speaking Canadians read La Presse, but I know a lot of French-speaking read the Gazette or the Montreal Star.

The Chairman: La Presse gave a percentage when they were present. As I recall the figures from memory The Star said 20 per cent of their readership was people whose first language was French. I think La Presse said 5 per cent of their readers had English as their first language. Perhaps it was not even that high. Your point is well taken. The Star was twenty per cent and La Presse was I believe 2 or 3 per cent, which makes the point very well.

Mr. Gagnon: Anyway, there are some other factors like publicity, for example. A national advertiser will start a program usually in English and if they want to cover the Quebec market, then they translate it usually and put it in French.

The Chairman: Except that it would not explain the historic reasons.

Mr. Gagnon: Yes. Well, it started many years ago. It did not start yesterday. For example, there has always been less publicity in French newspapers, national publicity.

The Chairman: Yes, but yet we have, do we not, a situation where the only new daily newspapers in Canada that have been started in a long while are in Quebec.

Mr. Gagnon: Yes. Have you checked on the volume of national advertising they have?

The Chairman: Yes. We had Mr. Peladeau before our Committee the other day.

Mr. Gagnon: Has he been complaining about national advertising?

The Chairman: Yes. He complained about lots of things. May I say, incidentally, that he did not relate his particular phenomena at all to Quebec. We said to him, "Could you do the same thing in Toronto?" And he said he could. It was not related to this whole Quebec phenomena I have been discussing here.

Mr. Gagnon: Another factor, I think, is the fact that the French-Canadians have been culturally and financially under-developed for so many years, so that is another reason why the circulation, for example, would be much lower so I can give you four factors now. There might be some others.

The Chairman: Do those four factors all pertain today as well or is this an on-going thing?

Mr. Lucien Fontaine, Secretary, Les Hebdomadaires du Canada: There would be some other factors, too. There is one, for instance, in English, there are many features and services which are available. However in Quebec, which is a limited market, if we take the features, we have to translate them into French, which puts a higher burden on the publisher.

The Chairman: I understand.

Mr. Gagnon: The costs for getting news and information is much higher in a French newspaper. If you take the average cost, I think it is more expensive to start a good daily newspaper in Quebec than it is to start one in Ontario, for example.

The Chairman: Mr. Gagnon, I would remind you, if you wish to answer questions in French, even though I put them in English, you, of course, may.

Is this not a sort of two-edged sword? Is it not a fact that in Quebec you have the French language which is a distinctive thing particularly in terms of the publishing industry? Is it not a distinct advantage, for example, where you do not have to compete with overflow American publications?

This perhaps does not apply as much to Les Hebdomas, but can you comment for us on this? In Quebec, you have a phenomena which we do not have elsewhere in the country of weekly entertainment papers. You know the papers I am referring to; the weekend television and radio papers, and so on. This is a phenomena we do not have in English Canada.

What particular advantages do you have in the publishing industry because your language is not English?

Mr. Gagnon: There might be some advantages. I mean, we could see that we would have some advantages if French-speaking Canadians did not in such great numbers speak and read English.

The Chairman: You were here at the early part of the discussion this morning. We asked CWNA about their relationship with your organization. Could you describe the relationship from your point of view? Have you worked closely with them?

Mr. Gagnon: It is just a social relationship. We think that some of our interests are different.

For example, the CWNA will rely more on the federal government. Every year they present a brief to the federal government. What we do is present a brief to the provincial government in Quebec.

The Chairman: You would not turn down federal government advertising, surely, Mr. Gagnon?

Mr. Gagnon: No. We do not refuse. Last year we presented two briefs, one to the committee studying Canadian Government Information and the other to the Ministry of Communications, but we do differ on some specific problems. Almost every year we present a brief to the provincial government because there is the problem of language. There is the problem of competition. There are a lot of problems that we can deal with between ourselves.

For example, our clinics; we have a problem in Quebec that we have no school of journalism, for example. We establish these clinics in co-operation with the Minister of Education and try to raise the level of the regional press in Quebec.

We could, for example, give these examples to CWNA and maybe in some of their provincial associations they could do the same, but it would only be an exchange. Many of our problems are different, but we do have social meetings.

We invite the president to our convention. We are invited and we go to their convention and things like that.

The Chairman: I think Senator Bourque has some questions.

[Translation]

Senator Bourque: ...I shall speak in French.

Then, a while ago you spoke of amalgamation. What has been the cost which all of you had, Les Hebdomas du Canada?

Mr. Gagnon: The postal cost affected certain newspapers. obviously, it affected all newspapers, but certain of them in a more severe way. I made mention of it in the brief. What happened was that, where there was a large enough concentration of people more and more weeklies turned to a new method of distribution, that is to a distribution, either by the newspaper, or by an independent distribution service. In regions where territories are larger, where there isn't a sufficient concentration of population, at this point, newspapers are obliged to use the postal service and with increases in certain cases which have gone up to 300 per cent.

Senator Bourque: 120?

Mr. Gagnon: The average is 120. What is unfortunate, the newspapers which have been the most affected among the weeklies, are the small ones, those which are perhaps the most essential in their environment because individuals are separated from each other. There are very few communications systems in these surroundings, and they need, more than others, to be informed, and these are the surroundings where there is perhaps also the most need to receive what is called, in information terms "feedback", which means the reaction of people. If the so-called smaller weeklies die because they cannot survive, there will be a large part of the people, the marginal population, who will be completely ignored, and there could come a day when there will be problems. There will be very serious social problems which will develop these surroundings because of a lack of "feedback". It will be noticed too late.

The postal cost, according to our average, resulted in an increase of 120 per cent but, on the other hand, several newspapers succeeded in getting around the postal service up to certain point, this often even at the higher cost of organizing their own distribution system. I do not know, since there are no figures yet from the Department of Communications for the postal service, but I have the impression that there has been a reduction in the distribution of the regional weekly.

Mr. Jean Paul Legaré, Administrative Secretary, Les Hebdomadaires du Canada: Senator Bourque, if you allow me. The weeklies at least in the revision of postal rates have kept certain privileges, and I think that there should not be too many complaints on the situation if it is compared to the situation facing dailies or magazines.

But, the point I would like to make is that in the face of the eventual possibility of the transformation of the Post Office Department into a Crown Corporation, here I believe we should have certain worries. The question is this: what will be the protection accorded to publications distributed as second class mail when the Post Office becomes a Board? Preparatory studies of this eventual Board inform us that there will be an increase in rates and that the federal government could continue to subsidize publications distributed as second class mail. But there are questions which arise. We wonder if a Postal Board which would look for an overly large income, an overly large financial efficiency, could not place the small newspapers, the weeklies in a more difficult situation than they are at present.

Mr. Gagnon: We have, moreover, presented certain views following the publication of the Blue Book on the study by a company specialized in the transformation of the Canadian postal service. We did not mention it in our brief, and we should perhaps have done so, because, at that time, I believe that...

[Text]

The Chairman: Where do you submit these?

Mr. Gagnon: To Mr. Kierans.

The Chairman: Have we a copy of that?

Mr. Gagnon: Yes, I can give you a copy of that.

[Translation]

We have made certain statements because we consider that this transformation to a Crown Corporation could indeed raise several problems if the Government and the directors of this Crown company—as well as the Rate Board which would be jointly established, and the people who participate in it, are not familiar with this particular problem of the regional press. And, especially, of the smallest regional press which plays a role...

Senator Bourque: I think that you would also like to reduce your cost and that probably it was a general reduction, let us say, when the news is not as important for each district. If there are four districts, you cannot give all the same local news, because the local news is very important, isn't it, for the weekly newspaper?

Mr. Gagnon: It is important for the people too.

Senator Bourque: Certainly. Now, I should like to congratulate you, first, for your promotion at Laval University and, you know, it is said that journalism leads to everything.

Mr. Gagnon: I am a lawyer whose conscience did not allow me to practice for more than six months.

Senator Bourque: You have been in journalism?

Mr. Gagnon: Yes, for 12 years.

Senator Bourque: Well, in the year 1900, I sold newspapers here in the streets of Ottawa, and at that time it cost a half-cent and we made a half-cent. It was a lot of money, you know, at that time. It was six cents a week for the newspaper.

Mr. Gagnon: Today, the newsvendors are more demanding than that.

Senator Bourque: And then, you see, after that, I went through a course. At that time newspapers were composed by hand, so you see the difference with what you have in off-set, today. Later, I became a reporter. Then in 1914, I worked for the Lance and Type Corporation—and in those days monotypes were installed and they had to be used. Later, I was Mayor of Outremont, and then worked in a publicity agency and I became a Member and later Senator. So, if several among you have the idea of becoming a Senator, come and see me.

Mr. Gagnon: Personally, I have no political ambition.

Senator Bourque: You do not need to have influence; I did not have any influence, or a rich uncle, or anyone. I arrived by pulling myself up from my boot straps. It is open, to others in the same way. In any case, you come and see me, if any of you wish to have information; we could talk.

Now, we have spoken about savings. You told us a while ago that savings can be made by using off-set composing. Then, you give this work out, and...

Mr. Gagnon: Excuse me, may I say something. We did not mention a "saving".

Senator Bourque: I said it. You told us simply that you had amalgamated in order to produce, in certain places, newspapers, reproduction, printing...

Mr. Gagnon: There are people who have established printing plants, some of whom came from the association of weeklies who established printing plants which today, can produce, several newspapers. To become profitable, in any case, these plants must produce several newspapers, especially a regional weekly, to have its own printing shop. It is becoming more and more preferable to have the printing work done where there is good service. This raises a problem when there is talk, for example, of concentration at the level of the press; there is also talk of concentration at the printing stage. However, there is a danger, for example, when a printing plant belongs to an important cartel, and refuses printing or when too much is charged to print regional weeklies. This is another danger that can arise.

Senator Bourque: Now, do you realize any savings? In my time, this did not exist. But now, salaries are extremely high, so, is there really a saving, if you are not obliged to place as much capital or to buy the necessary machinery, because you can give out this work? Is there really any saving if you take into consideration the cost of labour, today?

Mr. Gagnon: I think there is no saving. On the contrary, there was a rise in weeklies which was proportionately higher perhaps than in other sectors, because during a certain time, the weekly press was not at the level of the general economy. But, today, for example, a young newsman enters into a regional weekly at practically the same salary which he would make at La Presse. The only difference is that, at the end of 5 or 6 years, perhaps he will not remain in the regional weekly press. So that, in a newspaper like La

Presse, a large daily, he will have reached a higher salary than that which he would have been paid if he had stayed in the regional weekly press. Also, for the composition in the shops, obviously, we pay salary rates which are not so much less than those which are paid in the large printing shops and in large newspapers.

Senator Bourque: You have zones, don't you? You have zone 1, zone 2, zone 3 which allows you to pay lower salaries, costs being lower?

Mr. Gagnon: In the printing, for example, it corresponds to 7 per cent. It is not this which makes much difference.

Senator Bourque: You advocate that in a few years—this is what I understood from your memorandum—you think you will be able to do this by "body-type", or some such method?

Mr. Gagnon: It is done in this way nearly everywhere today.

Senator Bourque: And then, here, you will be able to farm out your composition without being obliged to have machinery at your place?

Mr. Gagnon: From the investment point of view, it can become a saving. But, all the same, those who invest wish to make a profit. Therefore, one is often at the mercy of their decisions because there is not much of a choice. A sufficiently important weekly cannot be printed anywhere. We have a problem in the weekly press; it is that we are all printed at the same time, that is to say that all newspapers, because of the demands of the advertisers, must come out on Wednesday, so that we go to press on Tuesday. If you cannot be accepted at the printing shop, well generally, your work cannot be done at another shop. Then this can create problems. Up to now these are not problems which have actually been felt but which could take place in a serious enough manner in the near future.

[Text]

The Chairman: Well, now, Senator, I do not want to interrupt you but I am wondering if this line of questioning does not come perhaps within the area of the material which we will be dealing with in greater detail this evening.

I note, for example, the panel at eight-thirty is dealing specifically with disbursement and the one at seven o'clock with revenue.

I wonder if we should now proceed further with this discussion. I am thinking only of the adjournment for lunch. Do you have many other questions, Senator?

Senator Bourque: Well, it is twenty-five to one now. I could ask all I have to ask in possibly ten minutes.

The Chairman: All right. Why don't you go ahead?

Senator Bourque: This is most interesting and I consider these questions of the weekly of great importance.

The Chairman: I would agree with you. The only point is that, you know, we usually begin at two-thirty in the afternoon. Today we are beginning at two o'clock. That is the only point.

However, do carry on, please.

Translation]

Senator Bourque: What I wished to tell you is that I attach great importance to weeklies. Naturally, you will never take the place of daily newspapers. The dailies are run off very quickly. I, myself, have always considered, all during my career, that the weekly newspaper moulds the mentality of the districts which it serves. But, with the weeklies, what you publish in a city, whether it be Chicoutimi or any place, people have all week to read your newspaper. In that week, you have editorials and they read one idea one evening, and then the following week another idea, always along the same lines. You create this mentality in the individual, something which newspapers do but which neither radio or television can do. This is what I should like to underline.

Now, given the costs of transportation, you can, for example, send your things and then have them return by bus, or by truck, or by any other way; what previously took a week, can now be done in a day. I think, since there are so many methods today, that within a period of probably one or two years, the weeklies will probably have a better chance to create this mentality. There will not be the crisis which presently exists. I think this is very important. I believe that the weeklies, whether English or French, will shape a mentality because the other newspapers are too large now. Take an evening newspaper of 100 pages, three quarters of it, a half, are advertisements. A man who has worked all day has no time to read others, so he only buys one. With the weekly, he has a week to read it. I believe we shall have more weeklies now and that a more informed mind will be developed in the citizen, because he will have the time to digest what is written; this is the normal thing. I think that you have a brilliant future and I have only one other question.

Mr. Gagnon: I could say that you seem to be very optimistic for the regional weekly press. We would like to share your optimism. On the other hand, there are still certain facts, economic facts which have to be taken into account. For my part, I do not believe, and I think my colleagues are of the same opinion, that there will be an increase in the number of regional weeklies. On the contrary, perhaps it is unfortunate that there are too many of them in certain places. When in a city, for example, of 20 or 25,000 population, you have three weeklies, the advertising market, which is after all, the financial power behind the newspaper, cannot support this having three weeklies of poor quality, instead of having a good weekly which could give all competition, with the result, that you risk the news, or the news as complete as possible. So there is this division and especially with the appearance of newspapers which are becoming more and more primarily advertising sheets causing excessively difficult competition for the news weeklies, because newsmen, still have to be paid. It becomes profitable on the day when 90 per cent of the population reads the news weekly. But, if the advertiser decides to distribute a circular sheet published to cover the whole province of Quebec, for example, for all newspapers, all magazines, even those belonging to a chain, this does not give one cent to the local or regional news weekly. However, on the other hand, it is the local or regional weekly which struggles in the midst of its community so that the community will be favourable to the development of business. I therefore deplore the fact that many large firms, large chains do not take on in any way the cost of social responsibility in their communities.

Senator Bourque: I did not wish to say a while ago that dailies were not good newspapers. We are well served by dailies, and that is absolutely necessary; television and even radio have not been able to eclipse the daily newspapers. I believe it was in 1950 that Les Hebdomas du Canada invited me to give a lecture on weeklies. At that time, Imperial Oil, which was footing the bill, had sent, I think, about 30,000 pamphlets reporting my talk. I had this opinion, at the time, and I haven't changed my mind, I still have this opinion: I am sure that with all the methods of transportation weeklies have a great opportunity for the future.

[Text]

Senator Bourque: Mr. Gagnon gave me all the explanations of what I was going to say. He said it, and so therefore it is all right with me now.

[Translation]

Mr. Lucien Fontaine, Secretary Les Hebdomadaires du Canada: Senator, one of your sentences drew my attention: it is that the weeklies do create opinions. I am in full agreement with this, it is very true; but it is exactly this which the large advertising agencies and the government have not yet understood. So, one would wish that the advertising agencies and the government would be concerned not only with marketing and major markets, but equally with all the regions. Then, if this were understood, I believe, at the time, the situation of the weekly press would be really changed.

Senator Bourque: You admit that if we continue to talk about it, that something will finally be accomplished. If no one discusses it, then nothing will happen.

[Text]

The Chairman: I wonder if I might put a final question to you, Mr. Gagnon. This morning a question was put by someone to the CWNA—would they consider becoming a federation? I would be curious if they became a federation whether or not you would join that federation.

Mr. Gagnon: As an equal partner?

The Chairman: Well, I do not know. I think you have answered the question.

I will thank everyone. It occurs to me perhaps I did not express sufficient appreciation to the CWNA people earlier. I am going to make the same mistake in the interest of equal partnership now with the Les Hebdomadaires du Canada.

I think I will thank everyone later on this evening.

Now, I am going to adjourn and may I say—the Senators know this—but for the benefit of others, when I say we are going to resume at two o'clock we are going to resume at two o'clock and not 2:05.

The meeting is adjourned. Thank you.

The Committee resumed hearing at 2.00 p.m.

The Chairman: Ladies and gentlemen, I would like to, if I may, call the session to order this afternoon. As you know, we are going to this afternoon and the evening, hear four panels—the first at 2.00, then 3.30 then one at 7.00 and one at 8.30.

The topics are "The Role of the Weekly" and then at 3.30 "Content", at seven o'clock "Revenue", and at 8.30 "Disbursements".

I might say just a word about the format we intend to follow. Each of the panelists will speak for ten minutes and then we will turn to a discussion from the floor. Now, may I say for the benefit of Senators and others, that it is our intention—in fact, it is a necessity—that we adjourn at 5.30 this afternoon. I say that in the interests of returning here for the panels which begin at seven o'clock, and as well because there is a Senate Caucus which some of us must attend at 5.30. So, come what may, it is our intention to meet that 5.30 adjournment time.

This all, of course, presents us with a problem of time, and I am going to rather strictly enforce a time limit on the panelists. At the eight-minute mark, I will give a tap which will let you know it's eight minutes, and at the nine-minute mark, I will give two taps—at the ten-minute mark, I will hit you on the head! And that's a promise because we are going to call time, and I am sorry if, at the ten-minute mark your remarks are not completed.

Then when we turn to a discussion from the floor at the microphones and I will make this clear. Perhaps I will repeat it. When we go to the microphones, you will line up, you wish to speak, the three microphones and we will go the various microphones in turn.

Now, perhaps the next recommendation I am going to make—maybe I am making dreadful mistake on my next suggestion, at that is that there be no time limit at all microphones. The people in the room are aware of the time limit. I shall reserve the right to call people at the microphones in order and perhaps to even terminate the comments. If we find that this isn't working well, then it may be that we will self-impose upon ourselves some kind of specific time limit at the microphones.

As far as the Senators themselves are concerned, I would ask that there be no Senatorial participation while the panelists are speaking.

ing. I think we will give the panelists the clear floor for the ten minutes.

Then, when people are at the microphones, the senators should feel perfectly free to indicate to me that they wish to ask a question either of one of the panelists or, indeed, of one of the people at the microphones, and the Senators should feel free to comment or to ask questions at the particular point in the proceedings.

This first panel is on "The Role of the Weekly". I am going to call on the panelists in the order that I have them, and in the interests of time, I shall give you no more introduction than the one which is contained on the agenda we have in front of us; so, I turn now to Mr. Baker who is from the Kentville Advertiser in Nova Scotia. Mr. Baker, it is not necessary to stand, sir. Do you wish to do so? It's as you prefer.

Mr. G. C. Baker, 'Kentville Advertiser', Nova Scotia: Mr. Chairman, honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen: I am most grateful for the opportunity to take part in this forum and to discuss the role of the weekly newspaper from the point of view of a small town paper in the Maritimes.

All news media are, to some extent, competitors for the interest and the attention of the public and for the advertising dollar.

To the extent that they can retain the former, they are able to attract the latter. If the media were living things, some clever biologist would no doubt have categorized them by classes, orders and genera, and within the class of print media and the order of newspapers, the small town paper would appear as a distinct species differentiated from others by its appeal to readership within a small and fairly discrete area.

The fact that newspapers of this type survive in our harshly competitive climate, and moreover, survive in relatively large numbers prima facie, evidence that they fill a real need and occupy a viable niche in the media world.

In my submission, Mr. Chairman, the primary characteristic of the small town paper is its attempt to retain reader interest on a restricted geographical basis.

All the other characteristics are derived or imposed by economic necessity. The paper is usually almost invariably a weekly because the revenue from a small area is not sufficient to support a greater frequency of issue.

There is now also an arbitrary consideration proposed by government which tends to discourage two issues a week in communities large enough to want and to support such a frequency of service. That is, the fiction in postal rates that a paper issued twice weekly is a daily newspaper.

The typical circulation area for the small newspapers in the Maritimes includes a town of some substance and the surrounding communities or rural districts of which the town serves as the retail distribution centre. The area tends to comprise a community of interests.

This enables the paper to provide news coverage of a distinct type. It can carry news and opinion of purely local interest and these are its stock in trade. No broad, mass circulation medium can do so because the type of information involved would not appeal to a sufficiently large proportion of its total audience.

The same sort of thing applies in the case of advertising aimed solely at the newspapers' trading area. This advertising would cost more if placed in the mass circulation media, but the increased costs would not result in increased sales because people are not going to travel hundreds of miles to buy food or get a haircut.

From such considerations, the purpose of the small town weekly newspaper appears. It circulates appropriate news, opinions, advertising and like information within a community of economic and social interest. It can and often does serve the community as a conscience and a spur to community betterment. Usually it bridges one or more of the anachronistic boundaries of municipal government and thus also provides a vehicle for area cooperation.

From the foregoing, all things being equal, it would appear that small town weekly is economically viable; it can hold its own in present competition. It has little to fear from future technological change because the strength of its present position depends on a distinct type of service rather than on technical or mechanical sophistication, but other things are not necessarily equal.

We live in an age when governments are interfering more and more with private enterprise. All media are competitors to some degree. The Government of Canada now subsidizes one competitor, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, to the extent of more than $100 million per year. It is apparent that at some level of government intervention, the economic margin of safety for some kinds of media must be wiped out, and since weeklies are the smallest, they may well be the most vulnerable.

I only wish to point out that governments today have life and death power over every form of economic enterprise and an ever-increasing urge to use it.

Well, there must be some variation of purpose between community newspapers in urban and rural environments, and perhaps also between those published in French and English. It seems likely that the similarities vastly outweigh the differences.

No doubt a comparison of the views to be expressed today will define the situation better than any comments which could be made by one publisher alone.

The newspaper which I represent has been a member of Canadian Weekly Newspapers Association for over thirty years and remains so from a sense of duty. The Association has been a source of inspiration to newspaper improvement, and has represented the needs of its members to government. It has, with less beneficial results, dabbled in the field of advertising sales. Like any trade association, it can be of great benefit in the promotion of high standards of ethics and performance. More than most other trade associations, it has an opportunity to help its members through the promotion of modern management techniques, control, accounting, motivation, operations research and such fields. The same opportunity lies on the doorstep of provincial associations.

In my opinion, the community newspapers today play another role in our national life, one which is more diffuse and harder to define or even to substantiate.

Creative people of the intelligentsia type tend to gravitate to the mass media. They generally have lively talents. Their work enjoys vast audiences and makes a great impact. They are inclined to be left of centre or at least political activists. They equate change with progress, and seldom bother to consider whether the progress is for better or worse.

In the steel and concrete towers of metropolitan Canada, they may from time to time lose touch with commonsense. The weekly newspapers seldom recruit such people, offering as it does, often hard and unremitting work, a constant struggle to survive and cope with the realities of life; thus, in many cases, the weeklies offer a pinch of conservatism and, of course, I do not use the word in a political sense.

The weeklies offer an antidote against hysteria and a break against too radical or too rapid change. In this respect, they may serve a purpose similar, but in a much less important sphere, to that which the Fathers of Confederation intended for the Senate of Canada and which the larger mass media all seem to overlook in their ravening thirst for change.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Baker.

Mr. Vaillancourt is next, Le Réveil, Jonquière. Mr. Vaillancourt, I explained before you arrived that we have a strict ten-minute time limit, and as a matter of fact, I will talk at eight minutes; however, carry on, sir.

[Translation]

Dr. Henri Vaillancourt, Publisher, Le Réveil du Saguenay: Most weeklies were founded before the era of modern communications, at a time when daily papers were not circulated throughout the province. Regions like Saguenay, Lac St-John, northwestern Quebec, the lower St. Lawrence and Gaspésie were cut off by geographical remoteness and a lack of communications. Their population inevitably lived an isolated way of life.

It was this deficiency that prompted the creation of many Quebec weeklies, among them Le Réveil de Jonquière-Kénogami, which was founded in 1945 by a group of younger members of the local Chamber of Commerce to cover an urban area with a population of 30,000 living in two municipalities containing some 6,000 homes. There was no other vehicle for the expression of dissent, the only official source of information being a regional weekly owned by the archdiocese.

Today, the role of the local or regional weekly has changed little, but the information field has acquired new dimensions with a potentially more numerous and well-informed readership. The weekly is no longer the only source of information in its community. It is to compete with the daily, which is distributed province-wide within hours of being printed. There is also the audio-visual electronic press, which provides hourly news bulletins, films of major events, interviews and so on. This is the case in our own area, where all the Montreal dailies are sold at the newsstands, as well as a regional daily published in Quebec City. There are also a number of television and radio stations.

Weeklies must thus compete today with all media, offer their readers a product of equal quality without straying from their own role, that is, without seeking to replace the daily, and do battle with competitors who are often in an advantageous position. The weekly will seek rather to complement the other media.

In an urban area like Jonqui re-K nogami, with 9,600 homes, most of them covered by all the news media, a weekly could survive and grow given the following: 1. efficient administration; 2. a competent editorial staff; 3. an aggressive advertising department—this is the backbone of the business;—and 4. an adequate circulation and a capable circulation department.

In short, like its big brother, the daily, a weekly paper must face the future with a sound organization all the way from the news room to the corner news-stand. Only then will it be able to withstand the pressures that will doubtless bear upon it, and progress.

There is no longer room for amateurism or old-world craftsmanship in a newspaper business. There is a challenge to be taken up. The weekly will have to be read and discussed in the community it serves, and have some impact on public opinion, if it is to keep its circulation and maintain a link between advertiser and consumer.

The advantages of the weekly: each edition has an effective life of four or five days, while a daily is out of date within hours. In the words of Jean-Louis Gagnon: "No one buys yesterday's paper".

Its clientele: the weekly speaks to a specific audience—what Yves Michaud calls "the provincial man"—the man who elects and rejects governments, "a different reader from those in the larger centres, one who is less preoccupied, less idealistic". As Michaud continues: The provincial man is more down-to-earth, closer to the real world than the hurried, anonymous big-city dweller.

The weekly shares its reader's roots; it is of the same wave-length and he will look to its paper for an opinion on any current topic. Surveys have shown that editorials in weeklies attract a larger proportion of readers than those in dailies. Provincial weeklies are generally owned and written by local people. They stand a better chance of being read from beginning to end.

Does the weekly paper have a different role in an English-speaking community? I think so, but I do not have sufficient personal experience to answer that question.

Circulation and advertising: advertising is a newspaper's bread and butter. For the reader, it is part of an information service he is paying for. From this point of view, the weekly offers undeniable advantages to the local advertiser. Weekly-paper advertising in weeklies is cheaper, and it is less likely to be drowned in a sea of paper or shouted down by a big competitor. Furthermore, the local advertiser who does not have his own advertising service feels more at ease dealing with a weekly. He can get technical advice from the staff, and make changes before press time. The R veil's local advertising has risen 10 to 15 per cent annually over the last three years. This has enabled us to provide more appropriate news-room facilities and better equipment.

National advertising is quite another matter; it was falling until early 1969. There are a number of factors involved, and they would take too long to list, but we might just mention quickly the impact of television, particularly colour television, and the slowness with which the written press reacted.

Many papers failed, others regrouped or underwent changes. In order to offer a better image to national advertising agencies, some twenty weeklies gathered under the A-1 banner; their circulation is checked by A.B.C. They have adopted a set of standards and equipped themselves with a permanent secretariat in Montreal and a common sales service. This group of weeklies, to which the R veil belongs, is gradually regaining the ground lost in the area of national advertising.

Nevertheless, there is still a great deal of ignorance or laziness—probably both—which leads a number of large companies to ignore the weekly press in their advertising purchases, while their public relations services flood us with press releases every week. The weekly press is recognized as an effective means of informing a group of consumers or taxpayers. But paid advertising is entrusted to national agencies, which seem to take the easy way out, and whose records fail to note developments in the weekly press. Numerous examples could be cited in support of that statement. We might mention the many Crown corporations and government departments. We shall doubtless have an opportunity to get back to this during the discussions.

There are still parts of Quebec where dailies do not penetrate.

Information from agencies: institutional and corporate public relations departments are a valuable source of information for weekly newspapers. The Réveil publishes press releases of interest to our readers every week, omitting the political or commercial propaganda that slips in from time to time. These people should know that newspaper space is for sale for the communication of commercial messages. We do this free of charge for social clubs and non-profit organizations. I remain convinced that weekly papers are an excellent vehicle for informing people at the provincial level. The population of Canada is spread over a vast area, and it will be several decades before this changes.

I am sure that this Committee will be led by its deliberations to the same basic conclusion regarding the weekly press, and will make appropriate recommendation to the Government for the protection of these information media.

I shall skim over the matter of press freedom.

[Text]

The Chairman: Well, I am sorry. I must apologise to you on two counts, Mr. Vaillancourt, first of all, because you are not Mr. Vaillancourt. You are Dr. Vaillancourt. I apologise for that. I also apologise because the time is up and before you arrived, I made it very clear that I was going to be very arbitrary about that. There are copies which we can give to the Senators and those who are interested. Thank you.

Now, the next panelist is Mr. Ken Larone. Mr. Larone is the publisher of The Mirror, Don Mills which is in North York, in Metropolitan Toronto. Mr. Larone.

Mr. Ken Larone, 'The Mirror' Don Mills, Ontario: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen: "What are suburban newspapers?" It's a privilege to represent the new kind of newspaper called the "suburban newspaper". The Mirror is here today through the accident of frequency.

We happen to publish our newspaper once a week. In many other metropolitan areas, our type of newspaper is a suburban newspaper, goes home to its subscribers two, three and sometimes six days a week.

Like the Mirror, suburban newspapers are enjoying rapid growth in Canada as well as the United States and Great Britain.

This new urban medium has its own characteristics which are not the same as the traditional rural weekly nor the small daily nor the large metropolitan daily. More than any other group of newspapers, suburban newspapers are influenced by faster change, larger markets, greater direct competition and more demanding readers and advertisers.

Both our urban readers and their urban advertisers demand considerable creativity and quality from us. This does not make the suburban newspaper any more or less important than the rural weekly press.

Suburban newspapers face a different set of conditions. Our markets are different. The products we produce to satisfy the market much different. What then is a suburban newspaper?

The suburban newspaper is the community newspaper created for the people who live in the post-war phenomenon, the suburb. In Canada's urban areas, such as metropolitan Toronto, the suburbs are in the city. They are the large, new municipalities that wrap around the old city of Toronto; for example, the borough of North York, largely suburban has a population of almost 500,000 people. This size makes it Canada's third largest municipality, even larger than the City of Vancouver. The three suburban boroughs of North York, Scarborough, Etobicoke, has more than a million people or 54 per cent of metro's population.

Members of the Committee who know metro Toronto will agree these boroughs are almost entirely suburban in character. By definition, this means the majority of the residents of metro Toronto live in suburbia.

No matter what future political course the urban area takes, the majority of those people who live within this region will be member of the twentieth century new town environment. They will be suburbanites, part of the megalopolis.

It is only reasonable to assume that the growth around our large Canadian cities will have suburban character, and this means more and more Canadians will become suburbanites. It is in this market and for the market that the Mirror and other suburban newspapers publish.

They are distinct from the downtown daily newspapers with their origin in the city and distinct from the country weekly newspapers primarily appealing to the rural communities.

There has been a rapid growth of suburban newspapers in the United States since the end of World War II. In their development, they tended to be almost a decade ahead of us in Canada. Many of the rural U.S. weekly which were cut off from the core of the city by 30 miles of wheat fields have since become large suburban newspapers. These newspapers vary in their publishing frequency, but many publish two or three times a week, and the best are dailies. Perhaps the outstanding example in suburban newspaper publishing in the United States is News Day, a tabloid with over 400,000 circulation in the two suburban communities of Suffolk and Long Island, just outside New York City. News Day averages 100 to 150 pages a day.

Throughout the United States, major publishing groups have entered the suburban publishing field in a variety of ways, number one, by starting suburban newspapers; number two, by publishing suburban sections; and number three, by purchasing suburban newspapers.

Let us go back to number one, those that have started suburban newspapers. The Marshall Field organization in Chicago owns two metropolitan dailies, the Sun Times and the Chicago Daily News. But in the suburbs of Mount Prospect and Arlington Heights, Marshall Field Enterprises started a suburban daily newspaper in competition with several large independent groups.

Now, point number two, publishing suburban sections, the Chicago Tribune has adopted this technique. They publish three or four tabloid sections of news and advertising for specific areas outside the city core. This method was once used by the Toronto Telegram.

Now, for number three, by purchasing suburban newspapers. Time Incorporated recently purchased two newspaper groups in Chicago, the Pioneer Newspapers and the Hollister Newspapers. When these publishing movators moved into the new publishing unit, the Committee gets a good indication of its potential.

In the United Kingdom, suburban newspapers are also growing rapidly. More of them started as giveaways, meaning they were given to each householder in the newspaper circulation area. Recently, some of the large publishing organizations have purchased the free circulation papers and are beginning to convert them into paid circulation.

In my earlier comments, I explained some of the differences between suburban newspapers and rural weeklies. Now, I would like to emphasize their similarities.

Community news is community news. Whether you are the publisher of The Mirror in North York and Scarboro or A. Y. McLean publishing the Huron Expositor in Seaforth, Ontario your subscriber expects the one basic ingredient from his community newspaper. He wants to know what is happening at home, the place where he and his family live, the focal point of their lives, information about minor hockey leagues and the local high schools are examples of the valuable nuts and bolts of a good community paper. People in North York and Scarboro are just as interested in this information as the people of Seaforth.

In the suburbs, it is important to have a community press. Without it, there could be an information void which would be unhealthy for people living in the sprawling, high-rise megalopolis.

Downtown dailies are being forced to spend more and more money on the world, national and provincial news. The pressure of life in the global village is forcing this upon them. This does not present them with an easy task. They must report to the readers the meaning of the rapidly changing world and, remember, our world is changing so rapidly that the pace of change is bewildering.

Also, our established metropolitan daily newspapers must remain Canadian in a world that is rapidly becoming American. If our identity is at stake in a media world dominated by American television, American magazines, and American wire services, our major daily newspaper publishers have the delicate task of presenting, without colouring the news, of presenting it in a Canadian context.

Readers of the metropolitan dailies expect their newspaper to give them the meaning of national and world events so Canadians can comprehend the significance of any event. All of this applies to any event, any place in the world.

This is not the task of the suburban newspaper. We must bring meaning of community events to Canadians who live in our large metropolitan cities. These people face the challenge of urban life and reporting the events of this life is important to them.

Pressing urban problems do not come to life so easily when they are seen as a remote abstraction of national concern. Most Canadians feel they are against pollution, but the majority of them perceive themselves powerless to stop its spread until you relate it to the pollution problem right next door. Then they can become very angry. At this point, the action or the inaction of the local government becomes hard news, the news brings action.

The changing morality of our times puzzles and perturbs many Canadians; yet, teenage sex is another national abstraction until it is reported in the high school or around the corner.

The drug society arouses expressions of horror in all of us; yet it remains an abstraction until we learn the pushers are working in our high school where our children attend.

The suburban newspaper takes its responsibility and professional skill in both hands when it faces these problems. Covering them requires accuracy and fairness beyond the expected from the less personal medium. If your community newspaper misreports facts, as you know them, you become more hostile than the times you find less personal medium making the same mistakes. When your local newspaper makes this kind of mistake, you are almost personally affronted. You feel they should know you and your environment in more intimate and more understanding terms.

In our complex urban society, the suburban newspaper helps to knit together an understanding of life at the most intimate level, the community.

More than any other medium, it can yield insights and understanding, not only supposedly parochial issues, but of large social concern.

The grass roots press in this country will continue to have historic role whether in the urban metropolis or in the towns and villages of rural Canada. We believe its survival is important to the legislators of this country; however, we believe a free press must ask no favours from the government if it is to preserve its historic independence.

Your Committee asked if a press council would be appropriate for Canada. We say yes, one of publishers and journalists.

Even though the public and the government believe the time has arrived for a Canadian Press Council, the Fourth Estate must remain responsible enough to govern itself if the press of Canada is to remain free in a basic democratic sense.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Larone.

The final panelist in this first panel on "The Role of the Weekly" is Mr. L. H. Drouin, who is the editor of the St. Paul Journal, St. Paul Alberta. Mr. Drouin?

Mr. L. H. Drouin, 'St. Paul Journal', St. Paul, Alberta: Mr. Chairman, Honourable Senators, fellow publishers, ladies and gentlemen: All of this panel discussion deals specifically with the role of the weekly newspapers. Because I have been asked specific questions by the Committee, you will find that my presentation may digress a bit.

After hearing the presentations this morning, you will not find that there is some duplication of ideas, but this will focus attention on these problems and prove their importance, considering that some of the same reasoning has emanated from entirely different regions.

The role of the weekly in principle is much the same as any other media, that of disseminating news to its readers, but it varies in that its readership is a close, select group of people who want to see a reflection of themselves in the only media that it is possible for them to get some recognition; in other words, it is a local paper for local people, and its primary concern is to cover the events in its own community, provincial and national news being of a secondary nature.

A rural weekly, which I represent, and on which I have been asked to make a comparison with urban areas, further has the duty of a public relations agency between the town it serves and the rural people, mostly farmers who have a different point of view and often are diametrically opposed to each other.

Newspapers, of course, will vary from region to region. In Alberta and Saskatchewan, predominantly agricultural areas, their role is essentially much the same.

British Columbia an industrial province may influence newspapers economically in a different manner, but here again their purpose and role is to cover local events.

There is much more difference between the controlled circulation papers published in the suburbs of metropolitan areas. The circulation is higher in densely populated areas where papers can be delivered by carriers, compared to rural weeklies who may cover sparse market areas of a radius of over 40 miles, and have to use the post office for delivery and bear the brunt of increased costs.

The Chairman: Excuse me. They want you to slow down just a little bit.

Mr. Drouin: Okay, I don't want to run out of time.

They also have access to a larger number of customers which are close enough to contact. This means more money, better equipment, the advantage of centralizing, more staff, editorial and mechanical, and more activities to cover the potential of larger papers.

We are not criticising too much the higher costs of mailing which has affected the income of every newspaper, recognizing the special privileges that we have had for years as a concession by government to the days when weekly newspapers were almost the only media of education for the people. They haven't lost any of these values, but are now living in a different world, with more competition and increased costs which must be recognized and balanced.

I don't think there is any difference between the publication of a weekly in French or English as the Commission would like to know except that here again they are influenced by their environment and the region they represent.

Perhaps the St. Paul Journal finds itself in a unique position, being published in a western area that has been designated as a bilingual district in accordance with recommendations by the B and B Commission. Although we are an English publication, the pioneer influence of the town and district which basically was French still requires that we consider publishing some articles, stories and even advertising in French. Our plant is equipped with French accents to accomodate these articles and to handle commercial printing in either language which, of course, is essential to the economy and success of operation of any rural weekly.

The editor of a rural weekly is still a very real person, not some detached intellectual sitting in an ivory tower on the 20th floor of a skyscraper, but someone the reader can reach, argue with over an editorial and still threaten to punch him on the nose if he disagrees.

Consequently, there is perhaps some discretion. There is perhaps more discretion in the rural editorials, judgments, fairness and justice without losing any of its fairness in the light of the issues that concern the community.

We have been asked by the Senate Committee to explain why the 'St. Paul Journal' is not a member of ABC, and why we have felt it is not necessary to subscribe to carry out the role of a weekly newspaper.

Frankly, I am not opposed to ABC, and I believe that belonging to that organization is a good investment that can do a lot to improve the image of the papers with bona fide figures and circulation, something that has become very important to customers and agencies who want realistic figures.

We would have joined ABC a few years ago, but at the time, CWNA came out with a programme for verified circulation figures, which we believe is a good one, and we are in the process of subscribing to it.

Perhaps the only reason we did not join ABC was negligence and probably laziness in having to initially set up the records required which takes considerable time, but are well worth it in the long run.

Here again, too many weeklies have to be reproached for padding up their circulation figures and not keeping closer records. CWNA requires that membership in its association include membership in an audit bureau, and ABC is a good one. That should be enforced in the near future.

There is a real need for the weekly media to present authentic figures to its customers to regain confidence and some of the volume of business that they have lost, partly for this reason and the competition it is meeting from other media, especially television.

We must convince the national advertisers that the weekly is the only media to reach certain markets, and that in spite of the fact that it might be easier to schedule advertising with one big account and save clerical work, they are overlooking one of the most important media that sometimes are not acting in the best interests of their clients.

Provincial and national weekly associations—What purpose are they serving? There is no doubt that like anyone in any other field of occupation, weekly newspapers need unity to promote their best interests. The ideals and principles in this association are very good, but they are not completely fulfilling their purpose because of negligence of some of their members, national and provincial who do not cooperate, carrying only token memberships without life participations.

One of the most important areas of which associations can be of benefit is in the promotional field of advertising. Although several attempts have been made, nothing lasting has ever been accomplished, and weeklies continue to lose their fair share of the national dollar.

The AWWA has tried employing the services of a provincial field representative on several occasions, but has never been able to interest one man consistently, and the cost was opposed by some of the members, who felt it was too much money to spend on intangible results.

For that reason, I feel that the CWNA and the weekly associations should have better liaison in coordinating some of these programmes jointly.

It seems that provincial associations are working at cross purposes and have never really gotten down to the business of solving these problems, although in the past years the problem has been recognized and more serious attempts at coordination have been made.

British Columbia weeklies, working independently from the provincial association, have formed a company of western regional newspapers who are employing the services of a full-time representative to sell for them. Recently, they have approached a number of Albertan weeklies to join in. A good response was received and it is likely some ten or fifteen will work with the twenty-two now taking part in B.C.

Each member purchases a share in the company for $100 as an initiation fee, and agrees to pay seven per cent of his gross income on all national advertising to W.R.N. From these funds, an advertising representative is hired on a contract basis.

This is the kind of service any association could originate and its members participate in with a good degree of success.

In spite of the technological advances that have been made in the methods of printing, letter press, offset which have improved the typographical layouts of the weeklies, the basic role has not changed that much.

The big change in the past has occurred at the editorial level where better news content is found, editorial comment is more prominent and graphic reporting by the use of pictures have greatly improved the appearance and the readership of the weekly.

For that reason, we believe that more attention should be focused upon and considered for the weeklies, as one of the better news media in the rural and urban areas they cover, by the advertising agencies and even the Government of Canada in maintaining some of the privileges they have accorded us in the past.

I wish to thank Senator Keith Davey for giving us the opportunity to before his Committee and the recognition he has given the weekly newspapers across Canada. Thank you.

The Chairman: Relax!

Mr. Drouin: I made it!

The Chairman: If you want to talk for thirty more seconds, you can.

Well, now, we will turn to the discussion from the floor. Perhaps I could just re-underline the ground rules. You simply go to any one of the microphones when you want to say anything. Would you identify yourself and your paper, and would you please do that every time you speak.

You can speak as often as you want, providing there are no other people who have not spoken who are waiting to speak. We won't put a time limit until we see what happens. We may have to impose a time limit later on in the afternoon when we see how it goes.

In comments from the floor, I am going to give the widest possible latitude, but in saying the "widest possible latitude", I do want to stress that all the same there will be some latitude; in other words, there will be some limiting—some comments, perhaps, wouldn't be in order at this particular panel.

As far as the Senators are concerned, may I say to them that they are free to ask questions of the panelists or they will also be free to ask the questions of the people who are going to the microphones; so, with saying that, we go to the floor. I note with interest that there is nobody going to any microphone. Does that mean that nobody wants to have anything to say at this point? Yes, your name please?

Mr. C.S.O. Hoodspith (Publisher 'Lions Gate Times', West Vancouver, British Columbia): Mr. Chairman, Senators, ladies and gentlemen: My name is Hoodspith. I represent a newspaper in the suburbs of Greater Vancouver.

In this section or this panel on the "Role of the Weekly Newspaper", I might make reference to a statement Senator Bourque made this morning in which he said that he felt the weeklies could never replace the dailies.

This is a question that can be dealt with to quite an extent, and at this juncture, I would just like to bring an observation that possibly has not been made and will not be made in the rest of this hearing.

As you know, Vancouver is suffering a void of daily newspapers with the temporary strike of the Vancouver Sun and the Vancouver Province. There has been a terrific impact on the community newspapers in and around Vancouver, to such an extent that we have tripled our revenue and doubled our circulation and may go even further, depending on how long the strike exists.

The reading public are not uptight. They say they miss the paper, they miss the daily. They miss getting the Province in the morning and the Sun at night. There are certain features they would like to follow. We have heard, and this has been volunteered—now, maybe they say it because they know I have a weekly newspaper—but a lot of them say, “I don’t think we will go back to the dailies. We have sufficient coverage with the radio and television and the weekly newspapers”.

I only bring this in to point that possibly there is a general opinion, that there’s got to be a daily newspaper, but now they are finding something that’s different. They are finding that possibly a good, well organized, well conducted newspaper on the weekly basis or on a twice-weekly or thrice-weekly can compete and it may be the point that this might change an area of reference—a frame of reference may change.

In addition to that, they say you can’t take the place of the dailies. Maybe it’s the advertiser who wants the daily exposure. Maybe the reader is quite happy with once a week, augmented with his radio and his television.

I just wanted to bring this to Senator Bourque who fortunately is not here. At this point, maybe he’s one also that has been brainwashed into thinking that there must be a daily newspaper, and that’s my comment, gentlemen, thank you.

The Chairman: Do you take a daily newspaper yourself?

Mr. Hoodspith: I take two, and the reason why I do that—I think I might be like every other businessman who hasn’t got too much time to wade through a hundred pages. He takes out—selects—I am a headline reader. I read a favourite column. I might read it just to see what’s going on, but that’s it. That’s finished.

In the morning, I miss the Province because there is a column I read, but other than that, I am not interested. I haven’t got time. I am more interested in what’s happening to my axes locally.

The Chairman: You said that you have tripled your revenue and doubled your circulation. Is that correct? Is that what you said?

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes, I did, sir.

The Chairman: You have tripled your revenue?

Mr. Hoodspith: Possibly tripled the revenue, yes, sir.

The Chairman: Have you increased your rates?

Mr. Hoodspith: No.

The Chairman: Not at all?

Mr. Hoodspith: No, we increased our circulation. We felt it’s not fair to our advertisers to stick in the needle, as it were, while they have no other media.

The Chairman: Has any of the additional advertising been national?

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes, yes, considerably, from sources we have never had before in our life, in our time at least. Being a weekly newspaper under the coverage of the dailies, it does affect us greatly.

The Chairman: Thank you very much. May I say that if other people want to speak, they should be going to the microphones. Senator McElman?

Senator McElman: Mr. Hoodspith, in fact, what you are saying right now is that the strike situation of the dailies in Vancouver has caused you to re-examine your role. Is that correct?

Mr. Hoodspith: That is correct, yes.

Senator McElman: Did you find that re-examination encouraging?

Mr. Hoodspith: Very much so, yes, it creates, and I think this would probably tie in with what Mr. Larone said, a new framework of consideration or of reference.

Just one more point, Mr. Chairman. We had a phone call from a large automobile company and a large real estate company, and each of them volunteered that they were surprised that by using the weekly newspapers, how they have had a marked result factor very much over what they had figured, and that it was cheaper. They volunteered this, that it was cheaper; so, I told someone last night, and they said, 'Well, what about the advertising agencies who say that our line rate is so much higher?' But you divide that by the number of days a weekly newspaper is read. Say our staying power is five days; so, you divide five days into the mill line rate, and you will find that we are probably very comparable to the per line rate of a daily newspaper.

The Chairman: I note with interest that Senator Bourque has arrived and I wouldn't want you to go through all of the comments you made, as interesting as they were.

Senator, Mr. Hoodspith was addressing himself to you, Senator Bourque.

You might just repeat what you said.

Mr. Hoodspith: Senator Bourque, you made a statement, facetiously or not. You may have been quite serious about it, but you said that the weeklies will never take the place of the dailies, and I have just pointed out to the congregation here...

The Chairman: Congregation!

Mr. Hoodspith: ...that there is a daily newspaper void in Vancouver with the temporary demise of the Sun and the Province, through a strike, and that people are not too worried about not having a daily newspaper other than missing their favourite spots, such as maybe social or maybe editorial. You mentioned that the number of pages you have to wade through every day. The weekly papers are now developing into something that they found are sufficient along with radio and television to give them immediate news. I just wanted to make that point, that I hope that you are not brainwashed into thinking, that we have got to have a daily newspaper, come what may.

Senator Bourque: Oh, I think you have to. I am very much in favour of developing the weeklies, but I don't think that the country could go on without the daily paper, the television and the radio. I think they are a necessity for life and for the country and its citizens.

Mr. Hoodspith: Yes, that's right.

The Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Hoodspith, very much.

Do you want to ask a question, Senator McElman, of Mr. Hoodspith?

Senator McElman: I want to correct something that I put on the record. The Vancouver situation I referred to as a "strike"—I think I should correct that to say a "shut-down".

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Hoodspith also referred to it as a "strike". I was going to make the point as well. I am not sure that "strike" is the accurate description.

Senator McElman: The other thing I wish to say is that he referred to "congregation"—I assume in the non-evangelical context?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Frank Withers, Editor Bugle Gazette Times, Woodstock, New Brunswick: I would agree with the previous speaker and with some of the others here that a daily is necessary. Like him, I take two or three dailies and read the weeklies too. I think that the difference in the role here probably is that the weekly in the small area must go into more depth in local matters than the dailies can, but that was not mainly what I wanted to speak about.

Three comments have been made, one at the earlier hearings and a couple here that I thought were skipped over very lightly.

Senator Prowse, speaking in Saint John, had said he had found a note that the Committee had not before it any evidence of damage being done by monopolistic control in New Brunswick. I think Dr. Vaillancourt...

The Chairman: I would like to see that statement by Senator Prowse. I would like to see the full quotation before I would accept your statement.

Mr. Withers: Oh, I am sorry.

The Chairman: Oh, well, I just put that on the record. Senator Prowse, I might say, is on another speaking trip; so he is not here this week, but carry on.

Mr. Withers: Dr. Vaillancourt said here a while ago in his speech, "I'll skip over the question of press freedom". Earlier one of the prominent publishers—I am not quite sure who it was—said that he experienced no pressure to control the news in his papers.

He said that only from his friends did he experience some pressure.

I suggest to that publisher that probably his friends would meet at the various clubs. They might be executives in various oil companies, perhaps soap companies and so forth, just as my friends might be the man in the corner grocery—because I must take exception to that. There certainly is pressure.

Just in this past week or past couple of weeks, the people where I work lost a considerable advertising account by the simple process of reporting the drinking/driving accident of a prominent citizen. This sort of thing goes on continually, and I will challenge any weekly publisher here or any daily publisher to deny that these pressures do exist.

We have talked about the role of the papers. I think its job is properly to paint as accurate a picture of the community as it possibly can, and I think that if anything is left out of this picture, for instance, the matter of drinking and driving and so forth, this is stealing from the public something that we are paid to give them, something that we are giving them by certain privileges that are allowed us.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Hays: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Hays.

Senator Hays: Did you publish this before he was convicted or after he was convicted?

Mr. Withers: After he was convicted. It was just purely a matter of court news.

Senator Hays: It is the principle of your newspaper not to publish it?

Mr. Withers: No. We have a column which we call "Provincial Court" in which all news is published.

Senator Hays: Whether he's convicted or not?

Mr. Withers: Right, everything in the court records.

Senator Hays: And if he is not convicted?

Mr. Withers: No, no, this is a matter of whatever is in the court records are published perbatim.

Senator Bourque: May I ask a question?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Bourque. May I again remind our visitors that if anyone wants to speak to go to the microphones. I am not going to wait for people to go to the microphones. As long as Mr. Withers is speaking and there is no one else who wants to speak, then we can just proceed to question him, but if other people do want to speak, please go to the microphones. Now, Senator Bourque.

Senator Bourque: We are all victims of influence, in the advertising business especially, at certain times something occurs that a man would like to keep out of the papers. If you don't keep it out, well, he might get angry at the time, but if he doesn't advertise in the paper, his business is going to suffer; so, it's only going to be temporary he will come back, possibly in a month or two, because nobody works against his own interests.

Mr. Withers: Well, I wasn't complaining. I was just stating the fact that there is pressure existing. In fact, I should say that on the whole matter of pressure, Senator Prowse had said he had seen no evidence of the damage done to the press by monopolistic control in Saint John. I would suggest that the best evidence of that has been the vast improvement in the Telegraph-Journal, for instance, since these inquiries started.

The Chairman: Well, perhaps on that note we can turn to—another speaker. Thanks, Mr. Withers. Even when I know your names, I wish you would give them.

Mr. Gerald C. Craven, President, Canadian Weekly Newspaper Association: My name is Craven, and I am from Ridgetown. I publish the Ridgetown Dominion and it's the only "Dominion" in Canada and—that might be a little corny, yes, but we are publishing in a very rich rural area, a farming area, and we have a number of our farmers in our area who used to take the daily newspapers, and, Senator Bourque, I might mention that there are now numbers of farmers who no longer take the daily newspapers, and they are still alive. At one time, in one rural route that I know, out of a route of say, 50 farmers, there might be 30 or 40 or 50 newspapers going out in that area. Now, there could be four or five. These are daily newspapers, and these farmers cannot afford to pay upwards to $45 a year—at least they feel as if they can't afford to pay $45 a year for their daily newspapers—although, as I say, it's a very prosperous area. Craven is the name.

Senator Hays: Where I come from, we have Hutterite colonies who are the best farmers in Canada, and they take no newspapers.

Mr. Craven: That's right. We have some in our area too, but they don't mind borrowing their neighbour's!

Mr. John Pinckney, Publisher, 'Rosetown Eagle', Rosetown, Saskatchewan: My name is Pinckney, and I publish the Rosetown Eagle in Rosetown, Saskatchewan, which was once a rich, wheat-farming area, and we have Hutterites—Can you hear me?

The Chairman: Yes.

Mr. Pinckney: I would like to ask how many of the honourable Senators subscribe to a rural weekly? I don't mean read it like the Hutterites. I mean actually buy one themselves.

The Chairman: Well, Mr. Pinckney's asked the question. Let's ask. Do the Senators read weeklies?

From the Floor: Read, but not buy.

The Chairman: Well, I may say that I subscribe to a weekly, but I live in Metropolitan Toronto, and I must say it is not a rural weekly, but it is a member of your Association, as Mr. Larone knows. Is the point you are making that we are not familiar with weeklies? I think most of us are.

Mr. Pinckney: Well, I was thinking about the Senator's remarks.

The Chairman: Which one, Senator Bourque?

Mr. Pinckney: Bourque, oh, yes, sorry, sir. I presume that he was slightly prejudiced. That's all; that he maybe hadn't lived close to the production of a weekly rural newspaper. Anyone who has not done this, could not help but be a little—well, ignorant of the fact or prejudiced against them when they compare the big metropolitan daily with the ten or twelve or sixteen-page weekly newspaper, which, incidentally, carries more actual news, in inches, of reading matter about its community than any daily newspaper I have ever seen.

The Chairman: Which weekly does this?

Mr. Pinckney: Well, most of them; for example, sixteen pages of nothing but local news. Do you know a daily that does that? The Star Phoenix doesn't.

The Chairman: I don't know that, but I know that in connection with the Committee—and let me put a question to you very directly. We have had occasion to study a great many weeklies in Canada. Would you agree with me that there are extremes, that some of the papers are very good in the way you describe, but your description is of the best papers. Certainly there are others that don't measure up to that standard.

Mr. Pinckney: This is quite right: you have papers down to—that have been mentioned—500 circulation—maybe just four pages, where the printer and his wife probably are the total staff making a minimum of $4,000 to $5,000 a year net income, all the way up to some of the very large suburban weeklies where the net income is very considerable. Of course there is a wide range, but basically they are full of nothing but local news.

The Chairman: Meaningful local news?

Mr. Pinckney: Well, I don't know what you mean by meaningful. If someone dies or someone marries or someone has had a child, this is the sort of news that we want to know about that the daily cannot do.

The reference is made that the weeklies can never replace the dailies. I don't think it's their intention. They serve two completely different purposes.

The Chairman: Thank you so much. I think we should say in fairness to Senator Bourque that Outremont is not exactly rural Canada, and this is the point that you were making, and I think in fairness to Senator Bourque I should say I know him not to be hostile to weekly papers at all. I think that's a fair statement of your position, Senator Bourque?

Senator Bourque: What I said this morning was that I am very much in favour of the weekly papers, and I think they have a great future because they carry news that is vital to the people in the community which they serve, but we must have the daily papers to keep us abreast of all the news of the world, for example what is happening in Tokyo.

The Chairman: To find out on a daily basis how badly the Canadiens are doing, for example, Senator?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Paul Légaré, Secretary, Les Hebdomadaires du Canada: Mr. Chairman, my name is Légaré, and I am Secretary of Les Hebdomadaires du Canada.

I wonder if we are not moving towards empty and useless debate in attempting decide which is better, the weekly or the daily. Perhaps a comparison could be made with ladies' clothes: there are the ones you see and the ones you don't see, and perhaps the weeklies are like the latter, and therefore closer to the truth. However, I think the outer layers are necessary too.

[Text]

The Chairman: I think your point is well taken. It becomes a little like a grade school debate. Yes, sir?

Mr. George Derksen, Publisher and Editor, 'Estevan Mercury', Estevan, Saskatchewan: Home of the Estevan Bruins.

The Chairman: Who are doing better than the Canadiens!

Mr. Derksen: Yes.

The Chairman: You know, I am very brave for a Maple Leaf fan!

Mr. Derksen: All the comparisons between dailies and weeklies—I have something here that I wrote the other day—

We speak of being distinct from other media. When a large daily newspaper shows concern about rural needs and happenings, this cannot be satisfied at any other level. No daily can give eight to twenty pages of local news, weekly, to a smaller community. Neither will this become possible in the future by television. Necessarily, technology would still have to hire and have large numbers of people to report the news no matter how fast the communication; and I ask you, "Would advertisers in Saskatchewan be able to support a 500-page daily newspaper?" I doubt it very much.

Now, we think that the weekly press is more than distinctive. It is exclusive. It is also individual, in keeping with the mosaic pattern of Canada. News of a weekly is indicative of local needs and problems, and by stating that we, the weeklies, are individuals, we point out that most weeklies are privately owned by members of the community which they serve, and as the man said, somebody can come and punch you in the nose and I have got punched in the nose. One time I had a big whop on my head—it happens.

The weekly newspaper stands alongside the community and understands the moods, traditions, problems and promotional needs of the area.

Now, we contend that generally a weekly newspaper does not vary from region to region in either English or French.

Chain newspapers have the better financial backing, I believe, and are often able to improve production equipment; however, not all chain newspapers are able to maintain local autonomy at the level of community understanding and insight. As an example, the Liverpool chain had to re-sell its Estevan operation to area people due to its inability to hire good management with grass roots understanding.

Then, just to talk about news content and then I will sit down—the Estevan Mercury news content is roughly 90 per cent local in nature. Local news is the prime factor for our existence as media. The weekly paper is much more interested in a neighbour helping another neighbour in his harvesting operation when he is sick, than the weekly press is interested in the hippy movement or the CYC or Vietnam, for that matter.

That is about all I have to say on this thing.

The Chairman: May I ask you a question, Mr. Derksen? Is there a daily newspaper in Estevan?

Mr. Derksen: No, there is not.

The Chairman: Right, well, now, I appreciate that. Do the people in Estevan read a daily? If they subscribe to a daily paper, which paper would they take?

Mr. Derksen: The Regina Leader Post.

The Chairman: The Regina Leader Post—I am sure you would agree that the people in Estevan are as concerned with national issues—the war in Vietnam is one you named—as are the people in Toronto, and I agree they are more interested in local things first. I think your point is well taken but nonetheless they are interested in national issues.

You would agree, would you—I don't want to put words in your mouth—that he must, to be involved, subscribe to either a daily paper or watch television or how does he—

Mr. Derksen: Well, this is the point I was trying to make, Senator, that we are distinct in that we serve on a local basis. The daily serves on a national basis, and therefore I agree with Senator Bourque that we are long here to stay.

The Chairman: I am not arguing one against the other at all. We have heard a great deal in the course of this Committee about the increasing role and the increasing emphasis on young people, on youth. You used the word "hippies". Let's not talk for a moment about hippies. Let's talk about just the fact that young people in Canada, and in your province in particular, are becoming an ever more significant cross-section of the community.

How do weekly papers in general, and your paper in particular, respond to this whole youth phenomenon?

Mr. Derksen: We do respond in the news on the local basis, by covering all the activities of youth in sport, drama and what-have-you.

The Chairman: Do you cover the problems of the youth?

Mr. Derksen: Well, as best as we can, yes, but not in depth like we would like.

The Chairman: Well, for example, is there a drug problem in Estevan?

Mr. Derksen: Not to my knowledge.

The Chairman: Not to your knowledge at all—Have you tried to find out if there is?

Mr. Derksen: Well, in a recent across-Canada raid, Estevan was one of the cities that was not raided, and we were watching it very closely.

The Chairman: Have you tried to analyse why you don't have the problem in Estevan and why they have it in Regina? Really, no, I am serious.

Mr. Derksen: No, I haven't tried to analyse it because I have no beginning that I could analyse it from in that sense. But I do believe that the newspaper plays a significant part in keeping young people active.

The Chairman: It may be simply that your place is smaller, but I can tell you that there are smaller cities and towns in Ontario that have the problem; so, I am wondering why you don't.

The point was made by Mr. McIntosh this morning, and again the quote which I recall is "reflecting your environment", and I just wonder if the weeklies, and please believe me I don't say this critically, but I wonder if sometimes instead of reflecting your environment, you are so busy carrying social items, if you will which I am not faulting at all—but I am wondering if sometime there isn't something more meaningful which you are missing. I don't say this critically.

Mr. Derksen: Well, we have built a very large educational complex. We follow all the activities in youth. We have youthful reporters.

The Chairman: I don't mean your paper specifically.

Mr. Derksen: No, but I can only speak about mine.

The Chairman: Right, I am sure that's not true, incidentally. I am sure you speak about the others.

Mr. Derksen: Well, I could say a lot too, but it might not mean very much. Those are only opinions, but we do run four pages of sport. We do run church news. We do run all the drama and what-have-you.

Now, we have environmental problems. We have a large transient population in Estevan that barely gets settled. We know that we have a turnover of people of 33 per cent a year because of our oil and coal and the industry that we have. It's a transient industry and a lot of transient people come in. But our problems seem to be more with liquor than with drugs, and I agree with one of the Senators of the United States that alcohol comes before the drugs, and we may yet have the distinction of developing into the drugs.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Senator Hays: Mr. Derksen, are you incorporated?

Mr. Derksen: Yes.

Senator Hays: Are most of the weekly newspapers incorporated?

Mr. Derksen: I would say 50 per cent.

Senator Hays: You would say 50 per cent?

Mr. Derksen: Yet, that's just offhand.

Senator Hays: Do you believe in a press council?

Mr. Derksen: I believe in a press council yes. I have a paragraph on it, if you would want me to read it.

Senator Hays: No, I just wanted to know what your opinion was.

Mr. Derksen: I do, as long as freedom of the press remains. My understanding of freedom of the press is a responsible press. Statements made so freely and erroneously by large papers in covering rural events cannot be condoned and should not be left unquestioned.

I believe that the press will remain free as long as the press is a responsible unit.

Currently the only control of the free press in Canada is the licence issued by the post office department, which could pose a real threat due to its political origin.

I am not against the press council; provided the council is in the hands of actual editors and publishers, and not beset by industrial or political interests.

The Chairman: Mr. Derksen, could I ask you one other question? You have been very patient with us, and I apologise. I don't know why we are picking on you. We are not, I can assure you, but I must say and I must confess, this morning, I was somewhat surprised at the attitude of the representative from the C.W.N.A., on the questions we put to them on concentration. I am not critical of them, I was just surprised at their attitude. Do you share the point of view which they expressed on this problem?

Mr. Derksen: No, I do not.

The Chairman: Could you expand upon that?

Mr. Derksen: Well, I believe that a press council would be a good thing.

The Chairman: No, on the concentration of ownership. I am sorry.

Mr. Derksen: Oh, I am sorry, concentration of ownership.

The Chairman: I take your point on the press council.

Mr. Derksen: I don't believe it's a good thing, no.

The Chairman: They don't seem to be too concerned. I don't want to be unfair to them, but I got the impression they weren't too concerned about it. Are you?

Mr. Derksen: I am concerned about the fact that Canada is a large country with few people, and because of its mosaic pattern, no single unit can serve the needs of this country, and therefore unless there is local autonomy, it's going to be a problem.

The Chairman: Thank you.

Well, I have two people waiting at microphones. I think Mr. Gagnon is next.

Thank you, Mr. Derksen.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagnon: I am Yves Gagnon. With regard to drugs, I might say that our paper covered the problem fairly well in our own area, so much so that I was forced to dismiss one of my reporters because he had acquired the habit of excessive drug use. He had become a habitual user. But apart from this, the subject I would like to mention is one that was discussed this morning, and I was afraid it might not come up again.

It is precisely this question of the usefulness of the local weekly or daily—regional newspapers as a whole. As you know, in Canada, and especially in Quebec, very rapid social changes are taking place, and they are causing unrest among a large section of the population—often the most important section, from an electoral point of view—and problems that create a discontent that hinders the process of change, I believe, both in Quebec and in Canada. There is resistance to rapid social change.

The daily newspaper provides much more general information. The feedback provoked by a daily is generally much less than that of a regional weekly. This feedback is becoming the only source for those in authority, for those who lead, whether they are politicians at one level or another, or social activists. It is becoming the only means of checking to what extent the people are capable of accepting new social changes.

The phenomenon of concentration, of maximum use of purely commercial efficiency, threatens to destroy a large number of regional papers.

I believe—and I am not alone—that if the regional papers are not protected in one way or another,—I do not mean legislation to give them direct aid—then we are going to have a very large section of the public reacting against change, which will hinder the normal development of the country, or of one province. There was a notable example of this in Quebec a few years ago: a number of what I thought were well-meaning politicians wanted to make Quebec develop at a certain speed, but because there was insufficient feedback from the people, especially in rural areas, they were forced to slow down.

I believe this Committee should give serious attention to this question—not merely for one session, for one day—in order to find ways of ensuring that the most deprived section of the population will, first, receive information, and second, will be able to express itself. That is all.

Senator Bourque: Do you have a solution for this situation, Mr. Gagnon?

Mr. Gagnon: Solutions exist, and some could be applied immediately. The Post Office was mentioned, and there is a problem there. There is advertising, which should perhaps be looked at much more closely. There is a Senate Committee on Mass Media. I think perhaps there should be one specifically to look into prospects in the advertising market.

As I was saying this morning, with the advent of the big commercial chains that dispense with regular communication links, they find it more practical to put out circulars and flyers for door-to-door distribution either by mail or by distribution companies. This creates the danger of a decline in weekly newspapers' advertising market. So it would be fair to have some form of taxation imposed on the printing and distribution of circulars. This could be a way of making advertising in regional papers pay. We must not delude ourselves; whether we like it or not, we are living in a freely competitive society. I do not wish to call the whole system into question, but it is nevertheless true that the sole consideration today is commercial efficiency.

We have evidence, both in the United States and here, that commercial efficiency does not enable us to solve social ills, and that these then become a financial burden on the community. It is very easy to say, for example: "We do not advertise in the local weekly because it is too expensive." But this does not alter the fact that if the regional paper is not there, who is going to keep an eye on the municipal administration? Who is going to watch over the school boards? Who is going to see that the administration is honest? Who is going to see that taxes are not too high in relation to the services provided? This is a social cost, which means that every citizen has a duty and a responsibility to assume it. Do away with the regional press, and the Montreal and Sherbrooke dailies are not going to take time out to do the job in smaller communities. But a businessman or merchant, even if he does belong to a big chain, becomes established in such markets, and once established, he benefits from the markets in these communities. I have no miracle cure, obviously, but I do think you should give some very serious consideration to this problem.

The Chairman: Thank you. I am going to go to this microphone, and then I will hear you at that microphone and then we will move to the next panel.

Mrs. Christina Isobel MacBeth, Editor and Publisher, 'The Milverton Sun', Milverton, Ontario: Milverton is a small village near Stratford, in Ontario. Honourable Senators, Senator Davey, I was listening this morning, and I must say, Senator Davey, I share your concern that our spokesmen this morning perhaps did not take more alarm at the thought of a multiple ownership of the media.

As a matter of fact, you reproved us with hard questions, I would say, by asking: "At what is the cut-off point; that is, if you own one paper, two papers, three, four papers—at what point should you not become a member of the C.W.N.A.? And I think that would be a matter that would have to be arrived at by consensus."

Those of us in the Association, say at such and such a point you can't play with us, but listening to much of this, I got the feeling it's sort of like the old story about the old maid who said she wasn't trying to stamp out sex. She was just trying to get in on it. I am not trying to become evangelic; although the honourable Senator thought it might be considered that we could be talking evangelically—I might say that I believe that we as independent newspaper owners, are perhaps the last papers of vision.

I think they have made the world of the individual all-important—the world of the individual—caring about other individuals.

Now, all the big city dailies, all the television stations or the radio stations can possibly do is consider the mix of the population. We see people who still have faces attached to them and still have names. I am sorry to have to say that, but I really believe that the broadcasters in this country, to a great extent, have abdicated their responsibility of talking to people. I think they have sold their birthright. Let's hope they got more than poor ridge for it. They have sold their birthright and are no longer so much broadcasters of media for carrying advertising that happen to be on what they choose to call an "electronic highway". I think that's the case of the broadcasters.

We cannot afford to get into that. I think any one of us who has gone into independent weekly journalism has gone for some other reason, and I would say it's neither money nor power, although we would like to have both, of course—but that's not what took us there. I think most of us had a simple desire to become involved in community activity, and I would like to close with one other comment.

I disagree with one of the previous speakers who said, "We mirror our society". I don't think we mirror our society. I think the daily newspapers possibly mirror it. They take photographs of the community society. We are artists who paint pictures of our society.

Thank you.

The Chairman: Thank you. I am sorry, this will be the last comment; then, I think we must turn to the next panel.

Mr. Lindley B. Calman, President and Managing Editor, 'Picton Gazette', Picton, Ontario: Honourable Senator Davey, honourable Senators and friends: My name is Lindley Calman. I am the publisher and the managing editor of the Picton Gazette.

The ownership is a family corporation under an Ontario charter in which I have the majority of shares and other members of my family have a few shares each.

My newspaper was established in 1830. We are now in our 140th year.

Like the previous speaker, I hold the function of a weekly newspaper publisher, in my case, semi-weekly, is to be involved in community affairs, not just running his newspaper.

I was making a quick list of some of the activities in which I am engaged. I was eleven years a member of town council. I never wanted to go up to be a deputy-reeve or reeve, but I enjoy working on committees and being involved with others.

I am currently secretary-treasurer of the Chamber of Commerce. I am currently a notarian. I am currently a member of three colleges. I am currently a director of the Glenwood Cemetery Board. I am involved in many of my local community enterprises.

I do write each week to some extent, but I have an overall responsibility for those who write for me, those who canvass for advertising, those who sell job printing and price it. I have to be their mentor and guide because, after all, the business has to show a profit.

That, I don't think, has ever been my main purpose in life or I wouldn't have been in the weekly business. I would have remained in the investment business with Wood, Gundy, Securities where I went for a year after returning from World War I, but the list of, shall I say, my connections—is rather amazing—past secretary-treasurer of the yacht club, past president and secretary, if you like, of Picton Conservative Association, past secretary-treasurer of my riding association, currently a member of the Albany Club in Toronto.

As far as involvement in national affairs is concerned, sir, I have here an issue of our paper. On this page I have "Local Liberals rally to hear Mr. Foster in Picton," and that was the Member of Parliament for Algoma, and his picture is right there.

Now, on the second section of this same issue I have Honourable George Hees, who I think heads the Conservative Caucus in Ottawa, and I have Norris Whitney—

The Chairman: Who is your federal Member of Parliament isn't he?

Mr. Calman: Yes, he is the federal member, and the Ontario member was also at the Chamber of Commerce meeting which I attended as secretary-treasurer. My news editor wrote the report which I supervised.

I supervise the editorial policy. I do not instruct my editor what to write, but I ask him to submit it for change of wording. I mean, I might re-word something that he has written a little better. At the same time, since we are publishing in a one-newspaper town and we have no radio, we have no television, we have no other newspaper, nevertheless, we have to follow a middle of the course road and treat both parties alike. As a matter of fact, I think sometimes that a few of my Conservative friends don't do as much business with me as some of my good Liberal friends.

The Chairman: You say, "treat both parties alike". How do you treat the New Democrats?

Mr. Calman: Shall I say, give everybody a fair break.

The Chairman: Do you give the New Democrats a fair break?

Mr. Calman: If there were a New Democrat meeting held in our community, certainly we would cover it and report what they had to say. That's my answer, sir.

The Chairman: Okay, that's a good answer. Thank you.

Mr. Calman: And outside of that, I hold that my position as a weekly publisher is to meet a payroll which amounts to sixteen or seventeen hundred dollars a week and to make things come out even in the end, and sometimes with a net profit, but I have seen years when we came out with a net loss.

Thank you.

The Chairman: We will be getting to Revenue and Disbursements this evening. Thank you, sir.

I am wondering if I may thank the panelists and urge them to remain for the rest of the day and urge them, certainly, to get into the discussion from the floor microphones during the balance of the day. Would the next four panelists come forward, Mr. Cyr, Dr. Miller, Mr. Miller and Mr. Farran—please. Thank you, gentlemen.

Now, on "Content", the first speaker is Mr. Lou Miller. Mr. Miller is the publisher of the Montreal Monitor.

I would remind you before we begin, Mr. Miller, that I rap at eight minutes and rap a little harder at nine minutes and then hit you at ten minutes, okay. Thank you.

Mr. Lou Miller, 'The Monitor', Montreal, Quebec: Senator Davey, Honourable Senators, ladies and gentlemen, for the past six months or thereabouts, you, the Committee, have had the opportunity of hearing from the greats of mass media, such learned gentlemen as John Bassett, Max Bell, Claude Ryan, Dick Beddoes.

Today is our day, the day of the much-maligned and oft ignored weekly press. My assignment today is to discuss the news operation of a weekly, specifically from the point of view of an urban English weekly in la Belle Province.

What makes our type of weekly—and there are only about half a dozen of us—different from other weekly papers in Canada? Well, not only do we speak to and for a minority, but also we are in combat with the almighty advertising dollar against each other, two dailies, four television stations and five radio stations in the English language, and a still greater number in the French language. Each attempts to acquire a share of the advertiser's dollar, but I am not here to discuss advertising for financing or even printing costs, but rather news content. Before delving into the matter, I wish to place before this distin-
